> "(1) That no printed transcript on appeal has ever been filed; (2) that the record or transcript contains no proper or legal certification of the evidence taken, or of papers introduced on the hearing of the proceeding, which culminated in the order appealed from; (3) that no official or other stenographer was present at such hearing; (4) that no transcript of the notes of an official or other stenographer taken upon said hearing was ever prepared as required by the statutes of the state of California, and particularly section 953a, C. C. P.; (5) that no legal statement was ever settled by the judge of the superior court of Inyo county, state of California, under the provisions of section 953a, C. C. P."

Among the reasons suggested by appellant for which the motion to dismiss should be denied is the unreasonable delay of respondents in making the motion. The notice of appeal herein was filed on January 4, 1915; the transcript on appeal was filed in the Supreme Court (to which the appeal was originally taken) on February 27, 1915. The notice of motion to dismiss the appeal was filed in this court on May 9, 1917.

[1] Section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure, under which the appeal was taken, provides: That a person desiring to perfect an appeal by the method therein provided for shall file a request with the clerk that a transcript of the testimony taken at the hearing, all rulings, acts, or statements of the court, all objections or exceptions of counsel, and all matters to which the same relate, be made up and prepared. Appellant attempted to comply with this requirement. But, having been advised that the proceedings were not taken by a stenographer, appellant specified in his notice that the transcript should contain a copy of the minutes of the court with particular reference to the portion of the order which recites:

> "Counsel for the petitioners introduced oral and documentary evidence in support of said petition" with a statement "of the substance of said oral and documentary evidence, giving the names of the witnesses and specifying the documents used and introduced, and that said copy of, or statement of, the minutes of the court shall include copies of said documents relevant to the appeal herein, which copy of the minutes of the court, or statement of the minutes of the court, shall be certified by the judge of the superior court as provided by section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure to the effect that: 'The judge shall thereupon certify to the truth and correctness of said transcript.'"

It is clear enough from the language of said section that the statement is to be prepared by the stenographer, and not by the judge. The purpose is to have a literal and exact record of the proceedings. There is no provision therein for the settlement of a statement prepared by the judge from his own minutes. In order to avoid the printing of the record, appellant may avail himself of said alternative method, but that his effort may be effective he must comply with its terms.

In Harpold v. Slocum, 168 Cal. 364, 367, 143 Pac. 609, 610, it is said:

> "The appellant did not follow section 953a, and therefore he must print the transcript and serve and file copies thereof in the manner provided by those rules."

In Allen v. Conrey, 22 Cal. App. 409, 134 Pac. 730, the Court of Appeal for the Second District declared:

> "If a party to an action expects to take his appeal under the alternative method and have his record prepared according to the procedure affecting that method, then he must see to it that the official phonographic reporter is present at the trial in order that a transcript of the evidence and proceedings may be furnished by the one officer whose duty it is to prepare it."

In Bush v. Allen, 172 Cal. 102, 155 Pac. 456, upon an appeal under the alternative method, an application was made to the trial judge to affix his certificate to the transcript, and an objection was made by respondents upon the ground that there was no phonographic report of the trial, and that the judge's certificate is properly affixed only when there is a phonographic reporter present at the trial, and that phonographic reporter has prepared his transcript of the evidence and proceedings in accordance with law. The Supreme Court said:

> "Such is the settled law upon this matter of procedure. Totten v. Barlow, 165 Cal. 378 [132 Pac. 749]."

And the court approved the ruling of the Court of Appeal in the collateral proceeding in the same case (22 Cal. App. 409, 134 Pac. 730), an application having been made thereto for a writ of mandate. It was further stated:

> "Under the law of the case thus made we have before us a transcript under the clerk's certificate alone and are empowered to consider only the judgment roll."

Therein was an appeal from the judgment, and hence there was a separate record made by the clerk of the court constituting the judgment roll which seems to have been duly authenticated, but there is no such consideration here in the appeal from the order made after judgment, since there is no separate and distinct judgment roll. The transcript settled as provided by said section 953a constitutes the only record of the proceedings in the court below. In other words, the only record cognizable in this appeal is the said typewritten transcript purporting to have been prepared and settled according to said statute, but which, as we have seen, falls short of the requirement. Under the authorities we think it must be plain, therefore, that the record, considered as a substitute for or in lieu of a bill of exceptions or statement of the case, is fatally defective, and must fail of its purpose.

[2] In the closing brief of appellant, however, we find this claim:

> "Moreover, the lower court held in this case that the transcript signed by him constitutes 'a full, true and fair record' of the proceedings taken before him. That is all that the ordinary bill of exceptions amounts to. Accordingly the transcript involved may be regarded as a bill of exceptions prepared under the old method and defective merely in that it is not printed. Lang v. L. & T. Co., 161 Cal. 295, 119 Pac. 100. Certainly a failure to comply with the court rule requiring it to be printed can be waived, and was waived by the court in allowing the case to be brought on for argument without ever questioning the sufficiency of the record. Though the transcript does not show that it was served upon respondents, and time for proposed amendments allowed, it will be presumed that this was done in the absence of a showing to the contrary."

The presumption would be, probably, as stated by appellant, if there were room for it, but it would be flying in the face of the record to hold that the transcript constitutes a "bill of exceptions" as contemplated by section 650 of the Code of Civil Procedure. In the notice of the appeal and request for the preparation of the transcript it is recited by appellant that:

> "Said transcripts to be prepared as required by the laws of the state of California, and particularly as provided by sections 953a, 953b, and 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure of the state of California."

It is also certified by the trial judge:

> "That said transcripts and this certificate were prepraed under the provisions of sections 953a, 953b, and 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that said transcripts were duly presented to me for approval within the time allowed by law and under the provisions of said sections, and that due notice was given by the clerk of said court to the attorneys appearing in said cause that said transcripts had been filed and would be duly presented to me for approval, and that at the expiration of the time set in said notice I have hereto affixed my signature."

The foregoing leaves no room for presumption. It clearly appears that the proceedings were taken under said sections of the code and that appellant sought to avail himself of what is known as the alternative method. To hold that this record may be considered a bill of exceptions would be to disregard utterly the distinction made by the code and to violate the established rule of appellate practice.

Appellant finds much comfort in the contention that respondents should not prevail by reason of the great delay in presenting his motion, more than two years having expired since the appeal was taken.

In Dietrich v. L. & N. W. R. Co., 13 Neb. 500, 14 N. W. 528, in considering a motion to quash a bill of exceptions for defects in its execution, the Supreme Court of Nebraska said:

> "Objections to a bill of exceptions must be filed before the case is submitted, and should be at the earliest opportunity. Such objections are not favored, and usually are merely technical; and he who objects upon merely technical grounds must himself be free from fault. Besides, it is but justice to the adverse party that the objections should be made at the earliest opportunity, so that, if it is apparent that they are well taken and the case depends upon the bill of exceptions, no further expense will be incurred in continuing the prosecution."

In McDermott v. Hacker, 109 Iowa, 239, 80 N. W. 338, a similar ruling was made by the Supreme Court of Iowa on a motion to dismiss the appeal on the ground that the transcript was not filed within the time required by the Code of Rules and Practice. Other analogous cases which appellant cites are Walker v. Hill, 111 Ind. 223, 12 N. E. 387; Jones v. Henderson, 149 Ind. 458, 49 N. E. 443; Garr, Scott & Co. v. Nelson, 166 Mo. App. 51, 148 S. W. 417.

The delay here is as reprehensible as in any of said cases, and, if a proper case for it, the doctrine of laches should be applied. As we have seen, the transcript was filed in the Supreme Court in February, 1915, and appellant's opening brief was filed in April following. The brief of respondents was filed in June and the final brief of appellant in July, 1915. The case was transferred to this court in March, 1917, and set down for oral argument for April 10th. It was continued by consent to April 12th, and on that day an order was made allowing respondents 15 days to file another brief and appellant 10 days to reply, the cause then to stand submitted. Respondents, however, failed to file their brief, and on May 9th, for the first time, they made the motion to dismiss the appeal.

[3] It is not necessary, though, to determine the question whether the motion to dismiss should be denied by reason of such delay; as it is apparent that no sufficient reason has been shown for a dismissal. Notwithstanding said infirmity in the transcript, the court has jurisdiction of the appeal. The notice given by appellant to the clerk under the new system vests the higher court with authority to consider the cause. Hibernia Savings & Loan Society v. Doran, 161 Cal. 118, 118 Pac. 526. The consequence of the defective authentication of the record in the present case may be substantially the same as though a dismissal were had, but respondents' motion should be denied. As suggested in the Hibernia Case, supra, the proper motion would be for an order to affirm the judgment for lack of a record, and not to dismiss the appeal. "This may sound extremely technical," as said by the late Chief Justice Beatty, in Dennis v. Bint, 122 Cal. 49, 54 Pac. 378, 68 Am. St. Rep. 17 "but such is the nature of the case." Respondents' contention is somewhat technical, and it is not improper to meet it with a technicality.

[4] But, as before stated, this concession can be of no real service to appellant. It would seem that we have no legally authenticated record to enable us to review the action of the court. Rule 29 of the Supreme Court (119 Pac. xiv) provides:

> "In all cases of appeal from the orders of the superior courts, the papers and evidence used or taken on the hearing of the motion must be authenticated by incorporating the same in a bill of exceptions, except where another mode of authentication is provided by law."

We have before us no bill of exceptions, and the other "mode of authentication" has not been pursued. The situation is therefore like that described in 161 Cal. 118, 118 Pac. 526, as follows:

> "Appellant, therefore, having pursued neither method to perfect his appeal, it results that that appeal stands here upon a record making it impossible for the court to review the order appealed from."

[5] But, assuming that the record before us may be consulted, what conclusion naturally and legally follows? The application upon which the order complained of was based prayed for a construction of said decree, and particularly that it be determined whether the provision of said decree "to pay Wellington Gregg, Jr., as trustee, provided at that time the said Wellington Gregg, Jr., as trustee, has not been paid the $1,000 hereby declared to be owing to him by the Keane Wonder Mining Company under and by virtue of the terms of the stipulations hereinabove recited, or any balance of said $1,000 which may be then due and unpaid," be not "inoperative and void and of no force and effect under the terms of the stipulations upon which the decree was based and the form of final decree attached to said stipulation and agreed to by the parties." Furthermore, the prayer was that, if the court should hold said provision to be inoperative and void, the decree be amended by striking out from the same said clause.

There can be no doubt that said provision was utterly at variance with the stipulation of the parties and the agreed form of the decree, and therefore the order of the court striking out said provision was altogether just, even though the action of the court cannot be sustained by the technical rules of law.

That it was so inconsistent appears from this clause of the stipulation:

> "That said decree shall find that there is due to Wellington Gregg, Jr., as trustee under the deed of trust, the sum of $500, as his fees and compensation as trustee, and the further sum of $500 as and for his attorney's fees, which by the terms of said decree it shall be provided shall be paid out of the first net monthly proceeds of the mines of the Keane Wonder Mining Company next accruing; that it shall also be found, decided, and determined in and by said decree that said deed of trust is a valid and enforceable obligation against the said Keane Wonder Mining Company, and that the said A. L. Meyerstein, as receiver of the Francis-Mohawk Mining & Leasing Company, and the said Benjamin H. Tatem have and are given a first lien upon all of the property of the Keane Wonder Mining Company which is described in said deed of trust, for the payment of all the moneys decreed to be due upon any and all of said notes, as above provided."

It may be said also that the agreed form of decree corresponded with the stipulation.

It is thus to be seen that, by stipulation of the parties, appellant's claim was to be satisfied out of a special fund, and the property covered by the trust deed was to be impressed with a lien exclusively for the benefit of Meyerstein as receiver and of Tatem, and that the modification of the decree made by the court would operate to give effect to their stipulation.

Moreover, notwithstanding the objections to the court's order made by appellant, we think the correction could be legally made, although more than six months had elapsed since the decree was signed.

There was an inconsistency in the terms of the final decree, one part providing for the payment of appellant as agreed upon, and the other giving an additional remedy not contemplated by the stipulation of the parties. While it is hardly a case of clerical misprision, nor does it seem to fall strictly within the category of the cases cited, we think there is such repugnance between the two said provisions as to justify the court in considering the stipulation to determine whether the provision in controversy did not constitute redundancy, the result of inadvertence, and should be disregarded. Otherwise, in consequence of conflicting provisions, a decree might be unintelligible and unenforceable, and the court powerless to correct the manifest infirmity. We do not see why the case should not be regarded as similar to the instances of doubt, obscurity, and ambiguity referred to in Atlantic, etc., Co. v. Wright, 11 Cal. App. 179, 104 Pac. 460; Clay v. Hildebrand, 34 Kan. 694, 9 Pac. 466, and Walker's Ex. v. Page, 21 Grat. (Va.) 636.

In the first of these the rule, as gathered from the authorities, is stated as follows:

> "In case of ambiguity, a judgment should be construed with reference to the pleadings, and when it admits of two constructions, the one will be adopted which is consonant with the judgment which should have been rendered on the facts and the law of the case."

The other two cases are to the same effect, the first referring to an obscure judgment, and the other to an instance of doubtful signification.

The only serious question, we think, is whether respondents should not have resorted to a suit in equity to correct the mistake. That such course could have been successfully pursued admits of no doubt in view of the clear exposition of the subject in Bacon v. Bacon, 150 Cal. 477, 89 Pac. 317. However, we are of the opinion that the error was of such character that it could be corrected on motion, and if we are right in this conclusion, there can be no question, of course, that reference may be had to the stipulation of the parties. Thayer v. McGee, 20 Mich. 195. It must be true also that the only way to make the decree consonant with said stipulation and form of decree agreed upon is either to treat said provision as of no force and effect or, what is in effect the same thing, to strike it out.

We think the order should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

AHEARN v. LANE et al. (Civ. 1648.)

1. Principal and Agent 🔑23(4)—Existence of Agency—Sufficiency of Evidence.

In an action by the lessee, on failure to get possession, to recover payments to the lessor's alleged agent and for damages, evidence held to support the findings of the trial court that defendant lessor rented to plaintiff and that the lessor's agent was in fact such.

2. Principal and Agent 🔑189(1)—Pleading.

In an action to recover payments made to an agent, the complaint, alleging that the said agent represented to plaintiff that he was the agent of the owner of property, and that it was agreed between plaintiff and defendant (naming the agent) that the purchase price of the furniture should be $350, $150 to be paid by plaintiff to defendant (naming the agent) "as the agent for said defendant" (naming him), sufficiently stated a cause of action against defendant owner, though not directly alleging that his agent was such, nor that he was authorized to represent the owner.

3. Appeal and Error 🔑193(5)—Preservation of Objections—Defective Allegation—Waiver.

Though advantage may be taken at any time of the entire absence of a material averment in a complaint, the privilege of challenging a defective allegation may be waived, and the complaining party be deprived of the right to urge the imperfection as a ground of reversal, by failing to file demurrer, and by making no objections to the introduction of evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Denver Sevier, Judge.

Action by Esther Ahearn against Jack Lane and William Boitana. From a judgment for plaintiff against both defendants, defendant Lane appeals. Judgment affirmed.

G. M. Pittman, of Eureka, for appellant. E. M. Frost, of Eureka (L. M. Burnell, of Eureka, of counsel), for respondent.

BURNETT, J. This is an appeal by Jack Lane from a judgment of the superior court in and for the county of Humboldt against the two defendants for $150.

William Boitana, representing himself to be the agent of defendant, Jack Lane, induced plaintiff to rent a lodging house belonging to said Lane and purchase the furniture therein. To this end plaintiff paid said Boitana $60 rental and $150 toward the furniture, receiving receipts therefor signed by Boitana. Thereafter plaintiff was refused possession of the premises, and she brings this action for the recovery of the sum of $210 paid by her to Boitana and for $375 damages due to loss of rental profits.

[1] In his brief appellant declares:

> "The only material question at issue is as to whether or not the defendant and appellant, Jack Lane, rented the property to the respondent or to the defendant William Boitana, and was the defendant William Boitana the agent of appellant Jack Lane."

It may be said that the complaint of the plaintiff is based upon the theory that he was such agent and that plaintiff's dealing was directly with said William Boitana. It is earnestly claimed by appellant that there is no proof of such agency. Plaintiff, however, testified that before entering into the contract with Boitana she telephoned to said Lane and he informed her that "he was acting through Mr. Boitana." It is true that other portions of the plaintiff's testimony are rather inconsistent with this declaration, and that the showing of the appellant to the contrary is quite strong and persuasive, but these were considerations for the trial court, and we cannot say that the conclusion of the trial judge was entirely unsupported. He had the legal right to accept at its full value the said statement of plaintiff and to act upon it, and it is not within our province to dispute the correctness of his conclusion.

As to the other proposition contended for by appellant that the property was not rented to plaintiff, the testimony of plaintiff is positive and unequivocal that she had such agreement with William Boitana, and in pursuance thereof paid him said sum of money, and, as before suggested, this was supplemented by the testimony as to agency based upon said conversation with appellant.

[2] Another point is made by the appellant for the first time in his closing brief to the effect that the complaint fails to state a cause of action against said Jack Lane. It must be said that the complaint is inartificially drawn, and it is quite defective in the respect suggested. There is no direct allegation that Boitana was the agent of Lane, nor that he was authorized to represent the latter in the transaction relied upon. The direct allegation is that:

> "The said William Boitana represented to said plaintiff that he was the agent of the owner of said furniture in said lodging and rooming house at said No. 236 Second street in said city of Eureka, said county of Humboldt," etc.

An allegation that he represented himself to be the agent is, of course, not an allegation of the fact of agency. However, it is further alleged:

> "That it was then and there orally agreed to by and between said plaintiff and the said defendant, said William Boitana, that the purchase price of said furniture should be the sum of $350, $150 to be then and there paid by said plaintiff to said defendant William Boitana as the agent for said defendant said Jack Lane," etc.

We think it thus appears that an attempt was made to allege that the defendant Boitana was the agent of Lane in the transaction. It, of course, falls short of the direct and explicit averment that should be found in a pleading of this character, but we think it may be regarded as an instance of an imperfect allegation of a material element rather than an utter failure to make an essential averment of a cause of action.

In this connection it may be said that no demurrer was filed to the complaint; that no objection was made to the introduction of evidence on the ground that the complaint failed to state a cause of action against the appellant; furthermore, that the action seems to have been tried upon the theory that the complaint was sufficient in the respect indicated, and that no attention was called to this defect until the closing brief of appellant was presented in this court.

[3] While, of course, advantage may be taken at any time of the entire absence of a material averment in a complaint, yet it is well settled that the privilege of challenging a defective allegation may be waived, and the complaining party be thereafter deprived of the right to urge such imperfection as a ground of reversal. The infirmity herein suggested could have been easily remedied, and appellant should have called attention to it. Manifestly plaintiff was quite careless in drafting her complaint, but this did not justify appellant in remaining silent until the last word was about to be spoken in the appellate court, and then, with no opportunity for respondent to reply, demanding a reversal for a defect that in no wise operated to his prejudice.

We think under the circumstances that the complaint should not be held so radically defective as to demand a retrial of the cause. The judgment is therefore affirmed.

WILDENHAYN v. JUSTICE'S COURT OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (Civ. 1948.)

1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE 🔑138(12)—RECORD—AMENDMENTS.

A justice's court has the right to amend its records so as to make them speak the truth with respect to the actual orders which it makes.

2. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE 🔑138(12)—RECORD—AMENDMENTS.

A justice's court granting an order to set aside a default judgment, and thereafter reciting by an order that its former order failed, through inadvertence, to contain the terms of the actual order, had power to order the minutes of his court to be corrected.

3. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE 🔑208(1)—REVIEW—CERTIORARI—FINDING.

The finding and decision of a justice's court that its order had been inadvertently entered in the minutes was conclusive upon the trial court on a writ of review, as its only power was to review jurisdiction of justice's court to make such order in any case.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Seawell, Judge.

Application by Ernest Wildenhayn for a writ of certiorari against the Justice's Court of the City and County of San Francisco. From a judgment of the superior court annulling an order of the Justice's Court vacating and setting aside a default judgment in an action before it, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Pierce Coombes, of San Francisco, for appellant. Samuel B. Russell, of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment rendered upon an application for a writ of certiorari whereby the trial court annulled an order of the justice's court of the city and county of San Francisco vacating and setting aside a default judgment in an action before it.

The record shows the following to be the facts: On or about September 15, 1915, the plaintiff herein commenced an action in said justice's court against C. E. Herrick, Incorporated, to recover the sum of $142, and caused summons therein to be forthwith issued and served. On September 23, 1915, judgment by default was rendered against said defendant. On September 28, 1915, the defendant moved for an order vacating and setting aside said default judgment and permitting said defendant to appear and plead therein. Said motion was heard on October 1, 1915, by Justice Frank T. Deasy, in whose court said action was pending, and on said last-named day the justice made an order granting said motion. The said order, as it was then entered in the clerk's record of said court, did not contain any provision for the payment of costs by the defendant as a condition of granting said motion, as required by section 859 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The defendant thereupon filed its answer. On October 6, 1915, the plaintiff moved said justice's court for an order setting aside its last above named order vacating the default judgment, upon the sole ground that the court had not jurisdiction to make the same in the form in which it appeared to have been made on the records of the court; it being the contention of the plaintiff that such order, in the absence of a condition requiring the payment of costs by the defendant, was void. On February 3, 1916, Justice Frank T. Deasy made and entered an order reciting that its order of October 1, 1915, at which the motion was aimed, as entered in the minutes of said court, failed through inadvertence to contain the terms of the actual order as given by the court upon the date thereof, in that from the said minute order was omitted the requirement as to the payment of costs which the actual order made in open court had contained; and the justice therefore ordered the minutes of his court to be corrected in that regard, and thereupon denied the plaintiff's said motion; whereupon the plaintiff applied to the superior court for a writ of review, and the said court, with the record of the justice's court showing the above facts before it, annulled the last-named order of the justice's court, the effect of which was also to work an annulment of the former order of the justice's court as the same appeared upon its unamended minutes. From that judgment the defendant prosecutes this appeal.

[1] The first and in fact the only question presented upon this appeal is as to whether or not a justice's court has the right to amend its records so as to make them speak the truth with respect to the actual orders which it makes. This inherent power courts of record have always possessed and exercised, and their action in so doing has in this state been uniformly upheld. Hall v. Polack, 42 Cal. 218; Bostwick v. McEvoy, 62 Cal. 496; Wiggin v. Superior Court, 68 Cal. 398, 9 Pac. 646; Crim v. Kessing, 89 Cal. 486, 26 Pac. 1074, 23 Am. St. Rep. 491; Egan v. Egan, 90 Cal. 15, 27 Pac. 22; Kaufman v. Shain, 111 Cal. 16, 43 Pac. 393, 52 Am. St. Rep. 139; Dickey v. Gibson, 113 Cal. 26, 45 Pac. 15, 54 Am. St. Rep. 321; People v. Curtis, 113 Cal. 68, 45 Pac. 180; People v. Durrant, 116 Cal. 179, 48 Pac. 75; Scamman v. Bonslett, 118 Cal. 93, 50 Pac. 272, 62 Am. St. Rep. 226; Homeseekers' L. Ass'n v. Gleeson, 133 Cal. 312, 65 Pac. 617. We can discover no reason, and we are referred to no authority, denying the possession of a like inherent power in courts not of record in proper cases.

[2] Upon the record before us this would seem to have been a proper case for the exercise of such a right by the judge of the justice's court; and his finding and decision that the order in question was inadvertently entered in the minutes of his court in an erroneous form was conclusive upon the trial court upon the hearing on a writ of review, whose only power was that of reviewing the jurisdiction of the lower tribunal to make such an order in any case.

[3] It must be conceded that, if in fact the order as made by the justice in open court did comply with the requirements of section 859 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and if in fact the order as entered in the minutes of the court inadvertently omitted a condition essential to its validity which the actual order contained, a grave and irremediable injury would be done the defendant in the denial to it of the right to have a hearing upon the merits of the case.

Judgment reversed.

TAFT et al. v. HAAS et al. (Civ. 2386.)

1. Mandamus 🔑23(2)—Petitioners "Beneficially Interested"—Statute.

Taxpayers of a city were "beneficially interested," within Code Civ. Proc. § 1086, providing that writ of mandate must be issued on the verified petition of the party beneficially interested, in a proceeding to compel the board of trustees of a city to canvass the returns of an election therein to determine whether the city should be consolidated with the city of Los Angeles, since the question of consolidation bore a direct relation to the question of the amount of taxes to be paid in future by petitioners, etc.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Beneficially Interested.]

2. Elections 🔑244—Failure to Sign Roster of Election Precinct.

The roster kept at an election precinct being in charge of the precinct officials, it is their duty to require electors to sign it, and neither the vote of a nonsigning elector nor that of the precinct is invalidated by their failure to discharge the duty.

3. Elections 🔑259—Canvass—Completion.

Where the board of trustees of a city, canvassing the returns of an election, threw out the entire vote of two precincts, consolidated for the particular election, because the number of names on the precinct roster fell short by three of the number of names on the polling list and the number of ballots cast, the canvass was not complete; the board's action in throwing out the vote of the precincts being improper.

4. Mandamus 🔑74(4)—Completion of Canvass—Propriety of Remedy.

Mandamus on the petition of taxpayers of the city was the proper remedy to require the board of trustees to complete the canvass by counting the vote of the thrown-out precincts; the statute providing for election contests having no application to the particular election, which was on the question of consolidation with another city.

Application for writ of mandate by S. H. Taft and others against William Haas and others. Peremptory writ directed to issue as prayed.

Tanner, Odell & Taft, of Los Angeles, for petitioners. J. W. Ballard and Charles D. Ballard, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WORKS, Judge pro tem. The respondents are the city clerk and the members of the board of trustees of the city of Sawtelle, and in this proceeding we are asked to require the trustees to canvass the returns of a certain election held in the city, to require the clerk to enter the result of the canvass upon the minutes of the trustees, and to direct all the respondents to perform certain other acts required by law in the premises. The petitioners are taxpayers, property owners, and registered voters and electors of Sawtelle.

[1] The respondents contend that the petitioners are not beneficially interested in the relief sought, section 1086 of the Code of Civil Procedure providing that the writ of mandate "must be issued upon the verified petition of the party beneficially interested," and that, for that reason, the petitioners have not legal capacity to sue. The election in question was held for the purpose of determining whether the city of Sawtelle should be consolidated with the city of Los Angeles. Whether the former city is to become one with the latter bears a direct relation to the question of the amount of taxes in future to be paid by petitioners, and either consolidation or no consolidation with Los Angeles is bound to affect the value of all property in Sawtelle. The petitioners are therefore beneficially interested in this proceeding. Eby v. Board of School Trustees, 87 Cal. 166, 25 Pac. 240; Frederick v. San Luis Obispo, 118 Cal. 391, 50 Pac. 661.

It becomes necessary now to state more fully the facts upon which this controversy is based and as to which there is no dispute. On the day of the election 300 votes were cast at one of the election precincts, which we may designate as precinct A, as shown by the tally list and by the certificate of the precinct election board. Of these 153 voted for consolidation and 147 against consolidation. While, however, 300 voters actually registered a choice at precinct A, the roster signed by the electors showed a total only of 297 signatures. Three who voted did not sign. In that part of Sawtelle not including precinct A the total vote for consolidation was 366 and against consolidation 369. Thus without precinct A the result was against consolidation with a margin of 3 votes. The total vote, including the vote of precinct A, was, for consolidation 519, against consolidation 516; a direct reversal of the situation, also with a majority of 3 votes. When the board of trustees came to canvass the result of the election, the vote of precinct A was rejected from consideration upon the advice of the city attorney of Sawtelle that the discrepancy between the tally list and certificate, on the one hand, and the roster, on the other, had the effect to nullify the vote of the precinct.

[2] The first question to be determined is whether the trustees were justified in casting out the vote of precinct A. They were not. The city attorney's advice to them in that regard is indefensible. The roster kept at an election precinct is in the charge of the precinct officials. It is their duty to require electors to sign it, and neither the vote of a nonsigning elector nor that of the precinct is invalidated by their failure to discharge that duty. Hayes v. Kirkwood, 136 Cal. 396, 69 Pac. 30; Starkweather v. Dawson, 14 Cal. App. 666, 112 Pac. 736; People v. Butler, 20 Cal. App. 379, 129 Pac. 600. The showing of the tally list and of the certificate of the election officers controlled the showing made by the roster.

Notwithstanding the palpable fact that the electors of Sawtelle have indicated a desire that their municipality be consolidated with Los Angeles, we are confronted with the question whether we can relieve them from an apparent showing of record that their desire is exactly the reverse. The respondents contend that the board of trustees has exhausted its functions as a canvassing body, and that mandate will not issue to compel its further action in that behalf. The action taken by the trustees in their canvass of votes is shown by their minutes. In them mention is made of precincts 3 and 5. These were really consolidated for the election in question and constituted the precinct we have called precinct A. This is the showing made by the minutes, and the recital presents everything that the trustees did in the premises:

> "The board canvassed the returns of the annexation election. In precinct No. 3 a discrepancy was found, the number of names on the roster falling short by 3 of the number of names on the polling list and of the number of ballots cast. The city attorney said the law required that these must agree, and that only such number be reported as were found on the roster of voters. Gledhill and Aldrich moved that precincts Nos. 3 and 5 be thrown out owing to the fact that the official roster did not correspond with the tally sheets or the number of votes reported, as required by the Supreme Court of the state. The vote stood: Walker, Gledhill, Aldrich, and Haas voting 'Aye'; noes none; absent, one. The returns of the remaining precincts were then considered. They showed a total of 735 votes cast, of which 366 were yeas and 369 were nays."

[3] The contention of respondents is that the minutes show that the board acted upon the entire returns before them, that, accordingly, the work of the canvass was completed, and that nothing further can be required of the board by the mandate of this court. Section 2 of the act under which the election was held (Stats. 1913, p. 578) contains a provision requiring the legislative body of a city in which such an election takes place, at the time of its regular meeting next after the election, to meet and canvass the returns thereof. The section further provides:

> "Such canvass shall be completed at such meeting, if practicable, and in any event, as soon as practicable, avoiding adjournment or adjournments, until said canvass is completed."

This provision places no time limit upon the labors of the canvassing board. In effect, its only requirement is that the canvass be completed, and that the work be performed as soon as practicable. Did the respondents trustees complete the canvass of the votes of the Sawtelle election? They did not include the vote of precinct A in the result stated by them in their minutes. As we have seen, that vote was properly cast and was a legal and necessary part of the entire vote of the city, from which the choice of the electors was to be determined. In rejecting the vote of the precinct the trustees assumed to decide a legal question and decided it wrongly, acting, of course, upon the advice of the city attorney. They tabulated and added together a part of the vote and rejected a part which was equally unimpeachable as a declaration of the choice of a considerable body of the electorate. Under such circumstances the conclusion seems inevitable that their work of canvassing was not completed and that it yet remains undone.

[4] The question now left to be determined is: Will our mandate issue to require the completion of the canvass? It is conceded that the statute of the state providing for election contests has no application to an election such as the one with which we are now concerned. That being so, it would seem that mandate is the proper remedy for the situation here disclosed. We will naturally be diligent to discover some remedy for the existing ill, as it is shocking to a sense of justice to contemplate the possibility of a considerable electorate being disfranchised through the action of a canvassing board and of the result of an election being finally declared by such board to be the opposite of the true result.

The courts of California have spoken on questions closely related to the present one. The respondents rely upon Gibson v. Twaddle, 1 Cal. App. 126, 81 Pac. 727. That case was like the present in some of its particulars. There a board of supervisors had refused to canvass the returns of a certain precinct, but had tabulated those of all the other precincts in the county. The court was asked to require the supervisors, by mandate, to include the returns from the omitted precinct. The writ was refused, but upon the express grounds that the supervisors had concluded the canvass by certifying that one of the parties to the controversy had been elected to the office in question, that his certificate of election had been issued to him, and that section 1111 et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure, as to election contests, provided a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy for the petitioner. It is true that there is some general language in the opinion which, upon a cursory reading, seems opposed to the view of the petitioners in this proceeding, A careful study of the case, however, convinces that it does not really so stand in opposition. The case of Cerini v. De Long, 7 Cal. App. 398, 94 Pac. 582, is authority for resort to the remedy by mandate in such a case as the present. There the canvassing board declared an election void, refused to canvass any part of the vote, and ordered a new election. The board was required, by mandate, to make the canvass. People v. Murphy, 20 Cal. App. 398, 129 Pac. 603, deserves mention in this connection. There the writ of mandate was refused in a case in which it was asked for the purpose of requiring a canvassing board to disregard a certificate of election and to canvass returns solely upon the showing made by the tally lists; but much of the language of the opinion is favorable to the use of the writ where a plain case of violation of duty, with a consequent injury to the rights of the electorate, is shown. People v. Butler, 20 Cal. App. 379, 129 Pac. 600, is authority, in general, for the use of the writ of mandate to compel a canvassing board to perform its duty.

A peremptory writ of mandate will issue as prayed for.

JAMESON et al. v. CHANSLOR-CANFIELD MIDWAY OIL CO. (STRASSBURGER, Intervener). (L. A. 3968.)

1. MINES AND MINERALS ⟹77—LEASE—FORFEITURE — PARTIES — "CREATED" — "RESERVED."

Under Civ. Code, § 1431, providing that a right created in favor of several persons is presumed to be joint, and not several, which presumption can be overcome only by express words to the contrary, the right, under oil and gas leases executed by three parties as lessors, to declare the leases void at their election on the lessee's failure to perform any of the conditions under the leases for 30 days after notice by the lessors to perform such conditions, was a right "created," and not a right "reserved," in favor of the lessors jointly; so that a notice by two of the lessors requiring the lessee to perform such conditions on penalty of forfeiture and a subsequent notice of forfeiture and demand for possession was not effective to declare a forfeiture.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Create; Reserve.]

2. MINES AND MINERALS ⟹77—OIL AND GAS LEASE—FORFEITURE—STATUTE.

A provision in oil and gas leases that the lessee's failure to perform any of the conditions for 30 days after notice to perform given by the lessor should render the leases void on the lessor's election, amounted to a condition subsequent on the happening of which the leases should become forfeited, and was governed by Civ. Code, § 1442, providing that a condition involving a forfeiture shall be strictly interpreted against the party for whose benefit it is created.

3. EVIDENCE ⟹448 — PAROL EVIDENCE — MODIFICATION OF CONTRACT—ACTS OF PARTIES.

Where the terms of a contract are clear, and there is no latent ambiguity, it cannot be varied by the subsequent conduct of the parties or by circumstances; as the parties must be deemed to be bound by such contract, regardless of the result produced.

4. MINES AND MINERALS ⟹77—NOTICE OF FORFEITURE—STATUTE.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1161, subd. 3, requiring notices served in actions of forcible entry and detainer to be in writing, and to require performance of the conditions or covenants or the possession of the property, a notice requiring the lessee in oil and gas leases to perform the conditions of the leases, containing nothing concerning possession of the property, and a notice of forfeiture and demand of possession not requiring performance were defective under the strict construction to be given the statute in the case of a forfeiture.

5. MINES AND MINERALS ⟹77 — LEASE — BREACH OF CONDITION—FORFEITURE.

Under oil and gas leases providing that, if the lessee failed to do the annual assessment work upon any unpatented mining claim prior to September 1st and to record the necessary proofs thereof for any year, the leases should be void as to such claims, and that money expended by the lessee should be regarded as in full rental of such claims, under which the lessee obtained patents for 6,000 acres of an 8,000-acre tract, a breach of such provision as to remainder did not justify a forfeiture of the lease upon the part upon which the patents were issued, or a judgment for its possession.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. E. Prewett, Judge.

Action to quiet title by J. W. Jameson and T. J. Wrampelmeier against the Chanslor-Canfield Midway Oil Company; I. Strassburger, intervener. Judgment for plaintiffs, motion for new trial denied, and defendant appeals. Judgment and order reversed.

See, also, 173 Cal. 612, 160 Pac. 1066.

E. W. Camp, of Los Angeles, Oscar Sutro, of San Francisco, and M. W. Reed and U. T. Clotfelter, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. Waters & Goodcell, of San Bernardino, James F. Farraher, of Bakersfield, and Heney, Farraher & Johnson, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, J. This is an action by the plaintiffs to quiet their title against the alleged claims of the defendant to an undivided three-fourths interest in some 8,000 acres of land. The complaint alleges that the plaintiffs are the owners of said interest in the land, that the defendant, without right, claimed an interest therein adverse to plaintiffs, and prayed that the title of the plaintiffs be quieted and for general relief. The answer admits that the plaintiffs are the owners of an undivided three-fourths of the land, subject to certain rights of the defendant, and alleges that the defendant holds the land and is entitled to possession thereof under certain oil leases executed by the plaintiffs and I. Strassburger, the intervener, as lessors, and duly assigned to defendant.

The court made findings and gave judgment in favor of the plaintiffs. Defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

The execution of the leases referred to in the answer and the assignments thereof to the defendant are conceded. The plaintiffs' action is based upon the theory that the leases were forfeited prior to the beginning of the action, and that the defendant was in possession at that time without right. The only proposition which we find it necessary to determine is the question whether or not the leases held by the defendant have been terminated by the notices given to the defendant by the plaintiffs.

The leases contain covenants whereby the lessees agreed to drill wells for oil and gas upon the land, do the annual assessment work, and take the steps necessary to acquire patents to the lessors for the land from the United States, operate pumps to obtain from the land oil and gas, and pay to the plaintiffs a royalty thereon. These agreements, except one, extended for a period of 30 years and granted to the lessees the possession of the land for all the purposes necessary to enable them to perform the stipulations of the lease on their part.

The main controversy arises upon four leases. Two of them were executed on September 6, 1900, one on September 28, 1901, and the fourth on October 1, 1901. All of these leases contain a paragraph numbered XII, which is as follows:

> "It is especially agreed by said parties of the second part that failure upon their part to perform any of the conditions embodied herein for a period of thirty days after notification by the parties of the first part to perform such conditions shall render this agreement null and void if said first parties shall so elect."

These leases were executed by J. W. Jameson, T. J. Wrampelmeier, and I. Strassburger, as lessors, except one which was executed by the Midway Oil Company, the entire capital stock of which was owned by said persons, who also, it appears, owned the land covered thereby. By subsequent transactions the said individuals were recognized as the real lessors, the corporation acting as their agent in making the lease. Except as stated in paragraph XII, the leases contained no provision for a forfeiture, or for a reentry by the lessors. There is one unimportant exception which will be hereinafter noticed. On September 25, 1911, Wrampelmeier and Jameson served on the defendant a notice referring to the aforesaid paragraph XII of the leases and to the implied covenants of the leases and requiring the defendant, within 30 days after service of the notice, to perform each and every of the conditions embodied in each of the said leases, setting forth the particulars thereof, and stating that the failure of the defendant to perform any of said conditions for a period of 30 days after service of notice would render the said leases, respectively, null and void, and that in that event said Wrampelmeier and Jameson would elect to terminate the said leases because of said failure.

Thereafter, on December 6, 1911, Wrampelmeier and Jameson served upon the defendant a notice and demand, referring to the previous notice of September 25, 1911, and declaring that because of the failure of the defendant to perform the conditions embodied in said leases and mentioned in said notice, and each and every of them, within the 30 days thereafter, said Wrampelmeier and Jameson did thereby elect to declare said leases null and void and to terminate the same, and they thereby demanded of the defendant that it immediately surrender possession unto them all of said property and every part thereof and cease to occupy or use the same. Three days thereafter, to wit, on December 9, 1911, they began the present action.

The two plaintiffs owned a three-fourths interest in the land, and Strassburger owned a one-fourth interest. The judgment of the court purports to quiet the title of the plaintiffs to their three-fourths interest in the lands. It contains a provision declaring that Strassburger was, and still is, the owner of an undivided one-fourth interest as tenant in common with the plaintiffs, and that said one-fourth interest of Strassburger still remains subject to the leases of the defendant which the court declared had been forfeited as between the two plaintiffs and defendant. The judgment also provides that the plaintiffs shall have a writ of possession for the three-fourths interest adjudged to belong to them as against the defendant.

[1, 2] The defendant insists that under paragraph XII of the leases it was not within the power of two of the lessors to declare a forfeiture of the leasehold interest, and that such forfeiture could be declared only by the joint or concurrent act of all the lessors. We are of the opinion that this proposition must be sustained.

The case comes clearly within the provisions of section 1431 of the Civil Code. It reads as follows:

> "An obligation imposed upon several persons, or a right created in favor of several persons, is presumed to be joint, and not several, except in the special cases mentioned in the title on the interpretation of contracts. This presumption, in the case of a right, can be overcome only by express words to the contrary."

The "special cases" referred to in this section have no bearing upon the present question, nor does the clause relating to "an obligation imposed" affect the case.

As applied to this case, the section is to be read as follows:

> "A right created in favor of several persons is presumed to be joint and not several. This presumption can be overcome only by express words to the contrary."

The plaintiffs contend that this section has no application to the case, because, as they say, the right existing by reason of paragraph XII of the leases is not a right "created" in favor of the lessors, but is a right "reserved" to them. With this we cannot agree. The paragraph does not reserve to the lessors a part of the estate included in the grant to the lessees, but merely prescribes a mode for the termination of that estate upon a breach of conditions. This right did not exist and would not have existed, but for the insertion of this clause in the lease. 1 Taylor on Landlord & Tenant, § 290. The word create means "to bring into being." Webster's Dic. Words are to be construed according to the approved usage of the language. Civ. Code, § 13. The word "create" is an appropriate term to describe a right which is brought into being by a provision of a contract. It is strictly in accordance with approved usage to say that this right to declare a forfeiture was "created" by the contract, and as it was created "in favor of several persons," and there are no words, express or otherwise, declaring it to be a several right, it follows that, even if it is not, because of its nature, a joint right of all the lessors, it becomes so by force of this section of the Civil Code.

The effect of paragraph XII and of a notice and declaration by the lessors availing themselves thereof would be to cause a forfeiture of the interest of the lessees. The paragraph, in effect, states a condition subsequent, upon the happening whereof the estate of the lessees shall become forfeited. The construction of such a provision is governed by the rule laid down in section 1442 of the Civil Code:

> "A condition involving a forfeiture must be strictly interpreted against the party for whose benefit it is created."

The intention of this provision was to enable the lessors to procure a strict and faithful performance of the provisions of the leases, or, on failure to do so, to retake the property from the lessees, and therefore it was for the benefit of the lessors and is to be strictly interpreted against the lessors. 1 Underhill on Landlord & Tenant, p. 625, § 391.

It is not necessary to resort to strict construction, however, to reach the conclusion that the forfeiture here provided for can be brought about only by the joint action of all of the lessors. The event which causes the forfeiture is the failure of the lessee to perform any of the conditions embodied in the lease for a period of 30 days after a notification. By the language of the paragraph this notification must be given "by the parties of the first part." It is only upon the giving of this notice and the failure to perform the conditions mentioned therein that the forfeiture can be declared. This is the condition which must happen in order to give a right to declare the forfeiture. The condition cannot be said to have happened upon notification given by some of the parties of the first part or any number of them less than all. After the notification has been given by all of the parties a forfeiture may be brought about only "if said first parties shall so elect." Here again the action of all of said first parties is necessary to the happening of the condition. It is argued that the only purpose of the notification was to give information to the lessee, and that this could be given as well by notice from one of the parties as from all. But the contract measures the rights of the parties in this respect, and, being a contract regarding a forfeiture and to be strictly construed, its requirements must be fully met before the right depending thereon can be complete.

Many reasons might be given for the requirement, which it is to be presumed the parties of the second part insisted upon, that the three lessors should unite in such proceedings for a forfeiture. The condition brought about by this judgment is a good illustration of a very important reason. While the respective lessors each owned an interest in the property as tenants in common and each for the purposes of the lease granted to the lessee his individual interest, yet the lessee thereby acquired a lease-hold interest in the entire estate. The purposes of the lease clearly indicate that this was one of the inducing causes for the acceptance of the lease by the lessees. A well for the production of oil bored upon a tract of land is as beneficial to one tenant in common, according to his interest, as to another. It cannot be supposed that the lessee would have been willing to have made the development work here necessary, expending therein somewhere near $1,000,000 in so doing, upon a lease from one or two of three tenants in common. The result would have been that the tenants in common not joining in the lease would have had an equal common right with the lessee to the oil produced. The present judgment, if valid, makes the plaintiffs and the defendant, with respect to the wells and the possession of the land for the purpose of producing oil, tenants in common, notwithstanding the forfeiture. By the terms of the leases the defendant is bound to continue the drilling and operation of wells on the land and the production of oil therefrom. By the judgment it remains bound to do so in favor of Strassburger, and the plaintiffs will be entitled to three-fourths of the oil extracted and be under no obligation to defendant except that which arises from the common-law duty of a tenant in common to make contribution. The plaintiffs would also have an equal right to operate the wells. It is clear that the parties never intended to enter into a contract which would bring about such consequences. Such construction is not only contrary to the axiomatic rule of section 1442 of the Civil Code that "a condition involving a forfeiture must be strictly interpreted against the party for whose benefit it is created," but in view of the nature and objects of the contracts of lease it would be entirely unreasonable and absurd.

If this, as respondent contends, places any two of the lessors at the mercy of the other, it only does that which was intended by the terms of the contract, and they cannot complain unless for fraud or mistake, of which there is no claim. We are not dealing with the rights and remedies secured to the lessors by force of the law, but with the rights which they secured to themselves by the provisions of their contract. They attempted to lay the foundation for a forfeiture by proceeding under their contract which requires the joint action of all the lessors to accomplish that result. The contract does not permit it to be done by less than all of the lessors.

[3] We perceive no force in the argument that the conduct of the parties subsequent to the execution of the lease gives evidence of their understanding that the right in question was several and not joint. It may have happened frequently in the dealings between the parties that one of the lessors has acted for all, either by express authority or by acquiescence and consent. Such conduct has little significance in the interpretation of a contract. It is sufficient to say, however, that where the terms of the contract are clear and explicit, where the meaning is not doubtful and there is no latent ambiguity, it cannot be varied by the subsequent conduct of the parties or surrounding circumstances. The parties must be deemed to be bound by such contract, regardless of the results produced.

This view of the effect of the contract is supported by abundant authority both in this state and elsewhere. In Randol v. Scott, 110 Cal. 590, 42 Pac. 976, a covenant by "said lessees" not to permit an assignment of the lease to be made by bankruptcy or otherwise, without the written consent of the lessors, was held not to be violated by the filing of a petition in insolvency by one of the lessees and the resulting transfer of his interest in the leasehold to an assignee. The court said that:

> "The meaning of the parties is presumed to be that the lease should not be assigned in the only way in which it could have been assigned, namely, by the joint act of the lessees."

So in Spangler v. Spangler, 11 Cal. App. 322, 104 Pac. 995, the covenant was that "the lessees" should not "assign the lease without the written consent of the lessors under penalty of forfeiture." It was held that an assignment by one of the lessees only was not a breach of the covenant. In Calvert v. Bradley, 16 How. (57 U. S.) 596, 14 L. Ed. 1066, there was a lease by several tenants in common with a covenant by the lessee to keep the premises in repair. It was held to be a joint covenant and that all must join in an action for a breach of it. The court said:

> "So far as the reservation and payment of rent to the covenantees, according to their several interests, made a part of the lease, the contract was several. * * * But in this same lease there is a covenant between the proprietors and the lessee, that the latter shall keep the premises in good and tenantable repair, and shall return the same to those proprietors in the like condition, and it is upon this covenant or for the breach thereof that the action of the plaintiffs has been brought. Is this a joint or several covenant? It has been contended that it is not joint, because the stipulations are with the several covenantees jointly and severally. But the answer to this position is this: Are not all the covenantees interested in the preservation of the property demised, and is any one or a greater portion of them exclusively or separately interested in its preservation? And would not the dilapidation or destruction of that property inevitably affect and impair the interests of all, however it might and necessarily would so affect them in unequal amounts? It would seem difficult to imagine a condition of parties from which an instance of joint interests could stand out in more prominent relief."

Substantially the same reasons exist here with respect to the covenants to bore wells, develop oil and other minerals, and store the same, protect the property from liens, and do the assessment work necessary to keep the mining locations alive. These are the most important of the things mentioned in the notice to perform. And even stronger reasons exist, as we have shown, for holding that the right created in the lessors by paragraph XII is joint, where giving it that effect serves to protect the tenant in possession not only from a partial forfeiture, but also from a sort of tenancy that could not reasonably have been intended or contemplated. See, also, Foley v. Addenbrock, 4 Q. B. 197; Kitchin v. Buckley, 1 Levinze, 109; Bradburne v. Botfield, 14 Mees & W. 559; Thompson v. Hakewill, 19 C. B. [N. S.] 713; Clapp v. Pawtucket, 15 R. I. 494, 8 Atl. 697, 2 Am. St. Rep. 915.

Some of the authorities above cited involved the question of the right of tenants in common to sue severally for the breach of a covenant running to all of them jointly, and not to the right of less than all to declare a forfeiture, or re-enter for such breach. In this state it may be that the rule has been changed by statute with regard to the necessity for the joinder of all the co-owners in such actions. In the early history of the state it was held that tenants in common "must sue severally in real actions, generally (the case was ejectment), as they all have separate titles." Johnson v. Sepulbeda, 5 Cal. 151; Throckmorton v. Burr, 5 Cal. 400. These decisions were made in the year 1855. In 1857 the Legislature passed the act, now incorporated into the Code of Civil Procedure as section 384, providing that all the tenants in common, or any number less than all, may jointly or severally sue "for the enforcement or protection of the rights of such party." Stats. 1857, p. 62. The Code also provides that "those who are united in interest must be joined as plaintiffs or defendants." Code Civ. Proc. § 382. In the case of a joint right created in favor of tenants in common by the covenants of a lease made by them it may be a matter of doubt, under these sections, whether they may sue severally or whether all must join. In Johnson v. Sepulbeda, supra, and in Parke v. Kilham, 8 Cal. 79, 68 Am. Dec. 310, it was said that the necessity for the joinder of all depends on the nature of the injury to the common property, or of their interest in the thing in controversy. But the cases first cited settled the question of the nature of a covenant or right such as that here involved, and whatever may be the statutory rule regarding the right of each to sue severally after a forfeiture has been declared in the manner prescribed by the contract, it is plain from these decisions that a right given to several lessors, by a contract of lease, to declare a forfeiture for breaches of the character here involved must be exercised by all and cannot be exercised by less than all.

[4] The notice of September 25, 1911, requiring performance of the conditions of the leases expressly states that it is predicated, not alone upon paragraph XII of the leases, but also upon subdivision 3 of section 1161 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It may be, in view of section 384, Code of Civil Procedure, above mentioned, that if a forfeiture had taken place in favor of several tenants in common in pursuance of a notice under section 1161, either of them might maintain an action of unlawful detainer under the latter section. Perhaps, also, section 384 would require the court to hold that either of the tenants in common could, under section 1161, produce a forfeiture, as in that section provided, by giving a separate notice. This again would raise the question whether it would be a forfeiture of the entire estate, or only of the estate held under the common owner who gave the notice. The question would also arise whether, upon such statutory forfeiture, where, as here, the lease contains no provisions for a re-entry by the lessor, he could maintain ejectment, or an action to quiet title, or would be confined to the action of unlawful detainer which section 1161 was designed to sustain, and in which special authority is given by section 1179 for relief to the tenant after judgment, in case of hardship. Section 791 of the Civil Code provides for a re-entry and forfeiture by giving the notice provided in section 1161, Code of Civil Procedure, in all cases where the right of re-entry is given by the lease. As none is given by these leases, section 791 has no application and the lessors have no rights, except such as are given by paragraph XII of the lease and by said section 1161. But it is unnecessary to decide these questions. The plaintiffs' notice does not conform to the requirements of section 1161. The notice prescribed in subdivision 3 is a "notice in writing, requiring the performance of such conditions or covenants, or the possession of the property." The notice of September 25, 1911, required performance of the conditions, but contained nothing concerning possession of the property. The notice and demand for possession served on December 6, 1911, did not require performance, and it did not give any time, but demanded immediate possession. Neither of the notices was a compliance with the statutory provisions. It cannot be disputed that proceedings of this character, involving, as they do, the forfeiture of valuable estates for years, a thing not favored by the law, must conform substantially to every material requirement of the statute by which they are authorized. Opera House Ass'n v. Bert, 52 Cal. 471. Statutes of this character are looked upon by the courts in the same light as contracts providing for forfeiture. Concerning the latter it has been said:

> "It has always been considered that it was necessary to restrain it to the most technical limits of the terms and conditions upon which the right is to be exercised," and that "covenants of this description are construed by courts of law with the utmost jealousy to prevent the restraint from going beyond the express stipulation." Randol v. Scott, 110 Cal. 596, 42 Pac. 977.

The plaintiffs acquired no rights under section 1161.

[5] The statement that the leases create no right of re-entry, except as set forth in paragraph XII, requires some explanation. Paragraph IV provides that, if the lessees fail on their part, to do the assessment work upon any unpatented mining claim prior to September 1st and record the necessary proofs thereof for any year, the lease "shall be null and void as to such claims and all moneys expended by" the lessees upon such claims "shall be regarded as full rental of such claims till that date." It is questionable whether this provides for a re-entry upon such unpatented claims. But it appears that patents were obtained for 6,000 acres of the land. It is obvious, therefore, that a breach of this stipulation as to the remainder would not justify a forfeiture of the lease upon the part for which the patents were issued and could not justify the judgment for the possession of the same.

These conclusions render it unnecessary to consider the other points presented in the case. The attempt of the plaintiffs to forfeit the estate of the lessee as tenant in possession under the leases was ineffectual. Consequently there is no foundation for the action or for the judgment.

The judgment and order are reversed.

HANNAH v. CANTY et al. (Sac. 2330.)

1. TRUSTS 🔑372(3)—PURCHASERS FROM TRUSTEE—NOTICE OF INTEREST—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action to declare a trust in lands in favor of plaintiff, evidence held to support findings that defendants never acquired any interest in the lands as bona fide purchasers from the alleged trustee, and that each had full notice and knowledge of plaintiff's rights in the land at the times of conveyance to them.

2. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS 🔑39(11), 182(1)—STATUTE APPLICABLE — ACTION TO ESTABLISH TRUST IN LANDS—PLEADING.

Code Civ. Proc. § 343, limiting actions not hereinbefore provided for, is the only statute of limitations applicable to an action to establish a trust in lands, though it asks an accounting as incidental to the action; and, such statute not having been pleaded, the court was justified in finding the cause was not barred.

3. TRIAL 🔑396(3)—RESPONSIVE FINDING.

In an action to establish a trust in lands, a finding that neither defendant was ever in actual possession and occupation of the land in controversy was properly responsive to defendants' plea of adverse possession.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1071(1)—HARMLESS ERROR—FINDING.

A finding that the legal title to the land was held by defendants in trust, if a conclusion of law, was harmless to defendants.

5. TRIAL 🔑404(3)—FINDING OF FACT—CONCLUSION OF LAW.

The finding that the legal title to the lands was held by defendants in trust was a finding of ultimate fact, not a conclusion of law.

6. TRUSTS 🔑99—SUIT TO ESTABLISH—SALE OF LANDS.

Where plaintiff and a defendant agreed that plaintiff should select timber lands and defendant furnish the price for them, and that, after deducting the price and expenses and taxes, together with interest, the sums realized from the sales or issues of the property should be equally divided between plaintiff and defendant, plaintiff could maintain a suit to establish a trust in the lands before sale thereof by defendant.

7. TRUSTS 🔑108—EVIDENCE OF TRUST—DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE.

In an action against husband and wife to establish a trust in lands, a document comprising an acknowledgment of plaintiff's interest in the lands, which defendant wife refused to sign, though not prepared by her, being merely part of a declaration to her by plaintiff's agent eliciting the reply that she had no interest in any timber lands that she knew of, was admissible as part of her conversation with plaintiff's agent.

8. EVIDENCE 🔑283—DECLARATIONS AGAINST INTEREST.

In an action to establish a trust in lands, recitals in a quitclaim deed from a defendant's brother to defendant's wife, the other defendant, the deed being dated and acknowledged nearly six months after the commencement of the action, were not admissible as declarations against interest, the brother admittedly having no interest in the property when they were made.

9. EVIDENCE 🔑283 — UNSWORN DECLARATIONS.

Recitals in a quitclaim deed, not being the best evidence of the purported facts, and amounting at best to unsworn declarations of one not a witness, were properly excluded in an action to establish a trust in land.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Action by J. A. Hannah against D. J. Canty and Laura A. Canty. From a judgment for plaintiff, and order denying their motion to set aside and vacate such judgment, defendants appeal. Judgment and order affirmed.

Royle A. Carter, of Fresno, and William A. Barnhill, of Los Angeles, for appellants. Hannah & Miller and Maurice E. Power, all of Visalia, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. The purpose of this action was to declare a trust in certain lands in favor of plaintiff and incidentally that an accounting should be had between the parties to the action. The nature of the litigation is discussed in the opinion of the District Court of Appeal in Hannah v. Canty, 1 Cal. App. 225, 81 Pac. 1035, given upon the sustaining of the order of the lower court denying a motion for change of place of trial. At the trial plaintiff was successful, and defendants appeal from the judgment and from an order denying their motion to set aside and vacate said judgment.

The court found that in 1890 plaintiff and D. J. Canty entered into an agreement whereby Hannah undertook to find, examine, and select certain valuable timber lands, and Canty promised to furnish the purchase price for such properties, together with the necessary expenses of acquiring title to them; that there was also a mutual agreement that after deducting the purchase price and amounts paid for expenses and for taxes on the land by Canty, together with interest at an agreed rate, the sums realized from the sales or issues of the property should be equally divided between the plaintiff and D. J. Canty; that in pursuance of this agreement Hannah bought certain valuable timber lands in Tulare county, D. J. Canty advancing the purchase price and necessary expenses; that title to this property was taken in the name of D. J. Canty; and that on January 2, 1892, D. J. Canty executed and delivered to plaintiff a certain instrument in writing which is set out in full in the findings. By this writing Canty acknowledged and declared that J. A. Hannah was entitled to one-half of the selling price, rents, issues, and profits of 701.12 acres of land in Tulare county which is particularly described, after first deducting from said selling price, rents, issues, profits, and proceeds, together with interest at 12 per cent. per annum, certain enumerated sums advanced at given dates and all taxes on said lands paid by Canty, with interest at the same rate. This instrument, as the court found, was never acknowledged so as to entitle it to be recorded. The writing, according to the findings, truly described the land purchased under the original agreement, and correctly specified the sums furnished by Canty thereunder. The court also found as follows:

> "That afterwards the said D. J. Canty executed a deed purporting to convey said lands to his brother, J. M. Canty, and thereafter the said J. M. Canty, by said D. J. Canty as his attorney in fact, executed a deed purporting to convey said lands to the defendant Laura A. Canty. That whatever interest, if any, was acquired by said J. M. Canty, and said Laura A. Canty, or either of them, under the said deeds or either of them, was acquired without valuable consideration, and with full notice and knowledge of the said rights of plaintiff in the said lands."

There were further findings to the effect that the lands are of the value of $25,000; that D. J. Canty pretends that said lands belong to his wife, defendant Laura A. Canty; that on September 26, 1902, said Laura A. Canty for the first time denied and repudiated the trust as to said lands existing in favor of plaintiff; that plaintiff had offered to pay into court one-half of all sums found due upon an accounting for advances and taxes with interest, under the terms of the agreement with D. J. Canty upon the execution of a sufficient conveyance of an undivided one-half interest in the lands; and that plaintiff's cause of action is not barred by the provisions of subdivision 2 of section 336, nor by section 337, nor by subdivisions 1 or 4 of section 338, nor by subdivision 1 of section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure. There were very elaborate findings, to the effect that neither J. M. Canty nor Laura A. Canty had paid any consideration for the property; that neither had ever been in possession of it; that the taxes were paid by D. J. Canty during all the time the land was nominally owned by his brother J. M. Canty or his wife; that J. M. Canty had expressly disclaimed ownership; and that Laura A. Canty had never known of a purported conveyance to her until informed of it by H. T. Miller on September 26, 1902. Other findings relate to and declare untrue certain matters of defense set up by D. J. and Laura A. Canty.

[1] Appellants first attack those findings to the effect that neither J. M. Canty nor Laura A. Canty ever acquired any interest in the land as a bona fide purchaser, and that each had full notice and knowledge of the rights of plaintiff in the said lands at the times of the purported conveyances to them respectively. These findings are attacked upon the ground that they are not supported by the evidence. While the testimony, as might be expected, was conflicting, we are of the opinion that these findings are amply supported.

There is no dispute regarding the fact that defendant executed a deed of the property to his brother, and that this indenture was recorded about eight months after its purported execution; but plaintiff testified that after he learned of the recordation of the deed he had a conversation with J. M. Canty, in which the latter admitted that he had not bought the property. According to Mr. Hannah he said to J. M. Canty: "I see you have been buying some timber land." To this remark Mr. Canty replied, with a smile:

> "I have been buying nothing. Dan has played hell over there at Fresno, as usual, and had to put his property out of his hands. It stands as it always did, and it is fixed just so Dan can do what he likes with it."

On another occasion, as plaintiff testified, J. M. Canty said he had given D. J. Canty a power of attorney to do as he liked with the land; that he had not bought the property at all; but that D. J. Canty had simply put it in J. M. Canty's name to keep D. J. Canty's creditors from getting it. Plaintiff also stated under oath that many times prior to the date of the deed to J. M. Canty he had told the latter of his contract with D. J. Canty and their arrangements regarding the land. Before the time of the trial J. M. Canty had died. It is argued that plaintiff's statements regarding his conversations with a man long dead are entitled to small weight, but that giving them full value they do not show mala fides on the part of J. M. Canty in taking the land. We do not indorse this view. If J. M. Canty made the statements attributed to him by plaintiff, they showed his taking of the deed from his brother to have been a mere subterfuge. True it is that if the purported declarations of the grantee, given in evidence after his death, stood alone they might be regarded as of slight probative force, but other facts given in evidence which were uncontradicted and unexplained by defendants tend to support Mr. Hannah's version of his conversations with J. M. Canty. The defendant D. J. Canty continued to pay the taxes on the land while it was standing of record in the name of his brother and was assessed to the latter. Such payments were made through the agency of plaintiff at the request of D. J. Canty, who furnished the money. According to Hannah's testimony, J. M. Canty told him, early in 1895, that a power of attorney had been given D. J. Canty so that he could do as he liked with the land. The power of attorney under which D. J. Canty subsequently executed a deed from J. M. Canty to Laura A. Canty was acknowledged in 1898. Respondent's argument is this: While defendant could not contradict any testimony regarding J. M. Canty's declaration with reference to the earlier power of attorney, because of J. M. Canty's death, he could have denied the truth of the statement alleged to have been made by J. M. Canty if it were not true. This he failed to do. Another circumstance tending to support plaintiff's testimony is that after the deed from D. J. to J. M. Canty was executed, the former asked Hannah to find a purchaser for the land. This request, as Hannah testified, was made by a letter which he lost before the trial of the case took place. D. J. Canty did not explain the letter nor deny having written it. We have therefore, in support of the finding against the good faith of J. M. Canty's apparent acquisition of the property, Hannah's account of J. M. Canty's disclaimer of any real interest therein, the payment of taxes by D. J. Canty, and the interest which D. J. Canty took in the sale of the land evidenced by his request that Hannah attempt to dispose of it. Added to this is the fact that D. J. Canty himself offered in evidence a letter written to J. M. Canty, but given to D. J. Canty by his brother, in which a third party made inquiries looking to the renting of the property. Respondent's counsel ask with much force why this letter was turned over to D. J. Canty if he had ceased to be the owner of the land.

Another circumstance which tends to support both findings is found in the gross inadequacy of D. J. Canty's own account of the transfers of the title to his brother and from the latter to Laura A. Canty by a deed executed by her husband as his brother's attorney in fact. D. J. Canty said that his indebtedness to his brother was the consideration for the first deed, and that J. M. Canty's indebtedness to Laura A. Canty was the consideration for the second transfer, yet the testimony utterly fails to show that in either case any credit was given on such indebtedness by reason of the transfer, or that it was in any degree reduced by reason of the delivery of the deed. D. J. Canty as a witness stated that his brother had given him a power of attorney, so that he could sell or trade the timber land, and with the proceeds or as a result of the trade get a home for his (D. J. Canty's) family. Yet D. J. Canty, as attorney in fact, deeded the property to his wife, for an expressed consideration of $2,103, which, according to his statement, was intended as a partial set-off for a larger amount, between $3,000 and $4,000, owed Mrs. Canty by her brother-in-law. There is not one word of testimony to show that J. M. Canty knew of this transaction or authorized it, but there is evidence which tends to contradict D. J. Canty and to prove that Mrs. Canty knew nothing about the purported transfer of the property to her until long after it was made. Mr. H. T. Miller testified that in 1902 he went to see Mrs. Canty for the purpose of asking her to sign a certain document in acknowledgment of Mr. Hannah's interest in those lands, which in the interview were spoken of as "timber lands up on Tule river." She said: "Why I don't own any timber lands on Tule river." However, she refused to sign the document, disclaiming any interest in the property. Mrs. Canty did not appear as a witness at the trial, and Mr. Miller's testimony stands uncontradicted. The entire transaction was such that the court was fully justified under the evidence in making the two findings negativing the good faith of J. M. Canty and Laura A. Canty in the apparent acquisition of title to this land by them.

Appellants also object to the finding that Laura A. Canty first repudiated the trust on September 26, 1902. The testimony of Mr. Miller fixes that time as the date of her refusal to sign an acknowledgment of Hannah's interest. This was ample support for the finding.

[2] This was an action "to be regarded as having for its sole object to establish a trust in the lands and the accounting asked for, as merely incidental to the action." Hannah v. Canty, 1 Cal. App. 227, 81 Pac. 1035. Therefore the only statute of limitations applicable to actions of this character is section 343 of the Code of Civil Procedure. This section was not pleaded. Therefore the court was justified in finding that the cause of action was not barred.

[3] The court found also that neither J. M. Canty nor Laura A. Canty was ever in actual possession and occupation of the land in controversy. This was properly responsive to the plea of adverse possession made by defendants, but not supported by any offer of proof.

Another finding to which defendants object is one to the effect that plaintiff and D. J. Canty never agreed that the latter might sell the land at his option for such price or to such person as he might desire. This was in negation of certain of the allegations contained in the pleadings of the defendants. It is supported by the testimony appearing in the record.

[4, 5] The finding that the legal title to the land is held by defendants in trust is criticized as being in reality a conclusion of law. Even if this were conceded, we do not see that defendants or either of them would thereby suffer any harm. The finding, however, was one of ultimate fact.

[6] In various forms the contention is made that no suit may be maintained until the sale of the land by Canty, if indeed it be held in trust by defendants. In other words, it is argued that in any view of the case there can be no trust in the land itself in favor of plaintiff, but only in the proceeds after the sale. This argument is completely answered by the opinions in the cases of Green v. Brooks, 81 Cal. 328, 22 Pac. 849 (cited with approval by the District Court of Appeal on the former appeal in this case), and Donohoe v. Rogers, 168 Cal. 700, 703, 144 Pac. 958.

Other findings are attacked in the brief of appellants, but all of the material matters urged in that behalf have been treated in the foregoing discussion.

[7] Objection was made to the introduction in evidence of a document prepared for the signature of Mrs. Canty. This was the writing which she refused to sign, reference to which has been made heretofore in this opinion. The bases of the objections were that the writing was not binding upon defendants; that its introduction was an attempt to establish a trust by a document in the preparation of which defendants had no hand; and that it was a self-serving declaration of the plaintiff. This writing was offered at the court's suggestion as a part of the testimony of Mr. Miller. Its contents, of course, could not bind Mrs. Canty. It was merely a part of the declaration to her by Mr. Miller which elicited the reply that she had no knowledge of any deed executed by her husband as his brother's attorney in fact purporting to vest title to the timber lands in her. As a part of the conversation it was admissible. It merely showed, in connection with the rest of Mr. Miller's testimony, the nature of the demand made upon Mrs. Canty.

[8, 9] Defendants sought to introduce a quitclaim deed from J. M. Canty to Laura A. Canty for the declared purpose of showing a confirmation of the earlier deed purporting to have been made by him through his attorney in fact. The court admitted the instrument in evidence, but excluded numerous declarations in the deed regarding the source of the money with which the land was originally purchased, the alleged indebtedness of J. M. Canty to his sister-in-law and other things which defendants vainly endeavored to prove to the court's satisfaction in the trial of the case. The ruling excluding these declarations is assigned as error. The deed containing these recitals was dated and acknowledged April 4, 1903, nearly six months after the commencement of this action. They were not admissible as declarations against interest or otherwise. J. M. Canty admittedly had no interest in the property when they were made. The statements sought to be introduced were not against, but in favor of, the title of his successors. Moreover, they were not the best evidence of the purported facts recited by them, and they amounted, at best, to unsworn declarations of one not a witness. Such recitals were very properly excluded.

No other alleged errors merit analysis, discussion or comment.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

FULLER & TODD REALTY CO. v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR ALAMEDA COUNTY et al. (S. F. 8479.)

MORTGAGES 🔑571—RIGHT TO REVIEW OF JUDGMENT—PERSON NOT PARTY.

A judgment of foreclosure will not be reviewed at instance of one holding under junior mortgage recorded before notice of lis pendens, who was named as a party to action without being summoned, and was dismissed from it, since his interest is not affected thereby.

In Bank. Application by the Fuller & Todd Realty Company for writ of certiorari to be directed against the Superior Court in and for Alameda County and Hon. Fred V. Wood, judge thereof. Denied.

Fernhoff & Sevier and Cedric W. Petersen, of Pleasanton, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. Application for a writ of certiorari to review a judgment of foreclosure of mortgage in so far as it is claimed to affect petitioner, a junior mortgagee. The petitioner was originally made a party defendant, as one claiming some interest as purchaser or mortgagee, which interest was alleged to be subsequent to and subject to the lien of the mortgage sought to be foreclosed. Petitioner alleges that it was never served with summons, and never had notice of the action until the time for appeal from the judgment had expired.

The judgment given recites that the action was dismissed as to said petitioner, with the result that if its mortgage was recorded, as is alleged, prior to the recording on April 7, 1914, of the notice of lis pendens in the foreclosure action, the situation is precisely as it would have been if petitioner had never been a party to the action, and its interest as a mortgagee is in no way affected by the judgment of foreclosure or the sale thereunder. The judgment given, properly construed, does not purport to bar any one claiming under defendant Chase, whose interest in the premises was acquired prior to the filing for record of the notice of lis pendens on April 7, 1914, and was properly shown on the public records.

The application for a writ is denied.

MONO COUNTY v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION. (Sac. 2597.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑364—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT—"EMPLOYEE"—"HIRE" —"APPOINTMENT OF HIRE"—"APPOINTED" —"ELECTED."

The duly elected and qualified sheriff of Mono county was not an "employee," within Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 284) § 13, as amended by St. 1915, p. 1081, defining the term "employer" as the state, each county, etc., who has any person "in service under an appointment," etc., and section 14 as amended by St. 1915, p. 913, providing the term "employee," shall be construed to mean every person in the service of an employer, as defined by section 13, "under any appointment or contract of hire or apprenticeship," as he was not in service under an "appointment," the word "appointed" not being equivalent to "elected" or including both "appointed" and "elected," and the use of the word "hire" being in some degree indicative of an intention to exclude elective officers invested with a portion of the sovereign power of the government.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Appoint; Elect; Employee; Hire.]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑364—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT — RE-ENACTMENT — EXCLUSION OF EXCEPTION.

Although Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1911, p. 797, § 6), after defining the term "employee" as used in the present act (St. 1915, p. 913), expressly excluded from the definition any state or county officer, failure of the Legislature of 1913 to include in the present act the part excluding state and county officers did not evidence an intent that they should be included.

In Bank. Certiorari by Mono county against the Industrial Accident Commission to review an award made under the Workmen's Compensation Act for the death of James P. Dolan, sheriff of Mono county. Award annulled.

O. F. Hakes, Dist. Atty., of Bridgeport (Hartley F. Peart, of San Francisco, of counsel), for petitioner. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco (Warren H. Pillsbury, of Oakland, of counsel), for respondent. John D. Murphey, of Berkeley, and W. H. Metson, of San Francisco, amici curiæ.

SLOSS, J. James P. Dolan was the duly elected and qualified sheriff of Mono county. In July, 1915, he was called to a ranch where depredations had been committed. While looking for the offenders, he encountered two men, whom he accosted. They opened fire, and inflicted fatal wounds upon him. The commission made an award in favor of his widow and against the county. Upon the petition of Mono county, this court issued a writ of certiorari to review the award.

Assuming for the moment that the sheriff is an "employee" of the county within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1911, p. 796), we see no merit in the petitioner's contentions that the injuries received by Dolan did not arise out of or in the course of his employment, or that they were caused by his willful misconduct.

[1] The only question worthy of consideration is whether he was an "employee" within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act. The statute, as it read on July 26, 1915, contained these definitions:

> "Sec. 13. The term 'employer' as used in sections twelve to thirty-five, inclusive, of this act shall be construed to mean: The state, and each county, city and county, city, school district and all public corporations * * * therein, and every person, firm, voluntary association, and private corporation (including any public service corporation), who has any person in service under any appointment or contract of hire, or apprenticeship, express or implied, oral or written, and the legal representatives of any deceased employer. (St. 1915, p. 1081.)
> "Sec. 14. The term 'employee' as used in sections twelve to thirty-five, inclusive, of this act shall be construed to mean: Every person in the service of an employer as defined by section thirteen hereof under any appointment or contract of hire or apprenticeship, express or implied, oral or written, including aliens and also including minors, but excluding any person whose employment is both casual and not in the usual course of the trade, business, profession or occupation of his employer, and also excluding any employee engaged in farm, dairy, agricultural, viticultural or horticultural labor, in stock or poultry raising or in household domestic service." (St. 1915, p. 913).

Under these sections, the essential condition of the relation of employer and employee is "service under any appointment or contract of hire or apprenticeship." Does this language describe the status of an officer, like a sheriff, holding his office by virtue of an election, taking an official oath, giving an official bond, and having a tenure fixed by law? Certainly such an officer is not in service under any contract. "It is well settled that salaried public offices, created by the Legislature, are not held by contract." Miller v. Kister, 68 Cal. 142, 8 Pac. 813; Pennie v. Reis, 80 Cal. 266, 22 Pac. 176; Blynn v. City of Pontiac, 185 Mich. 35, 151 N. W. 681. Under the statute of Connecticut, which defines as employee "any person who has entered into or works under any contract of service or apprenticeship with an employer," it has been held that the sheriff is not an employee, because the relation "between him and the public is not the creature of contract, nor is the office itself a contract." Sibley v. State, 89 Conn. 682, 96 Atl. 161, L. R. A. 1916C, 1087.

The only other ground upon which the sheriff may be brought within the terms of our statute is that he is in service under an "appointment of hire." To so hold would, however, require us to read the word "appointed" as equivalent to "elected," or as including both "appointed" and "elected." There is a clear and well-understood distinction between appointment and election. In Wickersham v. Brittan, 93 Cal. 34, 28 Pac. 792, 29 Pac. 51, 15 L. R. A. 106, this court said:

> "The term 'election' carries with it the idea of a choice, in which all who are to be affected with the choice participate; whereas from the word 'appointment' we understand that the duties of the appointee are for others than those by whom he is appointed. As distinguished from an election, an appointment is generally made by one person, or by a limited number, acting with delegated powers, while an election is the direct choice of all the members of the body from whom the choice can be made."

Continuing, the court quoted with approval this expression from the opinion in Magruder v. Swann, 25 Md. 214: "No latitude of construction can justify the reading of 'elected' as the synonym of 'appointed.'" See, also, Conger v. Gilmer, 32 Cal. 75. Not only had the two words been defined judicially, but their distinctive meanings were commonly known when the Legislature enacted the Workmen's Compensation Act. We would not be justified in saying that the framers of the act intended to extend its scope beyond the fair and settled signification of the words employed. Furthermore, the use of the word "hire" in sections 13 and 14 is, in some degree, indicative of an intention to exclude elected officers invested with "a portion of the sovereign power of the government to be exercised * * * for the public good." Sibley v. State, supra. If the sheriff is covered by the terms of the act, there is no ground for excluding other officers, such as the governor, the attorney general, the justices of this court, judges of the superior court, district attorneys or the like. But such officers would hardly be said to be in service under any appointment or contract of hire. It is true that, in a sense, every office is an employment. U. S. v. Morris, 2 Brock, 103, Fed. Cas. No. 15,747. But the officer is not an employee, within the meaning of the statute, unless he is in service under an appointment or contract of hire. The state, and every governmental subdivision, employs many persons who fall within the terms of the definitions contained in sections 13 and 14. But the language of the act would have to be distorted from its true meaning to include in the definition of employees sheriffs and like elected officers.

[2] Attention is directed to the fact that the original employers' liability act (Stats. 1911, p. 797, § 6), after defining "employee" in the language used in section 14 of the present act, expressly excludes from the definition "any official of the state or of any county * * * who shall have been elected or appointed for a regular term of one or more years, or to complete the unexpired portion of such regular term." This exception is not incorporated in the act now in force. It is argued that, by expressly excluding elected officials, the Legislature of 1911 indicated its understanding that without such exception the general language would have included the excepted class. And, so the argument proceeds, when the Legislature of 1913, in reenacting the same general language in the new act, failed to exclude elected officers, it showed its intent that they should be covered by the law. It is, no doubt, the general rule that provisos or exceptions may be construed as indicating that, in their absence, the preceding general language would have covered the matter included in the proviso or exception. S. F. v. Pac. Tel. & Tel. Co., 166 Cal. 244, 251, 135 Pac. 971. But this mode of interpretation is not universal. "The limitation upon this rule is that it must not be carried too far, —that an exception from the general language of a statute is sometimes made out of an abundance of caution, and not to indicate that without the exception its subject-matter would come within the scope of the act." Tognazzini v. Jordan, 165 Cal. 19, 23, 130 Pac. 879, 881 (Ann. Cas. 1914C, 655). We think the statute of 1911 affords an appropriate illustration of the kind of cases to which this limitation is applicable. The fact that the Legislature took the precaution to except elected officers from the provisions of the act of 1911 is not a sufficient ground for stretching the preceding words ("in service under an appointment") to cover such officers. Still less reason is there for holding that the asserted meaning of the word "appointed" had become so fixed by the addition of the excluding clause that, when this word was incorporated in a new statute without the exception, it must still be given the enlarged meaning which, as is claimed, arose from the now omitted exception.

The amendment of 1915 to section 14 (Stats. 1915, p. 913), excluding from the definition of employee certain classes of deputies, was not in force at the time of Dolan's death. It can throw no light upon the proper interpretation of the section enacted in 1913. Furthermore, we do not think that the exception tends to show anything more than that, in its absence, deputies of clerks, sheriffs, or constables would be included in the definition of employees.

The award is annulled.

PURCELL v. FIRTH. (L. A. 3967.)

1. Brokers 🔑86(1)—Right to Commission.

In broker's action for commission for selling land, evidence held to support a recovery.

2. Brokers 🔑63(2)—Right to Commission—Contract—"Consummate."

Where the owner of land, on receiving an inquiry from realty brokers in the interest of a prospective purchaser, wrote the brokers stating his terms, and that he would pay the regular commission of 5 per cent. on the sale, "when the same is consummated," though "consummate" means to bring to completion, to finish, to perfect, to achieve, the brokers' commission was earned, though completion of the sale was prevented by failure of perfect title or by the mere will of the owner; the purchaser having been ready, willing, and able to meet his terms.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Consummate.]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by W. J. Purcell against Emil Firth. From judgment for plaintiff, and order denying his motion for new trial, defendant appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

Sheldon Borden and Richard J. Culver, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. Conkling & Brown and Eshleman & Swing, all of El Centro, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. W. J. Purcell, as assignee of Purcell-Sargent Land Company (a copartnership), sued successfully for a commission alleged to have been earned under a contract for the sale of real estate. Defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

It appears from the testimony that L. J. Rose, desiring to purchase a rancho in Imperial county known as "tract 85, township 15 south, range 15 east, S. B. M.," inquired of Purcell-Sargent Land Company regarding the price for which the property could be purchased. The land belonged to Emil Firth, a resident of Los Angeles. L. J. Rose, the prospective purchaser, was living in San Diego. The real estate agents resided in El Centro, Imperial county. On receiving the request for information regarding the land, Mr. Sargent, one of the partners, telephoned to Mr. Firth, who said he would accept $140 per acre for the ranch upon certain terms. When this information was communicated to Mr. Rose he deposited $1,000 with the agents. Subsequently, on the same day, April 12, 1913, Mr. Firth sent a telegram to the agents and also a letter. The following quotations from the latter writing give the terms of the proposed sale:

"Supplementing our telephone conversation, I enclose herewith copy of a night letter which I am sending you tonight, and which I herewith confirm.

"'Will take for tract eighty five forty-four thousand eight hundred dollars on terms of seventy five hundred cash, eighty six hundred fifty dollars one year, eighty six hundred fifty dollars two years, subject mortgage of twenty thousand dollars, as per phone. See letter mailed today. Wire if offer is accepted.'

"As stated in the message, I will take $44,800 or $140 per acre for the 320 acres, * * * on the following terms: $7,500 cash; $8,650 on or before one year and $8,650 on or before two years, with 7% interest payable semiannually, to be evidenced by notes and secured by trust deed on said property.

"I will pay you the regular commission of 5% on the sale when the same is consummated.

"My price on the land is $150 per acre, and this offer is made subject to immediate acceptance only. If you make the sale, have the purchaser deposit 10% of the purchase price, or all of the first payment, in the First National Bank in escrow, and have the bank wire me to that effect."

The letter also described in detail a mortgage on the land for $20,000 which the purchaser would have to assume in case a sale should be made. The sum of $1,000 paid by Mr. Rose before the receipt of the writings was turned over to the First National Bank, the escrow holder named in the letter from the owner of the land. This payment was made on the 14th of April, 1913, and appellant insists (while respondent denies) that the remaining $6,500 necessary to make up the sum of $7,500 specified in the letter as the amount of the first payment was never deposited with the bank in compliance with the contract. This contention of appellant is without merit. It is true that for some time the sum of $1,000 was all the money that the bank had received on behalf of Mr. Rose, but this was known to Mr. Firth, who made no objection, until the deficiency had been made up. Mr. Firth had deposited his deed in escrow as promised. In his letter to the bank dated April 17, 1913, he wrote, after giving his escrow instructions:

> "If you cannot comply with the foregoing instructions, please return all papers, together with $1,000 deposited with you by Mr. Rose for my account, less expense."

This, according to respondent, amounted to a waiver of any failure strictly to perform on the part of L. J. Rose, but in truth no waiver was necessary as no particular time had been fixed for the payment of the first installment. In a letter to the Purcell-Sargent Land Company, dated April 30, 1913, defendant did mention the fact that the amount deposited was not in compliance with the terms of the proposed sale, but he did not withdraw from the transaction at that time and indeed when he wrote the letter of April 30th the entire amount had been placed in the hands of the escrow holder and there it remained until after Mr. Firth had ordered that all of the papers be returned to him. Before defendant's repudiation of the agreement, Mr. Rose and his wife had executed and delivered to Mr. Firth's escrow agent the trust deed and notes necessary to carry out the purchaser's part of the agreement. The buyer was ready, able, and willing, as the court was justified in concluding from the evidence, to accept defendant's deed and to take the land subject to the mortgage. He entered upon the property and expended a considerable sum in preparing a part of the land for the planting of crops, but he abandoned further work of this sort when he discovered, through an abstract company's report, that there was an outstanding unrecorded lease to the land which would not expire until the middle of June, 1913. This cloud on the title had not been disclosed by the vendor in his letter setting forth the terms upon which he would dispose of the property. There was also a pending suit against Henderson, the lessee, by the owner, to foreclose a chattel mortgage, and the abstract company refused to certify a clear title because in the pleadings in that case the unrecorded lease was referred to. While it does not clearly appear whether or not Mr. Firth's attention was called to the specific objection to the title subject to the lease, by his letters to the bank dated May 3 and May 8, 1913, he declared that he would not complete the sale unless Mr. Rose was willing to take the land with such title as he was able to convey. That there was objection to the title he did know; that he had failed to disclose the existence of the lease in his letter to plaintiff's assignor was undoubtedly true; and the court was justified in believing that he had no intention of clearing the title.

[1] Under the foregoing facts, the court properly found that plaintiff's assignor in pursuance of its agreement did find and procure a buyer ready, willing, and able to purchase the property on the terms and conditions fixed by the owner, and that therefore the commission had been earned.

[2] There is no force in appellant's contention that the commission was to be paid only upon the passing and recording of a deed from Firth to Rose. Great stress is laid by appellant's counsel upon the language in the letter to the land company, "I will pay you the regular commission of 5% on the sale when the same is consummated." It is learnedly argued that since the word "consummate" means "to bring to completion, to finish, to perfect, to achieve," there could be no fee earned by the agent until the bargain had been executed beyond recall by both parties to the agreement. It is cheerfully conceded that ordinarily an agent earns the fee when he brings to the seller a purchaser willing and able to accept the offered transfer upon the stipulated terms, but counsel say that this is quite different from the usual contract. To this respondent's representatives reply that the words "regular commission" impart a promise to pay when the ordinary services for which real estate agents are hired have been performed. There can be no doubt that contracts may be and frequently are executed by the terms of which a real estate agent's commission is made to depend upon the actual sale of the property involved. We think that the contract before us, however, fairly interpreted, is not the sort of agreement which appellant would have us find it to be, but that it is a broker's and his client's usual arrangement for the payment of the former's compensation for securing a desirable buyer. It greatly resembles the writings considered by the District Court of Appeal in Shepherd-Teague Co. v. Hermann, 12 Cal. App. 394, 107 Pac. 622. The agent's claim in that case was based upon two written instruments executed by the defendant, in one of which the payment of a commission is promised "in the event this exchange is made" and in a modifying document a definite sum of money is specified as the amount to be paid "in the event the trade is consummated." No exchange of properties ever took place, yet the District Court of Appeal held that the agreement was the usual one between the intending seller of real property and his broker, such as is described and analyzed in such cases as Phelps v. Prusch, 83 Cal. 627, 23 Pac. 1111. It was justly decided that the language of the agent's authorization must be read in the light of the evident purpose of employing him, which was the securing of a valid and binding acceptance of his principal's offer; that having done this he had performed the only consummation within his power; and that the final consummation involved in the exchange of deeds was one over which the plaintiff had no control. In the case at bar the agent had not only procured a purchaser, but that buyer had partially executed the agreement of sale by meeting all of the proposals contained in the instructions of the intending seller to the holder of the documents in escrow. Clearly the fee had been earned.

Whether the sale was prevented by the failure of perfect title or by the mere will of the vendor makes no difference. In either case the compensation had been earned by the agent. Smith v. Schiele, 93 Cal. 144, 28 Pac. 857; Phelan v. Gardner, 43 Cal. 306–311; Justy v. Erro, 16 Cal. App. 519–522, 117 Pac. 575; Neilson v. Lee, 60 Cal. 555; Stanton v. Carnahan, 15 Cal. App. 527–529, 115 Pac. 339.

No other alleged errors merit discussion.

PALM v. PLANADA DEVELOPMENT CORP. (Sac. 2302.)

1. Appeal and Error 🔑1151(2)—Amount of Judgment—Reduction.

In an action on a common count for work and labor performed, a judgment for plaintiff for $20 more than was pleaded or proved must be reduced by such amount on appeal.

2. Stipulations 🔑14(12)—Construction.

In an action on a contract, plaintiff charged that defendant was bound to furnish plaintiff with $3,500 worth of work, and it only furnished work amounting to $3,106.62 to plaintiff's damage in the sum of $393.38. The court found that $493.38 was the difference between the amount of work which defendant was to furnish and the value of that which it furnished, and that such amount was stipulated by defendant's counsel to be the amount of the difference. The stipulation was not one to the effect that defendant had furnished only $3,006.62 worth of work, but was simply a stipulation that plaintiff "was entitled to receive" that sum for work done. Held, that the finding was not warranted.

3. Damages 🔑62(3)—Breach of Contract—Amount—Statute.

Under Civ. Code, § 3300, declaring that for breach of contract the measure of damages is the amount which will compensate for all detriment proximately caused thereby, and section 3358, declaring that no one can recover greater damages for a breach than he might have gained by the full performance, plaintiff could not recover $1,000 for time lost while waiting for defendant to perform his contract to furnish him work amounting to $3,500, on a showing that during that time he was obliged to refuse other offers for work which would have brought him a profit of more than $1,000.

Action by A. Palm against the Planada Development Corporation. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Modified, and affirmed.

Flint & Jutten and H. S. Mackay, Jr., all of Los Angeles, for appellant. Farrar & Mahon, of Merced, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff's complaint charged upon three causes of action. The following statement of them is sufficient for the consideration here to be had: Plaintiff had entered into a written agreement with defendant's predecessor, under which he was to dig for it a well a thousand feet deep, if necessary, to secure a flow of water satisfactory to defendant's predecessor. Thereafter defendant and plaintiff entered into an agreement substituted for the earlier one, whereby it was contemplated that plaintiff, instead of digging one well of a thousand feet depth, "will undertake the drilling of shallow wells * * * until the amount of $3,500 that would have become due and payable for aforesaid one thousand foot well shall have been made up." In his first cause of action plaintiff alleged that he had in the matter of digging these wells done work for which he had not been wholly paid. Upon the trial of this cause the court found that there was due to plaintiff for work thus actually performed the sum of $216.62, and this determination is accepted without question by appellant.

[1] The second cause of action was in effect a common count for $78.99 for work and labor performed by plaintiff in repairing a pump for defendant. This cause was somewhat inartificially stated. However, sufficient was alleged to pass general demurrer. Trial was had upon it, and the court found thereon. But in so finding it gave a judgment for $20 more than was pleaded or proved. The judgment must be reduced by this amount.

[2] The third cause of action charged in effect that defendant was bound, under its contract, to furnish plaintiff with $3,500 worth of work, but that in fact "plaintiff was only furnished by defendant sufficient work to aggregate to him the sum of $3,106.62." It is further alleged that by reason of this refusal plaintiff suffered damage: First, in the sum of $393.38; and, second, "in the further sum of $1,000 for time lost by plaintiff while waiting for defendant to furnish to plaintiff work sufficient to enable him, the said plaintiff, to perform the conditions of said contract by plaintiff thereunder to be performed." The court found that $493.38 was the difference between $3,500, the amount in value of the work which defendant was to furnish plaintiff, and the value of the amount of work which defendant actually did permit plaintiff to perform, and the findings declare that this amount "was stipulated by counsel for defendant in open court to be the exact amount of said difference." It will be remembered that the complaint itself charged this difference as being $393.38. The stipulation to which the court thus makes reference does not bear out the court's statement of its purport and effect. It was not a stipulation that defendant had furnished only $3,006.62 worth of work, but it was simply a stipulation that "the plaintiff was entitled to receive the sum of $3,006.62 for his work in digging or drilling three wells." This stipulation was made in reference to the trial of the first cause of action, and it is a stipulation only as to the amount which the plaintiff "was entitled to receive," and not at all as to the amount of value of the work which defendant had furnished. For aught that appears to the contrary, the amount which the plaintiff was entitled to receive might have been materially reduced by set-offs adjusted between the parties during the progress of the work. Clearly defendant is not bound by this stipulation in the trial of the third cause of action, and the only evidence upon the matter is that supporting plaintiff's pleading to the effect that that amount was $393.38. The court allowed four-fifths of the amount, or 80 per cent. of it, presumably as profits which would have accrued to plaintiff if the work had been given him to do. Accepting this basis for an estimate of the profits, plaintiff clearly was entitled to but 80 per cent. of $393.38, or $314.68. The award of $394.70 as loss of profits should therefore be reduced to $314.68.

[3] There is no basis whatsoever for the added award of $1,000 damages "for time and work lost by plaintiff while waiting for defendant to furnish to plaintiff work sufficient to enable plaintiff to perform the conditions of his contract," and it is incomprehensible how the court, in view of the plain language of our Code, should have granted it. The evidence of plaintiff was that it would have taken him three months, or in other words that he would have had three months' additional work, if defendant had given him added work to measure up in value to the $3,500; that he waited around for three weeks, after finishing the last well, expecting to receive this new employment; that during this time he was obliged to refuse offers to dig wells elsewhere; specifically to dig four wells of about 300 feet depth, upon each of which he would have made $800 or $900, and to dig another well of greater depth, for which he was to receive 80 acres of land. He further testified that his actual damages were vastly greater than $1,000, as plainly they would have been (if in point of law they were damages at all), since each of the four wells would have brought him as profit $800 or $900. Manifestly if such evidence is admissible to swell the damages for a breach of contract, he could have impoverished, and indeed bankrupted, the defendant by merely increasing the showing of the working contracts which he could have taken. Our law, however, contemplates no such measure of damage, and, indeed, distinctly forbids it. The Civil Code (section 3300) declares that for the breach of an obligation arising on contract, the measure of damages is the amount which will compensate the party aggrieved for all detriment proximately caused thereby; and that there may be no manner of doubt as to the interpretation to be put upon this language, section 3358 of the same Code further declares that:

> "Notwithstanding the provisions of this chapter, no person can recover a greater amount in damages for the breach of an obligation than he could have gained by the full performance thereof on both sides."

The exceptions to this general rule have no application to a contract such as this.

It follows herefrom that from the judgment given, the award of $1,000 damages must be stricken out. The award of $493.38 must be reduced to $314.68. The award of $98.99 must be reduced to $78.99. So modified and reduced, the judgment will stand affirmed, and defendant will recover its costs on this appeal.

1. CRIMINAL LAW ⟹42 — IMMUNITY — SELF-INCRIMINATION—STATUTE.

Under Pen. Code, § 1324, providing for immunity to a witness whose testimony may incriminate himself where defendant, charged with murder, had been called as a witness on preliminary examination of another, and had been sworn and testified, incriminating himself, without a word of instruction as to his rights, the statute not having been read to him, defendant was thereafter immune from prosecution.

2. STATUTES ⟹118(1)—TITLE—SUFFICIENCY.

The title of Pen. Code, § 1324, "An act to add a new section to the Penal Code, to be numbered section 1324, relating to testimony of witness refusing to answer on the ground that such answer will incriminate himself" (St. 1911, p. 485), is sufficient, though it does not contain anything about the granting of immunity or anything about when the state will refuse to prosecute a person charged with crime.

Angelotti, C. J., and Lawlor and Lorigan, JJ., dissenting.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Trinity County; James W. Bartlett, Judge.

Loren A. Fryer was convicted of murder, and from the judgment and an order denying his motion for new trial, he appeals. Judgment and order reversed.

PER CURIAM. Due to a division of opinion of the justices of the Third appellate district, this appeal was transferred to this court for decision. With the records of the case came the following opinion of Chipman, Presiding Justice, which is adopted as the opinion of this court and for the reasons therein given the judgment and order appealed from are reversed:

"Defendant was convicted of the murder in the first degree of one Lem Sing, and was sentenced to life imprisonment. He appeals from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

"The deceased was a Chinaman engaged in placer mining near the town of Weaverville, Trinity county. The evidence showed that deceased was wantonly murdered by defendant for the purposes of robbery. It is not contended that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict.

"It appears that one Ray Glenn was complained against for the murder of this same person, Lem Sing, and that at his preliminary examination this defendant was called as a witness, sworn, and examined, and he then and there testified to facts, in response to questions propounded by the district attorney, which incriminated himself; that previous to his testifying, he was not instructed as to his constitutional rights in any manner, nor was section 1324 of the Penal Code read to him by any person.

"The trial of the cause was set for March 20, 1916, and on that day before the examination and impanelment of the jury, defendant's counsel moved to dismiss the information on the grounds that at the preliminary examination of said Ray Glenn, this defendant was called as a witness and was compelled to and did give incriminating evidence against himself, and that the provisions of section 1324 of the Penal Code were not complied with, the same being a renewal of the motion previously made on February 14, 1916, at the arraignment of defendant. After the verdict, defendant moved in arrest of judgment on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction of the offense charged; also moved for a new trial on all the grounds above stated. The motions were denied.

"At the hearing of defendant's motion made at the commencement of the trial, defendant testified that he was 16 years old; that before being called as a witness at the preliminary examination of Ray Glenn, he had several conversations with the district attorney and also just before he was called to testify.

"'Q. Did he, at any of these conversations, or at that conversation, state to you anything in regard to your rights as a witness in this matter? A. No, sir. Q. Did he give you any instructions or advice in reference to your testifying in that case? A. Well, he gave me a little advice—what I would call advice.

"'Mr. Threshie: Q. Previous to your testifying and at the last consultation you had with the district attorney, what did you say in reference to that, if anything? A. I told him I wouldn't appear against Ray. Q. What did he say? A. He told me I didn't know what that meant. Q. What 'appear' meant? A. Yes, sir. Q. What did you say? A. I told him I did. Q. Did he at that time instruct you in any manner as to your rights under the law, as a witness? A. No, sir. Q. At the preliminary hearing of Ray Glenn who called you as a witness—who came after you? A. Mr. Bigelow (the sheriff). Q. What did he do? A. He came down there and unlocked the door and brought me up. Q. Did he say to you what you were wanted for? A. No, sir. * * * Q. When you were in the courtroom, I will ask you whether or not you were called as a witness and placed upon the witness stand? A. I was. Q. At that time did you receive any instructions from the district attorney, the magistrate holding the hearing, or anybody in regard to your rights? A. No, sir. Q. Did you or did you not then testify in the case? A. I did.'

"The evidence taken at the Glenn preliminary was introduced. The testimony there given by defendant Fryer was that he personally killed the deceased in pursuance of a scheme concocted by him and Glenn to rob the mine of deceased and other mines. After the people had rested, Sheriff Bigelow was recalled by Glenn's attorney. He had previously testified that Fryer had made a statement to him that Glenn had proposed to Fryer to rob certain mines, including deceased's mine. On his recall, Bigelow testified that 'he had conversation with him (Fryer) a good many times,' that he had a conversation with him shortly before Glenn's preliminary examination: 'Q. What was that conversation? A. Well, I was out working on the books; and I let him out for exercise, and he rapped on the window and called me to the door and said he had decided to tell the truth, and I said "All right," and he said "Mr. Glenn was not over when this robbery or murder," I forget which way he worded it—"was committed; I did it myself." Q. Did he say anything in connection at that as to whether or not Mr. Glenn was connected with it in any way? A. He said he went over to the mine in the morning, and the Chinaman ordered him out of the mine, and I asked him why the Chinaman ordered him out of the mine, and he said he didn't know. I was sitting down, and he said, "He made a rush at me and hit me with the flat part of the shovel, and my head has been sore ever since," and he knocked him out for a while and when he came to, he said: "I will just come back and get you, you Chinese son of a bitch."' Witness further testified: 'The boy told me in the morning, and then again he told me different. He contradicted his story again in the afternoon.' Later, as we have seen, Fryer testified at the Glenn preliminary implicating Glenn. Among other stories told by him was one—that a number of Chinamen, 'had hired him to kill Lem Sing.' This was substantially all the evidence taken at the Glenn preliminary. There was then introduced in support of the motion the evidence taken at Fryer's preliminary examination, Mr. Threshie appearing for defendant. Defendant did not testify at his preliminary hearing. The testimony consisted in part of statements made by defendant to the district attorney, the sheriff, and his deputy, in which he narrated with particularity his movements on the day of the murder and when and how and why he killed the deceased.

"It appeared that defendant was taken into custody about 9 o'clock on the morning of November 12th, three days after the killing. Some facts had previously been elicited pointing towards defendant as having some knowledge of or connection with the crime. On this morning, after having made some statement to the district attorney and sheriff concerning his movements on November 9th, stating, among other things, that he had been out hunting on that morning and was in the neighborhood of the Lem Sing mine, he consented to go with the officers and show them the route he traveled. This he did, and it corresponded to a particular point where he crossed a gulch, with the tracks which the officers had followed by back-tracking from the point near where the body of Lem Sing was found. At this point of divergence there were no tracks found leading in the direction which defendant said he had taken, but the trail from that point led to the place from which he shot deceased. There was evidence that the tracks made in the snow corresponded with the tracks made by the shoes defendant was wearing as was shown by applying them to the tracks with defendant's consent. The district attorney learned before the information was filed that defendant was seen by a schoolgirl on November 9th going towards the Lem Sing mine with a gun.

"The complaint in the justice's court against Fryer was filed on November 20, 1915, and his preliminary examination did not take place until January 18, 1916. The complaint against Glenn was filed November 22d, and his preliminary examination was held on December 6, 1915. The information against Fryer was filed February 7, 1916.

"From the foregoing it will appear that defendant, while in jail upon the charge of murder and in the custody of the sheriff, was taken before the magistrate without counsel to testify in a case wherein Ray Glenn was charged by a complaint duly filed with having murdered this same Lem Sing. There was then on file in the justice's court a complaint against Fryer for the same crime. But the information against Fryer was not filed until the following February. It does not appear when an information was filed against Glenn.

"The principal, indeed the only, witness whose testimony in any way implicated Glenn was the defendant Fryer. There can be no doubt but that Glenn was held to answer upon the testimony of Fryer. And the question is fairly presented whether, under the provisions of section 1324 of the Penal Code, the motion should have been granted. That the exact situation of Fryer at the time he was called to testify may be known, we quote from the record of the Glenn preliminary examination:

" 'Court: Are you ready to proceed, gentlemen?

" 'Mr. Reid: Yes, sir. We ask that Mr. Woodbury be appointed as reporter in this case.

" 'Mr. Given: No objection at all your honor. (Mr. Woodbury was sworn.)

" 'Mr. Reid: The court will inform the defendant (Glenn) as to his rights as to counsel and so forth.

" 'Mr. Given: That has already been done. There is no use taking up time doing it any further. I represent the defendant.

" 'Mr. Reid: Call Loren Fryer.

" 'Court: You do solemnly swear the testimony you will give in the case now pending before this court, wherein the people of the state of California is plaintiff and Ray Glenn is defendant, shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, so help you God.

" 'Loren Allen Fryer: Yes, sir.

" 'Mr. Reid: What is your name? A. Loren Allen Fryer. Q. How old are you? A. I will be 16 on the 21st of December.'

"The witness, in response to questions, then narrated the story of his crime in response to questions put by the district attorney, and Glenn's connection with it. We have in an earlier part of this opinion quoted from the testimony of defendant given at the hearing of the motion which is undisputed. He there states that he had a conversation with the district attorney the morning of the preliminary hearing of Glenn or the evening before, and that neither then nor when he was called before the magistrate was he given any advice or instructions as to his rights as a witness or with reference to his testifying. As having some possible bearing upon the question, it may be stated further that on November 13, 1915, Fryer made a statement in the district attorney's office in the presence of the district attorney, W. R. Bigelow (sheriff), Harvey Bigelow, Loren Allen Fryer, and Frank I. Woodbury (stenographer). This statement was introduced at the Fryer preliminary, but was objected to by defendant's counsel on the ground that no proper foundation was laid for it. In this statement or confession, Fryer narrated the circumstances of the killing; claimed that he was hired to do it by some Chinamen, but did not in any way implicate them.

"We made an effort to ascertain the scope of section 1324, Penal Code, in People v. Knowles, 27 Cal. App. 498, 155 Pac. 137. In that case, Knowles was one of a number of persons being investigated on the charge of offering a bribe to an officer which was alleged to have been received by that officer in connection with the granting of a certain liquor license. He was called before the grand jury and sworn and examined. Before testifying, he was told by the district attorney the purpose of the investigation and that he, Knowles, was one of the parties being investigated. He was cautioned in certain particulars, but, as we held, not in conformity with the provisions of section 1324, and this section was not read to him. After being thus cautioned he was asked if he cared to make any statement to the grand jury in reference to the matter, and answered: 'I do.' It was conceded that Knowles' testimony did, in fact, incriminate himself as well as the others charged in the indictment, and was the testimony on which, in part, the indictment was found.

"The construction given the section in the Knowles' Case seemed to us the correct one, and the writer of this opinion still adheres to it, although, if adopted as the law in the present case, it will lead to the freedom of a confessed murderer. The responsibility for such a regrettable result lies not necessarily with the statute, but in the failure to follow its mandates in conducting the proceedings against these two men. The purpose of the act is to compel a confederate in the commission of crime to testify against his co-confederates, which could not be done under the law as it stood prior to the enactment of this section. But to make this possible without violating the Constitution, the act extended complete immunity to the witness as a reward for his service to the state. In putting the section into practice it rests with the district attorney to decide which one of the confederates, if either, is to be made a witness, and having so decided and so acted, wisely or unwisely, he cannot deprive this witness of the fruits of such decision.

"Beyond question, the testimony given by defendant was against another person who, with the defendant, was charged with the same offense and was given in a 'trial, proceeding, or lawful investigation or judicial proceeding.' We are also satisfied that the testimony was not given 'voluntarily.' It is true that defendant failed 'to ask to be excused from testifying,' and neither did he 'demand that he be excused from testifying.' Notwithstanding this fact, however, the section provides that 'any person shall be deemed to have asked to be excused from testifying * * * unless, before any testimony is given * * * the judge, foreman or other person presiding at such trial, hearing, proceeding, or investigation, shall distinctly read this section of this Code to such witness.' If this provision is to be given any force, it must mean that whether or not the witness 'demands that he be excused' or 'asks to be excused from testifying,' the statute has made the demand or request for him in providing that he 'shall be deemed to have asked to be excused from testifying * * * unless before any testimony is given * * * by such witness, the judge * * * shall distinctly read this section of this Code to such witness.'

[1] "The section provides that the witness shall not be exempt from 'indictment, presentment by information, prosecution or punishment for the offense with reference to which he may have testified as aforesaid, * * * where such person so testifying * * * does so voluntarily.' The section also provides that he shall not be exempt 'when such person so testifying or so producing evidence fails to ask to be excused from testifying or so producing evidence.' But if, as the statute says, such person 'is deemed to have asked to be excused from testifying' unless the section is read to him before testifying, his silence or failure to ask to be excused cannot be taken as bringing him within the class of persons who testify 'voluntarily.' The section is a long one, and is set out fully in the Knowles Case. In that case there was some attempt made to inform the witness of his rights. In the present case the witness, a mere boy, was taken from his cell in the jail and called to the witness stand, was sworn, and testified without a word of instruction as to his rights and the section was not read to him. We are unable to distinguish this case from the Knowles' Case and must hold, as there, that defendant earned his right to immunity, and his motion should have been granted.

"The Attorney General urges the application of section 4½, art. 6, of the Constitution, claiming that as defendant's testimony at the Glenn preliminary was not used at defendant's trial 'there is nothing upon which to presume prejudicial error' and that 'under the present practice, the duty is cast upon defendant of clearly showing injury to the extent of resulting in a miscarriage of justice.' The argument proceeds upon the assumption that defendant was undoubtedly shown to be guilty, and hence there could not possibly have been a miscarriage of justice in bringing him to trial. But section 1324 is based on the assumption of the guilt of the person compelled to testify, and its purpose is to bring others to the bar of justice by granting immunity to one of the confederates. The promise made to him is that he shall not be put to trial at all. As was said in State v. Nowell, 58 N. H. 314: 'His legal immunity from prosecution was equivalent to his legal innocence of the crime disclosed by his testimony.' To hold that section 4½ applies would render the statute inoperative for no one could be expected to incriminate himself if he knew he was liable to be tried for the crime he confesses, and that the statutory promise was but a scrap of paper of no binding force upon the state.

"The Attorney General attacks the section as in violation of several articles and sections of the Constitution, and among other grounds that the title to the act is fatally deficient. We are not inclined to enter upon an extended discussion of this point. The general objection to this kind of legislation as unconstitutional has been before the court quite frequently, and has, as we believe, been sustained by the weight of authority. We content ourselves with the following citations: Ex parte Clarke, 103 Cal. 352, 37 Pac. 230; Ex parte Cohen, 104 Cal. 524, 38 Pac. 364, 26 L. R. A. 423, 43 Am. St. Rep. 127; Counselman v. Hitchcock, 142 U. S. 547, 12 Sup. Ct. 195, 35 L. Ed. 1110; In re Buskett, 106 Mo. 602, 17 S. W. 753, 14 L. R. A. 407, 27 Am. St. Rep. 378, and note; State v. Nowell, 58 N. H. 314.

[2] "The title of the act is as follows: 'An act to add a new section to the Penal Code, to be numbered section 1324, relating to testimony of witness refusing to answer on the ground that such answers will incriminate himself.' It is said that the title does not contain a word about the granting of immunity to a witness nor anything about when the state will refuse to 'prosecute a person charged with crime' and fails to support the second and third subdivisions of the section. Without going into the matter in detail, it seems to us that the question of immunity to a witness whose testimony may incriminate himself would naturally arise and become a part of an act dealing with the subject mentioned in the title, and so also the other provisions found in the act which seem to us to be germane to the title. 'It was never expected that the title to an act should be an index to all of its provisions, and so long as the provisions themselves are cognate, attingent, and germane to the subject-matter of the title, no violence is done to the Constitution' (Mr. Justice Henshaw, in Ex parte Hallawell, 155 Cal. 112, 99 Pac. 490), and the court deemed it proper to say 'that the constitutional provision invoked was not designated as a loophole of escape from, or a means for the destruction of legitimate legislation.' See Ex parte Liddell, 93 Cal. 633, 29 Pac. 251; note to Treadwell's Annotated Constitution, page 243, under article 4, § 24, of the Constitution.

"We do not think the court would be warranted in forcing a construction of the statute which would justify the ruling of the court in order to prevent what otherwise would lead to a miscarriage of justice, for the cases all hold that this class of legislation is to be liberally construed."

The judgment and order are reversed.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. (dissenting). I dissent. I agree with Mr. Justice Hart of the District Court of Appeal as to the construction that should be given to section 1324, Penal Code, and concur generally in the opinion written by him and concurred in by Mr. Justice Burnett. That opinion is as follows:

"I am not prepared to agree with the conclusion of the Presiding Justice as to the construction of section 1324 of the Penal Code. It is readily to be conceded that the language of that section as a whole is singularly ambiguous, and the real intent of the statute correspondingly obscure. Indeed, the several provisions of the section appear to be inconsistent with themselves; and for this very reason the language of the section should not be too literally followed, but given a construction which, it seems to me, will discover what may well be said to be the true intent of the statute—a consideration not wholly without support from the language of the section and under which its primary and important purpose may as well be effectuated as by the construction given it by my Associate, and at the same time afford less reason for apprehending from its practical application serious consequences to the public and society. So much of the section as is necessary for my purposes here reads as follows:

"'No * * * person shall be exempt from indictment, presentment by information, prosecution or punishment for the offense with reference to which he may have testified as aforesaid, or for or on account of any transaction, matter or thing concerning which he may have testified as aforesaid, or produced evidence, documentary or otherwise, where such person so testifying or so producing evidence, documentary or otherwise, does so voluntarily, or when such person so testifying or so * * * fails to ask to be excused from testifying or so producing evidence, on the ground that his testimony or such evidence, documentary or otherwise, may incriminate himself; but in all such cases, the testimony or evidence, documentary or otherwise, so given may be used in any criminal prosecution or proceeding against the person so testifying or producing such evidence, documentary or otherwise.

"'Any person shall be deemed to have asked to be excused from testifying or producing evidence, documentary or otherwise, under this section, unless before any testimony is given or evidence, documentary or otherwise, is produced by such a witness, the judge, foreman or other person presiding at such trial, hearing, proceeding or investigation, shall distinctly read this section of this code to such witness, and the form of the objection by the witness shall be immaterial, if he in substance makes objection that his testimony or the production of such evidence, documentary or otherwise, may incriminate himself, and he shall not be obliged to object to each question, but one objection shall be sufficient to protect such witness from prosecution for any offense concerning which he may testify, or for or on account of any transaction, matter or thing concerning which he may testify or produce evidence, documentary or otherwise, upon such trial, hearing, proceeding or investigation.'

"A careful examination of the section will, I think, show that there are three propositions contained therein which cannot be disputed, to wit: (1) That immunity will not be granted to one who voluntarily gives testimony which incriminates or tends to incriminate himself; (2) that such immunity will not be granted unless the witness asks to be excused; (3) that where he desires to be excused he must make an objection in some form to the giving of the testimony.

"Very clearly, if a witness voluntarily testifies, the provision of the statute that he may gain immunity by asking to be excused has no application. Voluntarily testifying and testifying only after asking to be excused are obviously two entirely different propositions. If a witness testifies only after he has asked or demanded to be excused, he is not a voluntary witness; for he may not even then be excused from testifying. On the contrary, he is compelled to testify whether he wants to or not, but, having asked to be excused, he may not be prosecuted for the offense or charge to which his testimony so given relates. But the question arises: How and by whom is it to be made known that he does not appear as a voluntary witness? I think that the reply to this question is to be found in the latter part of the section, where language is used plainly implying that the witness must himself make it known, in some manner or form, in the proceeding in which he is called as a witness that he objects to testifying in said proceeding, because his testimony so given will incriminate him. Not only does this appear to be true, but the same language of the section to my mind implies that, unlike the case where extrajudicial incriminatory statements are sought to be shown against one accused on trial, the onus or burden is upon the witness to show that he made timely objection to giving the testimony, otherwise his testimony will be treated as having been voluntarily given. This must be the correct view because it is not a case where his guilt is being proved, he having already admitted that he committed the crime, but a case where he is asking the favor of the law; in other words, asking immunity from prosecution, and therefore, from the consequences of his criminal act.

"But much stress is laid upon the provision of the section that where the entire section is not read to the witness, he shall be deemed to have asked to be excused; and it is said that if that provision of said section is to be given any force, it must mean that whether or not the witness 'demands that he be excused' or 'asks to be excused from testifying,' the statute has made the demand or request for him. True, the statute makes the demand or request to be excused for him, where the section is not read to the witness as prescribed; but, under my view of the section, as above indicated, the statute can make no such 'demand' or 'request,' nor, indeed, is there any occasion for the interposition of the statute in that regard, until the witness has himself objected in some manner to the giving of testimony and so disclosed that he is not a voluntary witness.

"The statute does not require nor contemplate that the witness shall specifically request to be excused. He may merely object in a general way to testifying, claiming that his testimony will incriminate him, or make any objection that will disclose that he is not on the stand as a voluntary witness. When he has made such objection, in whatever form, then, if the statute is not read to him, he will be deemed to have asked to be excused, although he may not in specific language have asked or requested or demanded to be excused.

"In conclusion, and by way of recapitulation, my view of the section is this: That no witness who, without objection in any manner or form whatsoever, takes the stand and gives testimony whereby he incriminates himself can claim immunity under the statute; that, if he would claim immunity from prosecution, he must first object or in some manner show that he is not a voluntary witness, and that until he does this, the provision presuming him to have asked to be excused, does not apply.

"It does not appear from the proceedings of the preliminary examination of his alleged confederate relating to his testimony that he objected to giving testimony therein; and, under the provision of said section implying that it was his duty to so object if he would be entitled to the immunity guaranteed by said section, this court may presume that he made no objection, and was therefore a voluntary witness.

"I therefore think that the judgment and the order appealed from ought to be affirmed."

CROSE v. CITY COUNCIL OF CITY OF LOS ANGELES et al. (L. A. 4873.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ⚷40 — "BOROUGH"—CONSTITUTION.

A "borough," within Const. art. 11, § 8, providing that it shall be competent in any city charter to provide for the division of the city into boroughs, etc., is one of the units composing a territorial fraction of a city, and having certain powers with reference to local concerns.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Borough.]

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ⚷40 — BOROUGH GOVERNMENT—CONSTITUTION.

Under Const. art. 11, § 8, providing that it shall be competent in any city charter to provide for the division of the city or city and county governed thereby into boroughs, etc., the right of borough government cannot be extended to a part of the territory of a city and denied to another portion, as borough government, when established, must extend over all the municipality.

In Bank. Petition for writ of mandate by A. J. Crose against the City Council of the City of Los Angeles, and M. F. Betkouski and others, members of said city council. On demurrer to the petition. Demurrer sustained, and alternative writ dismissed.

Carter & Torchia, of Los Angeles, for petitioner. Albert Lee Stephens, City Atty., of Los Angeles, for defendants. McClure & Turner, of Los Angeles, amici curiæ.

MELVIN, J. This matter comes before us on a demurrer to the petition for a writ of mandate.

Petitioner, who is a resident and an elector within that part of the city of Los Angeles formerly known as Wilmington, asks that the council of the city of Los Angeles be commanded to call an election as prayed in a petition by which the signers requested that an election should be had within a certain district in said city to determine whether or not such territory should have a borough government and to elect the trustees of such borough if a sufficient number of citizens should vote for the formation of such a government. The refusal of the city council is based upon the belief of the members of that body that they are without power and authority to call such an election. The questions involved are purely legal, and may be finally determined therefore upon this general demurrer.

Los Angeles is a city having a freeholders' charter. In 1909 this charter was amended by the insertion of a provision for the establishment and government of boroughs within a limited area of the city. When this amendment to the charter was made there was no provision in the Constitution of California for the creation of borough governments. Since that time through the Constitution by amendment the people have formally recognized the right to establish boroughs. Section 8 of article 11 of the Constitution in its present form is in part as follows:

> "It shall be competent in any charter to provide for the division of the city or city and county governed thereby into boroughs or districts, and to provide that each such borough or district may exercise such general or special municipal powers, and to be administered in such manner, as may be provided for each such borough or district in the charter of the city or city and county."

The provisions relative to formation of boroughs are found in section 258 of article 25 of the charter of Los Angeles which provides that a borough may be established in any territory annexed to the city of Los Angeles after the adoption of the amendment, such borough to contain not less than 500 inhabitants; that the government thereof shall be vested in a board of trustees of five members to be elected by the qualified electors of the borough and other officers to be appointed by the trustees pursuant to the terms of the charter; that whenever a petition shall be presented to the city council of the city of Los Angeles signed by at least 50 per cent. of the qualified voters residing in such territory, computed upon the number of votes cast at the last state election, describing the boundaries and stating the selected name of the proposed borough "and praying for the establishment therein of a borough system of government, the city council of the city of Los Angeles must without delay submit to the voters of such territory the question whether such proposed borough shall be established, at a special election to be called and held for that purpose." These provisions are followed by requirements for the publication of notice of the election, and it is further provided that:

> "Such notice shall particularly describe the boundaries of such proposed borough; shall state the name thereof, and shall require the voters to cast ballots, which shall contain the words, 'For the Establishment of the Borough,' or 'Against the Establishment of the Borough,' or words equivalent thereto, and also the names of the persons to be voted for to fill the office of members of the board of trustees of such proposed borough."

The charter further provides that if upon the canvass of the votes cast at the election a majority are in favor of the establishment of such borough, the council shall declare it duly founded with the name thereof as stated in the petition and shall announce that the five persons receiving respectively the highest number of votes are duly elected members of the board of trustees of such borough.

It is not necessary to discuss all of the reasons suggested for sustaining the demurrer to the petition. We shall consider but one.

[1] We shall not be at pains carefully to define the word "borough," nor to follow counsel in their learned and interesting discussion of the origin and development of boroughs in England and in certain states of our Union, notably New York. It is sufficient for us to declare the obvious truth that a borough is one of the units composing a territorial fraction of a city and vested with certain powers having reference to local concerns. Petitioner insists that by the solemn constitutional provisions of 1911 and 1914 the people of this state have recognized the principle of municipal government through a system of boroughs. This is true, but we are aided little by that fact in solving the problem now before us.

[2] We have quoted above section 8 of article 11, in its present form. In 1911 this part of the Constitution made it competent in any city charter to provide "for the establishment of a borough system of government for the whole or any part of the territory of such city." Stats. 1911, p. 2179. It will be noticed that the later amendment which is now in effect contemplates a "division of the city or city and county" into boroughs; therefore the policy of the state as expressed in the Constitution is undoubtedly opposed to a system extending the right of borough government to a part of the territory of a city and denying it to another portion. The Constitution as it now stands controls the matter, and section 8 of article 11 clearly provides that borough government when established shall extend over all, and shall not be applied to a part of a municipality. The scheme provided in the charter of the city of Los Angeles for the erection of borough governments is therefore opposed to the Constitution.

The demurrer is sustained, and the alternative writ of mandate heretofore issued is dismissed.

PEOPLE, by WEBB, Atty. Gen., v. CALIFORNIA SAFE DEPOSIT & TRUST CO. et al. (GOLDARACENA, Intervener). (S. F. 8088.)

1. Appeal and Error 🔑1097(1) — Law of Case—Holding on Former Appeal.

A holding on former appeal is binding on the Supreme Court.

2. Trusts 🔑358(1) — Following Trust Funds.

The beneficiary of a trust may follow and recover the trust funds if any property in the hands of the trustee or of those taking with notice can be identified whether as the original property of the cestui or as its product.

3. Trusts 🔑358(1) — Following Trust Funds.

Where the identity of a trust fund has been lost, the beneficiary, seeking to follow it, is relegated to the position of general creditor, and must share pro rata with the other general creditors.

4. Trusts 🔑372(1)—Mingled Funds—Presumption—Statute.

If a trustee mingles his own funds with the trust fund, and thereafter draws from time to time from the commingled mass, it will be presumed that the moneys so drawn were from his own portion of the fund, rather than from the moneys held in trust; the underlying presumption, by Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 1, being that a person is innocent of crime or wrong.

5. Banks and Banking 🔑39 — Subscriptions to Stock—Fraud—Mingled Funds—Presumption.

The doctrine that a trustee who mingles his own with trust funds and thereafter draws from the commingled mass will be presumed to draw from his own funds rather than from trust funds has no application where the trustee is such involuntarily only because it has obtained property by fraud, as in case of a bank fraudulently inducing one to subscribe for its stock and receiving payment.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by the People of the State of California, by U. S. Webb, Attorney General, etc., against the California Safe Deposit & Trust Company, a corporation, and others, E. De Los Magee being receiver, wherein O. M. Goldaracena intervened. From judgment granting the intervening petitioner some, but not all, of the relief claimed by him, he appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 168 Cal. 241, 141 Pac. 1181, L. R. A. 1915A, 299; 167 Pac. 181.

Wm. M. Abbott and Wm. M. Cannon, both of San Francisco, for appellant. De Laveaga & Magee, of San Francisco, for respondent Magee.

SLOSS, J. On October 30, 1907, California Safe Deposit & Trust Company, a banking corporation, closed its doors. The bank commissioners took possession of its assets, and an action was begun, pursuant to the provisions of the statute then in force (Stats. 1903, p. 365), to have the said bank declared insolvent, and to have a receiver appointed for the purpose of liquidating its affairs. On January 14, 1908, adjudication of insolvency was made, and a receiver appointed.

On April 10, 1908, O. M. Goldaracena, the appellant herein, filed his petition, asking that the receiver be declared to hold the sum of $12,000 in trust for him, and that he recover the same, with interest. A second amended petition was subsequently filed. The court sustained the receiver's demurrer to the latter pleading, and the petitioner appealed. The appeal resulted in a reversal of the judgment entered upon the sustaining of the demurrer. People v. Cal. Safe Dep. & Trust Co., 19 Cal. App. 414, 126 Pac. 516, 520. The case went back for trial, and judgment was entered granting the petitioner some, but not all, of the relief claimed by him. His appeal from the second judgment is now before us.

[1] The allegations upon which the petitioner sought relief were, in effect, that on September 20, 1906, the California Safe Deposit & Trust Company had, by means of false and fraudulent representations, induced him to purchase 100 shares of the capital stock of said company, for the sum of $12,000, that he had not learned the falsity of the representations until shortly before beginning this action, and that he had promptly served upon the bank and the receiver his notice of rescission. He further alleged that the said sum of $12,000 paid by him remained in the possession of the bank continuously until the adjudication of insolvency, and that it thereupon passed into the hands of the receiver, who has since held the same, "and that the same can be traced and identified in his hands, and is the identical money of the petitioner." It was held on the former appeal that the petition stated a cause of action, and this holding is, of course, binding here.

When the case came to be tried, the court found in favor of petitioner's allegations with respect to fraud, discovery, and rescission. It found, however, that no part of the sum of $12,000 paid by the petitioner as the purchase price of the stock was continuously in the possession of said bank from the time of the payment until the appointment of the receiver, that the receiver did not receive any part of said sum, and that no part of it can be traced or identified into his hands. Accordingly the court concluded that petitioner was entitled to a rescission of his contract, and to an allowed claim against the bank for $11,350, being the amount paid by him for his stock, less dividends declared and paid by the bank prior to the adjudication of insolvency. The judgment was that said claim be paid in due course of administration and liquidation of the affairs of the bank by the receiver, and that the petitioner be paid the dividends theretofore paid by the receiver to other general creditors, amounting to 13⅓ per cent. with interest, and that he is entitled to receive on his claim such further dividends as may be declared and ordered paid upon common claims.

Upon this appeal the appellant insists that he was entitled to payment in full, rather than as a general or common creditor. His position is that the bank became an involuntary trustee of the $12,000 which it had obtained from him by fraud (Civ. Code, § 2224), and that he had sufficiently traced this trust fund into the hands of the receiver to be entitled to payment in preference to general creditors.

[2] It is well settled that the beneficiary of a trust may follow and recover the trust fund if any property in the hands of the trustee or of those taking with notice can be identified either as the original property of the cestui que trust, or as the product of it. Thompson's Appeal, 22 Pa. 16.

[3] Where, however, the identity of the trust fund has been lost, the beneficiary is relegated to the position of a general creditor, and must share pro rata with other general creditors. Lathrop v. Bampton, 31 Cal. 17, 89 Am. Dec. 141. The court below found that the fund claimed by petitioner could not be identified or traced into the assets going into the hands of the receiver, and the judgment is therefore clearly right, unless the appellant can establish his contention that the findings in this regard are contrary to the evidence. The record shows these facts: On September 20, 1906, the day when the bank sold this stock to the petitioner, it had on hand in its vaults the sum of $177,664.13, and on the same day it had on deposit with other banks the sum of $1,326,436.98. At no time between said 20th day of September, 1906, and the closing of the bank on October 30, 1907, did the amount of money held by the bank fall below $123,693.96. On the day when the bank closed its doors it had on hand $189,564.89 in cash, and $135,848.37 on deposit with other banks. The total deposits in the bank on September 20, 1906, were $8,507,505.07, and on October 30, 1907, $9,064,510.64. Between these two dates the deposits and withdrawals from the bank aggregated many millions of dollars; the deposits during that period amounted to more than $6,600,000, and the withdrawals about the same. Claims aggregating $331,082.60 have been presented by persons who made deposits on the last four days of the active life of the bank. Such depositors demand that the amount of their deposits be allowed as preferred claims.

The appellant insists that upon these facts the court was bound to find that the $12,000 received from him as aforesaid remained intact in the hands of the bank during the entire period intervening between the purchase of the stock and the closing of the bank, and that such fund had been identified and traced into the hands of the receiver. The argument is that since it appears that the bank had on hand at all times a sum in excess of $12,000, the amount claimed by the petitioner, it must be presumed that it retained this sum to meet his claim arising from the fraud perpetrated upon him.

[4] The argument is based upon the well-settled rule that, if a trustee mingles his own funds with the trust fund, and thereafter draws from time to time from the commingled mass, "it will be presumed that the moneys so drawn were from his own portion of the fund, rather than from the moneys held by him in trust." Elizalde v. Elizalde, 137 Cal. 634, 641, 66 Pac. 369, 70 Pac. 861; In re Hallett's Estate, L. R. 13 Ch. Div. 696; National Bank v. Insurance Co., 104 U. S. 54, 26 L. Ed. 693; Lewin on Trusts, *895. Various expressions have been used in defining the nature of the rule. In some of the cases, as pointed out by the appellant, it has been said that equity will "attribute" the withdrawals to the trustee's private account. In others, as in the Elizalde Case, above cited, it is said that the trustee will be "presumed" to have drawn his own money. In one case (Crawford County Commissioners v. Strawn, 157 Fed. 49, 84 C. C. A. 553, 15 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1100) the doctrine is explained as resting upon a "fiction." But, whatever name be given to it, the rule originates in and rests upon the underlying presumption "that a person is innocent of crime or wrong." Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 1.

[5] Has the doctrine any proper application to a case like this, where a party has fraudulently induced another to enter into a contract, and holds what he has received thereunder in trust, not by virtue of any contractual or acknowledged fiduciary relation, but merely because the law declares that he is an involuntary trustee of property obtained by fraud? Is it to be presumed that one who has obtained property fraudulently under an agreement whereby it becomes his own (subject merely to the other party's right of rescission) will, notwithstanding his acquisition and holding under a claim of ownership, keep the property intact for the benefit of the one from whom he has obtained it? Can the wrongful act of the party obtaining the money furnish the basis for making him a trustee, and at the same time the ground for presuming that he acts rightfully? These questions have been directly presented to the Supreme Court of Iowa, which has answered them by saying that the rule relied upon by the appellant does not apply to involuntary trusts arising solely from fraud. In Re First State Bank of Corwith, 149 Iowa, 662, 129 N. W. 70, that court said:

> "While we have held that, where a bank receives money wrongfully, 'a trust arises as between it and the true owner of the money,' * * * we have never held that the wrongful act of the bank will alone create a preference as against general creditors. Are the appellees herein entitled to the aid of the legal presumption that their money reached the hands of the receiver in the form of increased assets of the bank, and that it may be taken therefrom without impairing the rights of the general creditors? We are of the opinion that an affirmative answer to the inquiry would require us to go a step farther than we have ever gone, and to establish a rule that would be unjust and inequitable. * * * In all of our cases, except one which will be noticed later, where the presumption has been given force, the deposits were of trust funds, the character of such funds was known to the banks when the deposits were made, and the deposits involved no wrongful act on the part of the banks. The presumption was in every instance based on the theory that the bank, knowing the character of the fund and acting honestly, would not use or dissipate it as long as it had funds of its own."

The court then goes on to explain Whitcomb v. Carpenter, 134 Iowa, 227, 111 N. W. 825, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 928, the exceptional case to which it had referred, by saying that the bank had there become a trustee by contract.

"But in any event," continues the opinion, "we do not think that it can be presumed that a bank will keep money that it has obtained by means of willful and deliberate criminal acts. The ordinary thief disposes of stolen property as soon as possible, and it would be going a long way to say that a bank that has obtained money by means of its deliberate forgery will be presumed to have kept it on hand to be returned to the injured party intact. We are not willing to so hold, and without such presumption the appellees have made no showing that entitles them to preference."

The appellant is not correct in his statement that the case just cited has been overruled. On the contrary, it has been approved in a later decision by the same court. In Re First State Bank, 152 Iowa, 724, 133 N. W. 354. Nor are we cited to any authorities holding the contrary. In Re Hallett, supra, a leading case, is relied on by the appellant. It does not, however, hold that the presumption applies to cases like the one before us. It merely holds that it is applicable not merely to the technical relation of trustee and cestui, but to all relations of a fiduciary character, as, for example, that of principal and agent. In all of the other cases cited the money in question was either received in trust, or was taken from a trustee with notice of the character in which he held it.

There is, of course, no pretense that petitioner has traced, or can trace, his $12,000 into the possession of the receiver, except by means of the artificial presumption or fiction upon which he relies. The controversy, in its essence, is between the petitioner and other claimants whose only recourse is to a fund insufficient to meet the demands upon it. All concerned must suffer some loss through the mismanagement or misconduct of the officers of the bank. In equity there is no reason why the petitioner should be preferred to all other creditors or claimants. For over a year the petitioner occupied the position of a stockholder, and received dividends on his stock. According to his claim, the bank was insolvent when he purchased his shares. Nevertheless it went on doing business, and accepted deposits of many millions from others. The greater part of the $9,000,000 on deposit when the bank closed its doors had been received after the petitioner purchased his stock. It is not to be supposed that any one would deposit money in a bank which he knew to be insolvent, and we may fairly assume, therefore, that every one who deposited money after the petitioner's purchase of stock did so under the belief, mistakenly held, if not fraudulently induced, that the bank was in a sound condition. These depositors, to say nothing of those who claim to be entitled to preferential payment (their claims exceeding all of the funds on hand), are as much entitled as is the petitioner to the favorable consideration of a court of equity. We do not think that any rigid legal presumption should be applied for the purpose of giving to one claimant a preferential right over others whose position does not in justice differ from his.

It becomes unnecessary to consider other points made by the respondent.

The judgment is affirmed.

CITY OF LOS ANGELES et al. v. LEWIS, Auditor of Los Angeles County (KANE, Intervener). (L. A. 4591.)

1. TAXATION 🔑22—PRIVATE PURPOSE—CONSTITUTIONALITY OF STATUTE.

A legislative act clearly and designedly authorizing taxation for a private purpose is void, as under our system of government taxes can be laid only for a public object—one within the purpose for which governments are established.

2. COUNTIES 🔑47—POWERS OF BOARDS OF SUPERVISORS—STATUTE.

Pol. Code, § 4041, as amended by St. 1913, p. 667, circumscribing all grants of power to boards of county supervisors within "such limitations and restrictions as are subscribed by law," neither adds to nor detracts from the force and effect of the powers granted, as, even if such language were not used, their powers would be so limited.

3. Waters and Water Courses 🔑203(1)—Public Utility—Disposition of Surplus.

Where a municipal corporation is authorized to engage in a work of a public nature, such as furnishing water or light to its inhabitants, an excess or surplus beyond their needs arising in the prudent operation of the work may be disposed of to private individuals.

4. Constitutional Law 🔑48—Construction of Statutes—Presumption of Constitutionality.

The courts construe a legislative enactment with a strong predilection favoring its constitutionality, and seek by every legitimate means to uphold its constitutionality, though in an effort to save a law they cannot properly pervert or destroy its plain meaning and make it express that which the Legislature itself did not declare.

5. Constitutional Law 🔑47—Construction—Validity.

The supreme test of the validity of the legislative enactment is, not what may have been done under it, but what may be done under it.

6. Taxation 🔑23—Private Purpose—Validity of Statute—Powers of Board of Supervisors.

Pol. Code, § 4041, subd. 9a, as amended by St. 1913, p. 669, authorizing county supervisors to operate or lease a cement manufacturing plant and to sell its products upon such terms as they may deem proper, and giving the state and its municipal corporations a preferred right to purchase its products at the same price at which they are offered to private persons, and providing that no such plant shall be operated or leased until a prescribed notice of intention to do so shall have been published stating the time of the hearing before the supervisors, but not requiring that the plant shall bear any relation to the county's estimated needs or negativing a manufactured product in excess of its needs, and under which, in view of the fact that cement may be carried over without deterioration, there would be no surplus incidentally produced, and in effect authorizing the county to manufacture all of the cement that the plant could produce and to sell all it wished to private consumers, was invalid, as authorizing taxation by the county for private purposes.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

Mandamus by the City of Los Angeles and the Board of Public Service Commissioners of the City of Los Angeles against Walter A. Lewis, Auditor of the County of Los Angeles; M. H. Kane, intervener. General demurrers to the petition filed by the intervener and the auditor overruled, and judgment for petitioners, and the auditor and the intervener appeal. Judgment reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to sustain the demurrers.

O'Melveny, Stevens & Millikin, Walter K. Tuller, and J. P. Chandler, all of Los Angeles, for appellant Kane. Fredericks & Hanna, of Los Angeles, for appellant Lewis. Albert Lee Stephens, City Atty., W. B. Mathews, Wm. B. Himrod, and A. J. Hill, Co. Counsel, Roy V. Reppy, Asst. Co. Counsel, and Robert B. Murphy, Deputy Co. Counsel, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. The city of Los Angeles was the owner of a plant for the manufacture of Portland cement, located in Kern county, Cal. It had used the product of its factory in the construction of its waterworks. Thereafter, in 1913 (St. 1913, p. 669), the Legislature of the state, in its enumeration of the powers of boards of supervisors, added a new section to the Political Code (section 4041—9a) providing as follows:

"To purchase, lease, construct or otherwise acquire, own, operate, manage and control, in any county in the state, cement manufacturing plant; and to sell the products of the same in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as to them shall be deemed proper: Provided, that the state of California and municipal or public corporations of the state shall have a preferred right at the same price as the products are offered to private persons to purchase the same; and to purchase, lease, or otherwise acquire real or personal property to be used in connection with such plant: Provided, however, that no such plant shall be purchased, leased, or otherwise acquired, neither shall said works be constructed on real or personal property purchased or acquired until notice of the intention to make such purchase or construct such works shall have been given for a period of thirty days by publication in a newspaper of general circulation published within the county, or, if there be none, then by posting a notice for said period in a conspicuous place in three public places in the county; such notice shall contain a description of the property to be purchased or works to be constructed, a statement of the amount of money to be invested, the terms upon which it is to be invested and the time when the proposition will come before the board of supervisors to be acted upon."

Then, on July 10, 1915, the city of Los Angeles and the county of Los Angeles, acting under the authority thus conferred, entered into a written contract of lease, whereby the county of Los Angeles took over the operation and control of the city's cement plant located in the county of Kern. The lease contained a number of terms and conditions, some of which will hereinafter demand consideration. For the present it is enough to say that the rental to be paid by the county of Los Angeles to the city of Los Angeles for the use of this cement plant for the first year is $27,500, to be paid in equal monthly installments of $2,291.66 each. In time the city of Los Angeles and its Board of Public Service Commissioners made demand upon the auditor of the county of Los Angeles to indorse his approval of the first month's installment of rent payable under this leasehold contract. Upon his refusal so to do this action in mandate was brought, and appellant M. H. Kane, as a citizen and taxpayer of the county, was permitted to intervene therein. The intervener and the auditor filed their general demurrers to the petition. These demurrers were overruled, and judgment for petitioners followed. From this judgment the auditor and intervener have taken their appeals.

[1] The first and fundamental proposition urged upon appeal is that the legislative act is itself unconstitutional, in that it clearly and designedly authorizes taxation for a private purpose, whereas under our system of government taxes can be laid only for a public object—one within the purposes for which governments are established. Indisputably, if the Legislature has authorized the doing of this thing, its authorization, under all of the authorities, is void. Dillon, Mun. Law, §§ 84, 1351; Loan Association v. Topeka, 20 Wall. (87 U. S.) 655, 22 L. Ed. 455; Cole v. La Grange, 113 U. S. 1, 5 Sup. Ct. 416, 28 L. Ed. 896; In re Opinion of Supreme Judicial Court, 58 Me. 590; In re Opinion of the Justices, 155 Mass. 598, 30 N. E. 1142, 15 L. R. A. 809; In re Opinion of Justices, 211 Mass. 624, 98 N. E. 611, 42 L. R. A. (N. S.) 221; Union Ice & Coal Co. v. Town of Ruston, 135 La. 898, 66 South. 262, L. R. A. 1915B, 859, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 12; People v. Town of Salem, 20 Mich. 452, 4 Am. Rep. 400; In re Opinion of Justices, 204 Mass. 607, 91 N. E. 405, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 483; Attorney General v. City of Eau Claire, 37 Wis. 400; Keen v. Mayor, 101 Ga. 588, 29 S. E. 42. Respondents in answer do not contend against the soundness of this principle, nor its applicability to the construction of the Code section. They argue, however, that every court will presume in favor of the constitutionality of a legislative enactment, and wherever possible, as between two permissible constructions, will adopt that which will uphold the law, and therefore they say that this law should be construed as authorizing a county to construct, purchase, or lease a cement plant, to use its product solely for the public purposes of the county. They find confirmatory evidence of this intent in the act itself from the declaration therein contained that boards of supervisors, as to all of the powers by the Legislature conferred on them, as well as to this specific grant of power, are restrained by "such limitations and restrictions as are prescribed by law." The power to sell, so respondents further argue, will then be "limited to an authority to sell the surplus cement incidentally produced."

[2, 3] Such are the opposing views concerning the construction of this law, and to a determination of what in fact the law actually means we are thus brought. Certain phases of the matter may be at once disposed of. The general provision of section 4041 of the Political Code, which circumscribes all grants of power to boards of supervisors within "such limitations and restrictions as are prescribed by law," neither adds to nor detracts from the force and effect of the powers granted. Even if this express language were not used, those powers would still be circumscribed by the limitations and restrictions prescribed by law. It is true that, where a municipal corporation is authorized to engage in a work of a public nature, and where the character of that work is like that of purveying water or the production and sale of electric light and power to its inhabitants, it has been held that an excess or surplus beyond the needs of those inhabitants, which may arise in the prudent operation of the public works, may be disposed of to private individuals. Dillon, Mun. Corp. § 1300; Clark v. City of Los Angeles, 160 Cal. 36, 116 Pac. 722; South Pasadena v. Pasadena Land & Water Co., 152 Cal. 579, 93 Pac. 490. But it must be plain that this rule or principle can only be invoked when it has first been made manifest that the primary and principal purpose is a public one. Respondents do not contend—no one can successfully contend—that the manufacture and sale of Portland cement for commercial purposes is work of a public or municipal character, any more than would be the manufacture of bricks, the manufacture of harness, of fire engines, of ventilating apparatus, or the many hundreds of manufactured products which a municipal corporation may use in the furtherance of public affairs.

[4] Again, while in construing a legislative enactment a court will enter upon that construction with strong predilection favoring its constitutionality and seek by every legitimate means to put an interpretation upon the law which will confirm its constitutionality, there is a well-defined limit to every court's power in this regard. No court, in its effort to save a law, can properly pervert or destroy its plain meaning, and so make it express that which the Legislature itself did not declare.

> "But the courts cannot go beyond the province of legitimate construction in order to save a statute; and where the meaning is plain, words cannot be read into it or out of it for that purpose." (Lewis' Sutherland on Statutory Construction, par. 83; Rogers-Ruger Co. v. Murray, 115 Wis. 267, 91 N. W. 657, 59 L. R. A. 737, 95 Am. St. Rep. 901.

lature, since the act places no restriction upon a county as to the magnitude of the plant which it may see fit to acquire. There is no provision that the plant shall bear any relation to the actual or estimated public needs of the county purchasing it. The county of Mono, requiring, let us say, for its public needs the use of 1,000 barrels of cement a year, may purchase or lease a plant whose output is 1,000 barrels of cement a day. It requires no technical knowledge of this or of any other manufacturing industry to know that economy of production bears a direct ratio to efficiency of operation, and that the cost of production is lessened the more nearly that any manufacturing plant is operated to its maximum of production. Precisely, therefore, as any county operating any cement plant must employ skilled business methods to make the output of that plant as large as possible, so was this clearly in the contemplation of the Legislature when it conferred powers absolutely unrestricted (save in the dealings with the state and its mandatories in the matter of the sale of its surplus product). Moreover, from the nature of that product itself there could be, if force be given to respondents' construction of the act, no "surplus cement incidentally produced" demanding private sale, as is not infrequently the case in the public supply of water or hydroelectric energy. Portland cement is a product which can be carried over without deterioration. The necessary products for the needs of a county for a given year can unquestionably be closely estimated in advance by the county authorities. Their factory can therefore manufacture that amount and no more. But if there should chance to be an incidental surplus, the exigencies of the situation do not demand that that surplus should be sold, since it may safely and economically be carried over for next year's consumption. The theory therefore of a surplus "incidentally produced" is as wholly without reason as it is wholly without the purview of the law under review, which at least is founded upon the sound business principle that the county shall manufacture all the cement of which its plant is capable, and which manifestly does not contemplate that a county shall commit business harakiri by purchasing or building a cement plant with a capacity of 1,000 barrels a day to supply its needs of 1,000 barrels a year, with authority to sell only the small surplus over the 1,000 barrels a year which may be "incidentally produced." What the Legislature did was to authorize the counties of the state to engage in the general business of the manufacture and sale of Portland cement, without restriction or attempt or desire to restrict these counties to their individual public needs. And whatever change in position the exigencies of the law have forced the attorneys for the city of Los Angeles to take, it is quite apparent from a reading of the lease between the city and the county that such was the interpretation which the contracting parties put upon the law at the time they entered into their agreement.

It has been said that to save even a legislative enactment nothing can be read into it nor read out of it. The supreme test of the validity of any such law is not what may have been done under it, not, as here, what the contracting parties may by convention agree to do or not to do under it, but it is what may be done under it. Lewis' Sutherland Stat. Cons., § 107; City of Beatrice v. Wright, 72 Neb. 689, 101 N. W. 1039; State v. Stark County, 14 N. D. 368, 103 N. W. 913; Stuart v. Palmer, 74 N. Y. 183, 30 Am. Rep. 289; Minneapolis Brewing Co. v. McGillivray (C. C.) 104 Fed. 258; State v. O'Leary, 43 Mont. 157, 115 Pac. 204. No man can doubt but that under this law a county acquiring a cement plant is authorized to manufacture all of the cement which that plant can produce and sell all that it desires to private consumers. To deny this right and power under the law is to destroy the law itself and to frame a law distinctly the contrary of that which the Legislature deliberately and advisedly formulated and passed. So plain is this that respondents cannot successfully urge the severability of the statute and that a part of it can be saved by a construction limiting the cement production to the public needs of the county; for this, as we have said, would be to make a law which the Legislature has not made and which requires legislative deliberation and determination before it can be made.

The invalidity of the section of the Code thus declared renders unnecessary any detailed consideration of the contract entered into between the city of Los Angeles and the county of Los Angeles. But in exemplification of the statement above made, that the contracting parties did not in their agreement contemplate that the law designed to limit the manufacture of cement to the county needs, it may be pointed out that by the terms of the lease the county is bound to manufacture a total of 180,000 barrels of cement each year, and this without regard to the county requirements. The county may require much or little, or none at all, but it must manufacture this product and either sell it or suffer tremendous financial loss if it does not do so. Not this alone, but the city, in lieu of the cash rent which the county is to pay for the use of the plant, may exact from the county the manufacture and delivery to it—the city—of cement at an agreed price. The county further agrees to pay a royalty of 5⅝ cents per barrel on every barrel of cement manufactured. It is also to pay a depreciation charge of $11,000 a year. The city is to have the right to purchase 60,000 barrels of cement a year at a price fixed in the lease, without regard to what may be the actual market value of Portland cement at the time the city elects to take it.

All of this and much more indicate too plainly to call for discussion the fact that the contracting parties viewed this law as only it can be regarded, and for the reasons given the judgment in favor of these respondents and against the defendant auditor of Los Angeles and against the intervener is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the trial court to sustain these appellants' general demurrers to petitioner's complaint.

MILLAR v. MILLAR et al. (Sac. 2415.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑694(1)—QUESTIONS REVIEWABLE—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The question of the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain a finding cannot be considered on appeal from a judgment, where the bill of exceptions relied on contains no specification of insufficiency of evidence, and the same is true as to an appeal from an order denying new trial, where based on a bill of exceptions.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑302(6)—QUESTIONS REVIEWABLE—SPECIFICATION OF ERROR.

Where the notice of intention to move for new trial specified in general terms as a ground insufficiency of the evidence to justify the findings, decision, and judgment of the court, the general specification of the insufficiency of the evidence was not sufficient to enable the court on appeal to review the question of its sufficiency.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑241—QUESTIONS REVIEWABLE—DENIAL OF NONSUIT.

Where the only ground stated for motion for nonsuit was that there was no evidence justifying the court in granting the relief prayed for, or any relief whatever, the court on appeal could not consider the evidence to review the trial court's ruling denying the motion for nonsuit, since an appellate court will not review the finding of the trial court denying such a motion upon any ground not precisely and specifically stated in it, and where no ground is sufficiently stated will not review it at all.

4. MARRIAGE 🔑60(6) — ANNULMENT — STATUTE—"FRAUD."

The secret determination of one of the parties to a marriage, when entering into the relation, absolutely to refuse to the other sexual intercourse, a course consistently persisted in at all times after the marriage, the other party having acted in good faith, is a "fraud" within Civ. Code, § 82, subd. 4, specifying as a ground for annulment of marriage that the consent of either party was obtained by fraud, etc., since a promise made without any intent to perform constitutes actual fraud.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Fraud.]

5. MARRIAGE 🔑60(6)—ANNULMENT—FRAUD—PLEADING—STATUTE.

In a wife's suit for maintenance, the husband's cross-complaint for annulment on the ground that the wife had entered the marriage relation with the intention of refusing him sexual intercourse alleged that, owing to the wife's persistent refusal, the parties had never had marital intercourse after the marriage, and that within a reasonable time the husband notified the wife that their relations were terminated, etc., while, according to the allegations of the wife's complaint, the husband forthwith willfully failed to provide the wife with the common necessaries of life or any money. Held, that the cross-complaint sufficiently negatived the exception of Civil Code, § 82, subd. 4, providing that a marriage may be annulled, when the consent of either party was obtained by fraud, "unless such party afterwards with full knowledge of the facts constituting the fraud freely cohabited with the other as husband and wife."

6. MARRIAGE 🔑58(7)—ANNULMENT—FRAUD—WAIVER—STATUTE.

Under Civ. Code, § 82, subd. 4, making it ground for annulment of marriage if the consent of either party was obtained by fraud, unless such party afterwards, with full knowledge of the facts constituting the fraud, freely cohabited with the other as husband and wife, if a wife entered the marriage relation intending to refuse her husband sexual intercourse, thus committing a fraud upon him, and he, with full knowledge of the facts, assumed the rights of marriage, cohabiting with his wife as such, thus forming the relation notwithstanding the fraud, he waived it, and can maintain no action for annulment on account of it.

7. DIVORCE 🔑15 — MARRIAGE 🔑57 — "ANNULMENT"—"DIVORCE."

"Divorce" means the dissolution of the bonds of matrimony, based upon the theory of a valid marriage, for some cause arising after the marriage; an "annulment" proceeding is maintained on the theory that for some cause existing at the time of marriage no valid marriage ever existed, even though the marriage be only voidable at the instance of the injured party.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Divorce.]

8. MARRIAGE 🔑65—ANNULMENT—EFFECT OF DECREE.

The decree of nullity in a proceeding to annul a marriage determines that no valid marriage ever existed.

9. DIVORCE 🔑15 — ANNULMENT — STATUTE—"DIVORCE."

In view of Civ. Code, §§ 82–132, relative to nullity and dissolution of marriage and causes for denying divorce, the word "divorce," as used in Civ. Code, §§ 128, 131, 132, providing that plaintiff in actions for divorce must be a resident, etc., does not include proceedings for annulment of marriage or any action except the original action for divorce for some cause arising after marriage.

10. DIVORCE 🔑48 — MARRIAGE 🔑59 — ANNULMENT—"CONDONATION."

"Condonation," the conditional forgiveness of a matrimonial offense constituting a cause for divorce, is a defense only in the ordinary divorce action for some cause arising after marriage, and the statutory provisions as to such defense have no part in a proceeding for annulment of marriage for fraud consisting in a wife's determination to deny sexual intercourse.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Condonation.]

11. MARRIAGE 🔑65—ANNULMENT—EFFECT OF JUDGMENT.

In a wife's action for maintenance, wherein her husband cross-complained for annulment the provision of the final judgment that the wife was not entitled to recover from her husband any payment of alimony or any money whatsoever for her maintenance or otherwise merely adjudicated that the wife should not recover any alimony or sum by way of permanent maintenance, a necessary result of the decree of nullity, and the provision did not preclude the wife from collecting any money due her under order pendente lite, made for temporary support, etc.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; W. T. O'Donnell, Judge.

Action by Katherine A. Millar against Robert F. Millar and another, executor and executrix of the will of James Millar, deceased, substituted as defendants in place of James Millar. From a judgment for defendants, an order denying her motion for new trial, and an order denying her motion for further allowance of costs and counsel fees, plaintiff appeals. Judgment and orders affirmed.

Metson, Drew & Mackenzie and Roy G. Hudson, all of San Francisco (Marion De Vries, of counsel), for appellant. Frank R. Devlin, of Fairfield, and A. E. Bolton, of San Francisco, for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. Katherine Millar brought this action against James Millar for separate maintenance. Millar answered, denying the validity of the marriage, and by way of cross-complaint alleged that his consent thereto was obtained by fraud. He asked that the marriage be annulled. Judgment was given for him, annulling the marriage. The appeal is taken by plaintiff from the judgment and the order denying her motion for a new trial, and also from an order denying her motion for a further allowance of costs and counsel fees.

Millar died after the judgment had been entered and pending the appeal.

It is earnestly contended that the evidence was not sufficient to sustain certain findings of the trial court. The sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings of the trial court cannot be reviewed on the record before us.

[1] It is settled by a long line of decisions of this court that the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings cannot be considered on appeal from a judgment where the bill of exceptions relied on contains no specification of insufficiency of evidence. The same thing is true as to an appeal from an order denying a new trial where the appeal is based on a bill of exceptions. Howley v. Harrington, 152 Cal. 188, 92 Pac. 177.

[2] Some reliance is placed on the claim that the notice of intention to move for a new trial specified in general terms "insufficiency of the evidence to justify the findings, decision, and judgment of the court," but even if such a general specification were sufficient, which it is not, the notice is not included in the bill of exceptions, and constitutes no part of the record on appeal.

[3] It is further suggested that we may consider the evidence for the purpose of reviewing the ruling of the trial court denying a motion for a nonsuit. The answer to this is that the motion for a nonsuit did not sufficiently specify any ground. The only ground stated was that:

> "There is no evidence before the court justifying it in granting the relief prayed for, or any relief whatever."

It is thoroughly settled by a long line of decisions that an appellate court will not review the ruling of the trial court denying a motion for a nonsuit, upon any ground not precisely and specifically stated in the motion, and, where no ground is sufficiently stated, will not review it at all. In Miller v. Luco, 80 Cal. 261, 22 Pac. 195, the ground stated was "that plaintiffs had failed to prove a sufficient case." It was said:

> "'It is settled law in this state that a party moving for a nonsuit should state in his motion precisely the grounds on which he relied so that the attention of the court and the opposite counsel may be particularly directed to the supposed defects in the plaintiff's case.' * * * The motion made here did not comply with this rule and it was therefore properly denied."

See, also, Coffey v. Greenfield, 62 Cal. 608; Coghlan v. Quartararo, 15 Cal. App. 668, 115 Pac. 664; Sanchez v. Neary, 41 Cal. 487; Shain v. Forbes, 82 Cal. 582, 23 Pac. 198; Bronzan v. Drobaz, 93 Cal. 650, 29 Pac. 254; Durfee v. Seale, 139 Cal. 607, 73 Pac. 435. It follows from what we have said that as to all questions of fact we are concluded by the findings of the trial court, which must be taken as true for all the purposes of this appeal.

The findings of the trial court, so far as material, are substantially as follows: On January 2, 1913, a marriage was duly solemnized between the parties in San Jose. At the time of such marriage plaintiff did not intend to consummate the marriage, in that she did not intend to have sexual intercourse with Millar. She "entered into the marriage contract and the solemnization thereof with the intent that she would not consummate the marriage or fully enter into the relation arising out of the marriage contract, and entered into the same for the purpose of obtaining maintenance, support, and property from said defendant, and without any intent upon her part to perform the obligations of the contract of marriage or be anything more to the defendant than a wife in form." Ever after the marriage plaintiff persistently refused to have sexual intercourse with Millar, notwithstanding his solicitations, and without any reasonable excuse therefor, and at all times refused to occupy the same bed with him, all in pursuance of her determination existing at the time of the marriage to so refuse. By reason of her refusal, the parties have never had any sexual connection. So far as appears they did until August 15, 1913, remain together in the manner usual to husband and wife, the court finding that after the marriage, in accord with the plan theretofore made, they journeyed together to several places in the United States and back again to California. Millar entered into the marriage contract in good faith with the intent to fully perform all the obligations of the marriage relation, and then believed that plaintiff did the same, and was deceived "by the false and fraudulent consent thereto, given by plaintiff." On August 15, 1913, Millar notified plaintiff in writing substantially to the effect that because she entered into the marriage with no intent of performing the duties and obligations thereof, and persisted in refusing to perform, he "rescinded said contract," and would not contribute further toward her support and maintenance. Plaintiff's action for maintenance was commenced prior to October 31, 1913, and Millar's answer and cross-complaint were filed February 9, 1914.

1. Our Civil Code, in the section prescribing the grounds existing at the time of the marriage upon which the marriage may be annulled, specifies as one of such grounds "that the consent of either party was obtained by fraud, unless such party afterwards, with full knowledge of the facts constituting the fraud, freely cohabited with the other as husband or wife." Subdivision 4, § 82. An action based on this ground may be brought by the injured party within four years after the discovery of the facts constituting the fraud. The main question presented by this appeal, in view of the findings, is whether the secret determination of one of the parties to a marriage at the time of entering into the contract or relation of marriage to absolutely refuse to the other all sexual or "matrimonial intercourse as husband and wife," as it is termed in section 96, Civil Code, consistently persisted therein at all times after the marriage, the other party having acted in good faith, constitutes such a fraud as is included within the scope of subdivision 4, section 82, Civil Code, and warrants an annulment of the marriage.

[4] Upon further consideration of this question we are satisfied that the conclusion reached thereon in department was correct, and that the question must be answered in the affirmative. Marriage is defined by our Civil Code as:

> "A personal relation arising out of a civil contract, to which the consent of parties capable of making that contract is necessary." Section 55.

As we have seen, our law provides that when such consent on the part of either party is obtained by "fraud," the marriage may be annulled at the suit of the other, unless the fraud is waived by free cohabitation after discovery; in other words, such marriage is voidable at the instance of the injured party. As was said in Sharon v. Sharon, 75 Cal. 1, 8, 16 Pac. 345, while the contract is simply that the parties forthwith enter into the relation of marriage, "the rights and obligations of that status (relation) are fixed by society in accordance with the principles of natural law." These principles of natural law are perfectly understood, certainly in so far as the particular matter here involved is concerned. The obligation of the relation in this behalf is such, to use the language of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts in Smith v. Smith, 171 Mass. 404, 50 N. E. 933, 41 L. R. A. 800, 68 Am. St. Rep. 440, as to be "essential to the very existence of the marriage relation," a proposition as to which there appears to be no dissent in the authorities. See in this connection Sharon v. Sharon, 75 Cal. 33, 16 Pac. 345; Dickinson v. Dickinson, Law Reports (Eng.) Probate Div. 1913, p. 198. Our own statutes expressly recognize this by making it a ground for annulment of marriage "that either party was, at the time of marriage, physically incapable of entering into the marriage state, and such incapacity continues, and appears to be incurable." Subdivision 6, § 82, Civ. Code. The physical incapacity here referred to, as is thoroughly established, is the physical incapacity to consummate the marriage by coition. In consenting to a marriage, in consenting to enter that personal relation, each of the parties impliedly promises the other that he or she will perform the duties and obligations of the relation, and the promise and consent of one are given in consideration of and in reliance upon the promise and consent of the other. As it was put in Moore v. Moore, 94 Misc. Rep. 370, 157 N. Y. Supp. 819:

> "So one who goes through the marriage ceremony represents in so many words his intention and purpose to fulfill all the obligations of a husband to the woman he marries."

One who so promises and represents, thus obtaining the consent of the other, with the secret determination not to fulfill the promise, must be held to have obtained such consent of the other party by fraud—at least where the promise relates to a material matter. That a promise made without any intention of performing it constitutes actual fraud is elementary law with relation to ordinary contracts, and is expressly declared by our Civil Code. Section 1572. As said in Martin v. Lawrence, 156 Cal. 194, 103 Pac. 913:

> "Where a defendant makes a promise touching a substantive part of the consideration moving to the plaintiff, in bad faith and without intent to perform the promise, it constitutes a species of fraud well recognized in equity and in terms denounced by the Code."

We can see no good reason why this is not true with regard to the marriage relation. It may readily be conceded that a court should not annul a marriage on the ground of fraud except in extreme cases, where the particular fraud goes to the very essence of the marriage relation, and especially is this true where the marriage has been fully consummated and the parties have actually assumed all the mutual rights and duties of the relation. In such a case considerations of public policy intervene, and courts are loath to annul a marriage. See Smith v. Smith, supra. But no consideration of public policy precluding relief exists under such circumstances as are established by the findings in this case, and the authorities generally recognize that in such cases the marriage should be annulled for fraud. The latest case to which our attention has been called is that of Anders v. Anders, 224 Mass. 438, 113 N. E. 203, L. R. A. 1916E, 1273, in which it was held that the husband was entitled to a decree annulling the marriage on the ground of fraud where the woman went through the marriage ceremony solely to secure the right to appear as a married woman, secretly intending to leave the husband immediately after the ceremony, and carried the plan into effect, and where the husband was deceived and acted in good faith. Referring to the earlier case of Cowles v. Cowles, 112 Mass. 298, in which the court held that utter denial of marital intercourse was not ground for a decree of nullity, saying, "It plainly does not go to the original validity of the marriage, and affords no ground for declaring the nullity of it," the court said:

> "It is pretty plain that in deciding Cowles v. Cowles this court did not have in mind the case of a woman going through the marriage ceremony with a preconceived intention never to allow marital intercourse."

In deciding the case the court said.

> "In the case at bar the libelee went through the marriage ceremony with an intention never to perform any one of the duties of a wife. * * * That plan she carried into effect. It is well settled that a contract for the sale of goods is induced by fraud, and for that reason voidable, where the purchaser had an intention when the contract was made not to perform his promise to pay for them. If an intention not to perform his promise renders a contract for purchase of property voidable, a fortiori the same result must follow in case of a contract to enter into 'the holy estate of matrimony.'"

There is no distinction in principle between that case and the one at bar. It is true that there the intention was never to perform "any * * * of the duties of a wife," while here the intention was only as to one. But that one was of such a character as to be "essential to the very existence of the marriage relation," and the fraud was one going to the original validity of the marriage within the contemplation of section 82, subd. 4, Civil Code. It was said by the New York court in Moore v. Moore, supra, with relation to the representations implied from a consent to a marriage, "misrepresentations of purpose and intention, whether express or necessarily implied, which constitute a material fact inducing another to act, constitute a fraud affecting the validity of a contract induced thereby." In that case the marriage was annulled. We find nothing in the authorities to contravene the conclusion we have reached on this question.

That the law provides for the dissolution of the relation of marriage by divorce for specific violations after marriage by one party of duties appertaining to the relation, including the particular obligation here involved, is altogether immaterial. Such subsequent violations in no way go to the original validity of the marriage. The alleged fraud in this case is not based upon any mere violation of any duty of the marriage relation, but upon a fraudulent misrepresentation made by plaintiff at the time of the marriage, by which the consent of Millar to enter into the marriage was obtained, a matter, as we have seen, which goes to the original validity of the marriage, and renders it, at the suit of the injured party, void ab initio.

2. It is claimed that the cross-complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, in that it does not allege that immediately upon discovery of the fraud Millar ceased to cohabit with plaintiff, and also that no such condition is established by the findings. This point appears never to have been made until the petition for rehearing in this court after decision in department. No demurrer was interposed to the cross-complaint in the lower court, and the cause was apparently tried upon the theory that it sufficiently alleged a cause of action for annulment, on the ground of fraud.

[5] As we have seen, the law provides that a marriage may be annulled on this ground at the suit of the injured party "unless such party afterwards, with full knowledge of the facts constituting the fraud, freely cohabited with the other as husband and wife." It may be conceded that a complaint based on this ground should substantially negative this exception, and that the same should be substantially found. While the cross-complaint is perhaps not as precise and specific in this regard as it might have been made, we think the facts alleged and found sufficiently negative the exception declared by the statute to withstand the attack now made. It is definitely alleged, and found, that, owing to the persistent refusal of plaintiff, there was never any marital intercourse between the parties, and that, within what must be held to be a reasonable time, Millar, on account thereof, notified plaintiff that their relations were terminated, and that he would no longer contribute to her support and maintenance. According to the allegations of her complaint he thenceforth willfully failed to provide her with the common or any necessaries of life, or with any money with which to support herself. Absence of any waiver of his rights on the part of Millar sufficiently appears. We think the facts alleged and found are necessarily inconsistent with any theory that Millar "freely cohabited" with plaintiff as his wife within the meaning of subdivision 4 of section 82, Civil Code. The mere fact that they remained together, under the circumstances alleged and found, during the few months between the marriage and the separation, ostensibly as husband and wife, does not in our opinion establish such cohabitation on his part. The language used in the statute was designed to declare what conduct on the part of the injured party should conclusively establish a waiver by him of the fraud, in so far as any action for annulment was concerned.

[6] If, with full knowledge of the facts he freely assumed the rights of marriage, thus affirming the relation notwithstanding the fraud, he must be held to have waived the fraud, and is barred from any action for annulment. The cohabitation specified is cohabitation as husband and wife, and we have no manner of doubt that in the connection in which the words are used they repel the idea that the mere remaining together of the parties for the time preceding the final separation, under the circumstances alleged and found, is such cohabitation as was intended to bar an action for a decree of nullity. There was no true matrimonial cohabitation in the sense in which the words are here used, for they must be taken as meaning not simply the mere staying together of the parties ostensibly as husband and wife, but such a full and free assumption by the injured party of marital rights as fairly indicates his assent to the relationship, notwithstanding the fraud.

3. Based upon the contention that certain provisions of our Civil Code pertaining to ordinary divorce actions are applicable to actions for annulment of marriage, it is claimed that the cross-complaint of Millar failed to state a cause of action for the reason that it did not allege residence on his part in the state of California for one year and in the county where the action was brought for three months next preceding the commencement of the action (section 128, Civ. Code), and also that the final judgment entered without an interlocutory judgment having first been given is void. Sections 131 and 132, Civ. Code. This point was made for the first time in the petition for rehearing.

[7] An examination of the authorities shows that the term "divorce" has sometimes been declared to include annulment proceedings, especially where the marriage was not void in the extreme sense, but only voidable at the option of the injured party. This, however, is not in accord with modern usage. Strictly speaking the word "divorce" means a dissolution of the bonds of matrimony, based upon the theory of a valid marriage, for some cause arising after the marriage, while an annulment proceeding is maintained upon the theory that, for some cause existing at the time of marriage, no valid marriage ever existed. This is true even though the marriage be only voidable at the instance of the injured party, or in the words used in Estate of Gregorson, 160 Cal. 25, 116 Pac. 60, L. R. A. 1916C, 697, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 1124, "capable of being annulled."

[8] And the decree of nullity in such a proceeding determines that no valid marriage ever existed. The opinion in Coats v. Coats, 160 Cal. 671, 118 Pac. 441, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 844, shows this to have then been the view of this court, and it was clearly enough stated in the opinion that there was no statutory provision applicable to annulment proceedings for the apportionment of what would be community property if the marriage was valid, although complete provision for the disposition of community property in the event of "the dissolution of the marriage by the decree of a court of competent jurisdiction" was made by section 146, Civil Code. The broader meaning is, however, often given to the word "divorce" by reason of the manner in which it is used in statutory provisions.

[9] But we can see no warrant in our own statute for holding that, as used in sections 128, 131, and 132, Civil Code, it includes annulment proceedings, or any action except the ordinary action for divorce for some cause arising after marriage. These sections are in terms confined to actions for divorce. They are all contained in article 3 of chapter 2, tit. 1, part 3, of the Civil Code, an article entitled "Causes for Denying Divorce." The preceding article (2) is entitled "Dissolution of Marriage," while article 1 is entitled "Nullity," and contains full provision for the annulment of marriage for specified causes existing at the time of marriage. A careful reading of the provisions of these three articles makes it apparent to us that the provisions of article 3 (causes for denying divorce) relate only to the actions referred to in article 2. Article 1, as we have seen, treats fully of the annulment of marriages, prescribes the various periods of time within which actions therefor may be brought, and recognizes that a judgment of nullity is conclusive as against the parties. The first section of article 2 (section 90) declares that:

> "Marriage is dissolved only: One. By death of one of the parties; or, Two. By the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction decreeing a divorce of the parties."

There follows, in section 92, a statement of the causes for which "divorces" may be granted, which statement is, of course, exclusive of all other causes, and which specifies only causes arising after marriage. Then follow definitions of the various grounds of divorce so specified. It is obvious that the term "divorce" is nowhere used in this article as including a proceeding for or a decree of nullity. Coming to article 3 (causes for denying divorce) we find that section 3 provides that divorce must be denied upon showing connivance, or collusion, or condonation, or recrimination, or limitation or lapse of time. A reading of the sections defining the first four of these things shows that they can refer only to the divorce actions treated in article 2. As to the matter of limitations or lapse of time it is provided in this article, in section 127, that:

> "There are no limitations of time for commencing actions for divorce, except such as are contained in section one hundred and twenty-four."

Section 124, in the same article, prescribes the time as to all such actions. Section 83 in article 1, relating to nullity, prescribes the period of limitation as to all action for nullity. It is in this article (3) that we find section 128 providing that "a divorce must not be granted" unless the plaintiff has certain qualifications of residence in the state and county where the action is brought, section 130 providing that "no divorce can be granted upon the default of the defendant," etc., and sections 131 and 132 relating to interlocutory and final decrees "in actions for divorce," all designed to guard against fraudulent dissolutions of valid marriages, or to discourage resort to an action for such a dissolution with a view to a hasty marriage with another, and to afford a time between interlocutory and final decree within which the parties to a valid marriage may be reconciled and the status maintained. It seems to us to be too clear for question that the divorce action referred to in all these provisions is the ordinary action for divorce referred to in article 2, and that it does not include nullity proceedings. As against this view is simply the fact that the chapter containing these articles (chapter 2) is entitled "Divorce," and that as there used in this very general way the term includes annulment proceedings, as well as divorce proceedings. Dunphy v. Dunphy, 161 Cal. 87, 92, 118 Pac. 445. It was said in the opinion in the case just cited that:

> "It may well be argued that such provisions in the subdivision entitled 'General Provisions' (article 4) as are appropriate in actions for annulment are applicable thereto."

However, even this was not decided, and it was distinctly declared in effect in Coats v. Coats, supra, that section 146 (contained in article 4) does not apply to nullity proceedings. And we are not concerned here with any of these "general provisions." In view of the more specific headings of the various articles, and the nature of their provisions, we are satisfied that, notwithstanding the use of the word "Divorce" as the title of the chapter, the term "divorce" in article 3 cannot be fairly construed as including nullity proceedings.

[10] 4. It is claimed that the evidence was such as to require a finding on the question of "condonation," even though there was nothing in the pleadings attempting to set up any such defense. Regardless of all other answers that might be made to this claim, it is sufficient to say that "condonation" is a defense only in the ordinary divorce action for some cause arising after marriage, and is defined as being "the conditional forgiveness of a matrimonial offense constituting a cause of divorce." The statutory provisions as to this defense can play no part in the present proceeding. We have already seen that there was no waiver of the fraud which was the basis of this action for annulment.

[11] 5. As to the appeal on the ground of error in the matter of alimony, costs, and counsel fees, the only point now made is as to the provision of the final judgment "that the plaintiff * * * is not entitled to have or recover of or from James A. Millar, the defendant, any payment of alimony, or any payment of money whatsoever for her maintenance or otherwise." It is urged that this is an adjudication that plaintiff was not entitled to any alimony pendente lite, or costs or counsel fees necessary to enable her to maintain the action. It seems to us that learned counsel for plaintiff mistake the purpose and effect of this provision of the judgment. To our minds it has no reference whatever to any of these matters. The action was, as we have seen, one by plaintiff for permanent alimony or maintenance, and the provision complained of is in response to her claims in that regard, and nothing else. It simply adjudicates that she shall not recover any such alimony or sum by way of permanent maintenance, a necessary result of the decree of nullity. If under any order pendente lite made for temporary support, or payment of costs or counsel fees, money is still due her, she is not precluded by this provision of the judgment from collecting it. Nor do we think the injunctive provision of the judgment refers to this matter, and we cannot see how it in any degree prejudicially affects plaintiff.

We can see in this record no sufficient warrant for disturbing the judgment of the superior court. No point is now made as to the order denying a further allowance of costs and counsel fees.

The judgment and orders appealed from are affirmed.

In re WHITNEY'S ESTATE. WHEELER v. LANDERS et al. WHITNEY v. SAME.

1. PERPETUITIES ⟹6(3)—SUSPENDING POWER OF ALIENATION.

Testator gave the residue of his estate in trust for the use and purposes set forth in his will. The residue was to be treated as a whole until his son V. became 35 years old or until the son's death if he died earlier. During such period there was to be paid to each child a stated sum per month, and at the end of the period the residue was to be divided into three equal parts. One part was to be conveyed to V. if he lived to be 35 years old; if not, to be held in trust for his issue. The second part was to be held in trust for P. and his issue, and the third part for H. and her issue, "in the manner hereinafter provided." Upon the distribution into parts it was provided substantially with reference to the one-third share of each child that there should be paid to him a stated amount each year, and that, "if at the time of his death his youngest child, if a son, shall have arrived at the age of twenty-one years or if a daughter, shall have arrived at the age of eighteen years, the third of the property held for his benefit shall be distributed equally among his children. * * * In case the youngest child at the time of his death shall not have arrived at the age mentioned above the property shall be held in trust until the youngest child shall have arrived at the age designated and then the property shall be distributed among his issue as aforesaid." In case of the death of a child of testator without issue the third of the property held for his benefit was to go in equal parts to the others or to the trust for their issue. Civ. Code, § 749, provides that the death of the testator is to be deemed the time of the creation of the limitation, condition or interest. Section 716 declares that every future interest is void which by any possibility may suspend the power of alienation longer than the Code permits. Held, that the limitations of the will created future interests which suspend the absolute power of alienation for a longer period than during the continuance of lives in being at the death of testator in violation of Civ. Code, § 715, making the limitation void in its creation.

2. WILLS 🔑473—TRUST INVALID IN PART—SEPARATION.

As the remainders over after the death of testator's children were not remainders vesting at their death respectively, but only when the youngest surviving child became of age, they were void, and the trust for that purpose being incapable of separation from the trust otherwise valid, the entire disposition in trust must be held invalid.

3. WILLS 🔑440—CONSTRUCTION—INTENT OF TESTATOR.

The intent of the testator must be determined by the language of his will.

4. WILLS 🔑448—CONSTRUCTION—AVOIDING INTESTACY.

Where there is doubt as to the meaning of a will, that interpretation is to be preferred which will avoid intestacy.

5. WILLS 🔑629—CONSTRUCTION—VESTED REMAINDERS.

A construction that, a remainder is vested is to be taken rather than one which would make such remainder contingent.

6. PERPETUITIES 🔑9(1) — ACCUMULATION OF INCOME.

As the effect of the provisions as to the income of the property after the death of the testator was to provide for an accumulation of all income in excess of monthly allowances, the children being adults, the provisions were void as contrary to Civ. Code, §§ 722–726, forbidding the accumulation of income except for the benefit of minors in being during their minority.

7. WILLS 🔑800 — ELECTION TO TAKE—CONSTRUCTION.

The wife elected "to accept and acquiesce in the provisions of said will and hereby waive all claims to my share of any community property and any all other claims that I may have upon any of the estate disposed of by the said will." Held, that such waiver was not a waiver of the widow's right to claim a share under the law of succession in any property of decedent of which the will made no valid disposition.

Department 1. Appeals from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Joel Parker Whitney, deceased. From an order denying her petition for partial distribution, Helen Beryl Whitney Wheeler appeals, and from an order denying his separate petition for partial distribution, Parker Whitney appeals. Orders reversed.

See, also, 171 Cal. 753, 154 Pac. 855.

W. T. Plunkett, Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo. J. Roche, Louis V. Crowley, and James P. Sweeney, all of San Francisco, for appellants. Corbet & Selby, of San Francisco, for respondent trustees and others. Cushing & Cushing, of San Francisco, for respondent widow. Hamilton A. Bauer, of San Francisco, for respondent guardian of minors.

SHAW, J. Two appeals are presented by the records in the cases above entitled. No. 7778 is an appeal by Helen Beryl Whitney Wheeler from an order denying her petition for partial distribution of the estate of Joel Parker Whitney, deceased. No. 7834 is an appeal by Parker Whitney from an order denying his separate petition for a partial distribution of said estate.

The questions involved in the two appeals are substantially the same and they may as well be considered together. The two appellants are children of the testator. Each claims a right to partial distribution before final settlement on the ground that the time for presenting claims has expired; that the estate is but little indebted; that a large part of the assets is in condition for distribution; and that said decedent, although he left a will which has been duly admitted to probate, made no valid or lawful disposition of his estate thereby. All of these grounds are conceded, except the asserted invalidity of the will, and that is the only question presented for consideration.

Joel Parker Whitney died on January 17, 1913. He left surviving as his only heirs at law his widow, Lucy Whitney, and his three children, namely, Parker Whitney, Vincent Whitney, and Helen Beryl Whitney Wheeler. His estate consisted of the capital stock of the Whitney Estate Company, a California corporation, appraised at $847,821.15, and two parcels of real property, one in Maine, worth $2,000, and one in Colorado, worth $7,500. After the satisfaction of certain legacies and devises, the will gave the residue, which the court found to be of the value of $839,271.15, to three persons named, as trustees, in trust for the uses and purposes set forth in the will.

The general plan of this trust was that the widow should receive the sum of $1,200 per month during her life, in lieu of all other interests and rights she might have in the estate, including her rights in the community property, if any; that the said residue should be treated as a whole until his son Vincent became 35 years old, or until his death, if he died earlier; that during that period there should be paid to each child $300 per month, and that at the end of that period the residue should be "divided or distributed into three equal parts"; that one part should be transferred and conveyed to Vincent absolutely, if he lived to be 35 years old, if not, then to be held in trust for his issue, subject to a provision to be made for his widow; that the second one of the parts should be "held in trust for the benefit of Parker and his issue in the manner hereinafter provided"; and that the third of said parts should be "held in trust for the benefit of Helen Beryl and her issue in the manner hereinafter provided."

[1] The contention of the appellants is that the limitations of the will create future interests which suspend the absolute power of alienation for a longer period than during the continuance of lives in being at the death of the testator. Such suspension is forbidden by sections 715 and 749 of the Civil Code. It is also claimed that the will provides for unlawful accumulations of the income of the property, contrary to provisions of the Civil Code on that subject. Sections 723 to 726. The limitations attacked are those providing for the disposition of the property after the division of the residue into three parts as above mentioned.

The time of the death of the testator is deemed to be the time of the "creation of the limitation, condition, or future interest" declared to be void by the Code sections above mentioned. Civ. Code, § 749. Section 716 declares that "every future interest is void in its creation which, by any possibility," may suspend the power of alienation longer than the Code permits. This possibility is to be determined by the conditions existing "at the time of the creation" of the limitation or future interests, that is, at the time of the death of the testator.

> "The statute does not permit us to wait and see whether events may not so transpire that in fact no perpetuity results, but if under the terms of the deed or will creating the trust, when properly construed, the instrument 'by any possibility may suspend' the absolute power of alienation beyond the continuance of lives in being, the instrument, whether a deed or will, is void, and no trust is created nor any estate vested in the trustees." Estate of Steele, 124 Cal. 537, 57 Pac. 564; Gray on Perpetuities, § 231.

The limitations in favor of the issue of Vincent, in case of his death before becoming 35 years of age, are similar, so far as the objections under consideration are concerned, to those for the issue of Parker and Helen. It is therefore unnecessary to state more fully the terms of those limitations. The questions may be as well determined by a consideration of the language of the will relating to the disposition of the shares of Parker and Helen.

With respect to the shares of Parker and Helen, the first declaration of the will is that, upon the division or distribution into parts:

> "The second of these three parts shall be held in trust for the benefit of my son Parker and his issue, in the manner hereinafter provided, and the third of these three parts shall be held in trust for the benefit of my daughter Helen Beryl and her issue, in the manner hereinafter provided."

The special provision as to the share of Parker is:

> "The third of the property set apart for the benefit of my son Parker and his issue * * * shall be held and disposed of as follows: * * *
> "There shall be paid to my said son Parker the sum of thirty-six hundred dollars a year in equal monthly payments of three hundred dollars so long as he shall live. If at the time of his death his youngest child, if a son, shall have arrived at the age of twenty-one years, or, if a daughter, shall have arrived at the age of eighteen years, the third of the property heretofore held for his benefit shall be distributed equally among his children, the children of any deceased child taking by right of representation, the trustees retaining in their hands during the life of my wife a sufficient amount of the property to pay four hundred dollars a month to my wife as one-third of the provision for her. In case his youngest child at the time of his death shall not have arrived at the age mentioned, above, the property shall be held in trust for the benefit of his children until the youngest child shall arrive at the age designated, and then the property shall be distributed among his issue as aforesaid. In case my son Parker shall die without leaving issue, the third of the property theretofore held for his benefit shall go in equal parts, one-half to my son Vincent, subject to the charge for the benefit of my wife, or to the trust for his issue, and the other half to the trust for the benefit of my daughter Helen Beryl and her issue."

As to Helen's share it is:

> "The third of the property set apart for the benefit of Helen Beryl and her issue * * * shall be held and disposed of as follows:
> "There shall be paid to my daughter Helen Beryl the sum of thirty-six hundred dollars a year in equal monthly payments of three hundred dollars, and the trustees acting unanimously at any time shall have the power to increase the income paid to my said daughter to the full amount of the net income derived from the property held for her benefit, after deducting the amount required to provide one-third of the amount required for the monthly payments to my wife.
> "Upon the death of my daughter Helen Beryl, so much of the income as the trustees shall consider appropriate and necessary shall be paid to her issue until her youngest child, if a son, shall have arrived at the age of twenty-one years, or, if a daughter, shall have arrived at the age of eighteen years, when the third of the property theretofore held for the benefit of my daughter Helen Beryl shall be distributed equally among her children, the children of any deceased child taking the parent's share by right of representation, the trustees retaining in their hands during the life of my wife a sufficient amount of the property to pay four hundred dollars a month to my wife as one-third of the provision for her.
> "In case my daughter Helen Beryl shall die without leaving issue, the share of the property which would have been or shall have been held for her benefit shall be divided equally one-half to my son Vincent, subject to the charge for the benefit of my wife, or to the trust for the benefit of his issue, and the other half to the trust for the benefit of my son Parker and his issue."

If the effect of these provisions, in the possible event that a child shall die leaving a minor child or children, is that the title to the share is to be held by the trustees thereafter until the youngest child is of age, and shall at that time, and not before, become vested in those of the issue that may then be living and the children, if any, of any deceased child, then it would constitute a gift to a class of persons, not in being at the death of the testator, and neither the number of the class nor the persons who are to compose the class could be known or ascertained until the youngest surviving child became of age. See Civ. Code, § 1337. Such remainder would be a future contingent interest which could not be aliened, until the child became of age. Civ. Code, §§ 693, 695. Then, for the first time, the persons who are to own it would become known. That event must occur after the termination of the life of the child of the testator. From the death of such child, until the youngest of such issue became of age the power of alienation would be suspended, contrary to section 715, aforesaid. Estate of Cavarly, 119 Cal. 409, 51 Pac. 629. Under section 716, such limitation would be void in its creation.

If these dispositions of the remainder in the shares of Helen and Parker are void for the reasons stated, the result is that the decedent made no testamentary disposition of that portion of his estate; that he died intestate as to that part of his property and the same descended at his death to his heirs at law according to our law of succession. The share set apart for Helen and her issue would not, in that event, go entirely to her issue, as the testator intended, upon the arrival of her youngest child at majority, nor even to her heirs exclusively at her death. It would go to the heirs of the testator, and would vest in them at his death, and not at the death of Helen. If it was his community property, his widow would take one-half, and the three children would each take one-sixth of this remainder in the one-third part directed to be set apart to Helen. If it was his separate property, the widow would take one-third and each child two-ninths. The court did not find on the issue whether it was community property or separate property.

[2] Nothing can be clearer than the proposition that the testator did not intend that his widow, or either of the other children, should have any part of the share so set apart to one child, except in the contingency he provided for; that is, the death of one of his children without issue. To do this would destroy a very material part of the plan of the testator for the disposition of his estate, and would produce a result which he did not contemplate and to which it cannot be supposed that he did consent or would have consented.

Where a will or deed disposes of property upon trusts for several purposes, some of which are valid and some void, the "valid trusts should not be disregarded because in the instrument creating them one particular invalid trust is declared, unless the latter is so inseparably blended with the others that it cannot be eliminated without destroying the main intent of the trustor, or working manifest injustice to other beneficiaries." Estate of Willey, 128 Cal. 11, 60 Pac. 471. If the elimination of the void trust causes no important practical change in the testator's general scheme, if such void trust is not essential thereto, and does not impair the validity of the other dispositions of the will, it may be cut off and the other dispositions allowed to stand. Manice v. Manice, 43 N. Y. 381. If the trust created "is of such a nature as to make it indivisible, and incapable of being carried out as to that trust which is clearly legal, because of the * * * invalidity of the other trust," the whole trust must be held void. Nellis v. Rickard, 133 Cal. 620, 66 Pac. 32, 85 Am. St. Rep. 227.

"The question whether the valid clauses can stand depends upon whether or not the invalid ones are so interwoven with them that they cannot be eliminated without interfering with and changing the main scheme of the testator. In Darling v. Rogers, 22 Wend. [N. Y.] 495, Senator Verplanck correctly stated the rule as follows: 'When a will is good in part and bad in part, the part otherwise valid is void if it works such a distribution of the estate as, from the whole testament taken together, was evidently never the design of the testator. Otherwise when a good part is so far independent that it would have stood had the testator been aware of the invalidity of the rest.'" Estate of Fair, 132 Cal. 540, 60 Pac. 442, 64 Pac. 1000, 84 Am. St. Rep. 70.

The conclusion necessarily follows that, if these remainders over after death of the testator's children are not remainders vesting at their deaths, respectively, but only when the youngest surviving child shall become of age, they are void, that the trust for that purpose is incapable of being separated from the trusts otherwise valid, and that the entire disposition in trust must be declared void. It is therefore necessary to determine whether, by the terms of the will, these remainders are to vest at the death of the respective children, or afterward, upon the coming of age of the youngest child.

[3-5] The intention of a testator must be determined by the language of his will. Where there is doubt as to its meaning, that interpretation is to be preferred which will avoid intestacy as to the whole or any part of the estate. Le Breton v. Cook, 107 Cal. 416, 40 Pac. 552; Civ. Code, § 1326. A construction which leads to the conclusion that a remainder is vested is to be taken rather than one which would make such remainder contingent. Williams v. Williams, 73 Cal. 102, 14 Pac. 394.

Giving due weight to these rules and policies, we are nevertheless unable to reach the conclusion that the will provides that the interests of the children of Parker, if one is a minor, shall vest on the death of the parent. On the contrary, the only reasonable interpretation of its language is that the title to such remainder is to remain in the trustees until his youngest child becomes of age, and is at that time to be distributed by the trustees, and is then to vest in his children then living and the children then living of any deceased child, and that the same meaning must be given to the provisions as to the like remainder in the Helen one-third.

The will declares at the outset that the residue is given, devised, and bequeathed "to the trustees, in trust, for the uses and purposes hereinafter mentioned." The title to the whole residue is thereby vested in the trustees. Of necessity it must remain in them so long as the duties of the trust require them to deal with the title, or to dispose of the property. The "estate" so vested in them passes out of them, or "ceases," only when the purposes for which the trust was created, as to any particular share, are accomplished, or have "ceased," as the Code expresses it. Civ. Code, § 871. The effect of the first provision above quoted regarding these two parts, or shares, as to the Parker share, for example, is not that the title to the remainder shall at his death go to, or vest in, his issue, but that such title shall remain in the trustees, to be by them "held in trust for the benefit of my son Parker and his issue in the manner hereinafter provided." The provision as to the Helen share is the same.

Looking into the "manner hereinafter provided," we find that the provision for the disposition upon the death of Parker leaving a minor child surviving contains no word or phrase purporting to transmit the title or estate at that time from the trustees to his issue or children, or which purports to make any change at that point of time in the title. The trust does not then cease. On the contrary, the provision is that "the property shall be held in trust (that is, by the trustees in whom the title still remains) for the benefit of his children" thereafter, until the youngest child becomes of age. The opening phrase regarding the disposition by the trustees of this share, the words, "The third of the property set apart for the benefit of my son Parker and his issue," does not aid the respondent on this point. That is not a declaration that the property is set apart to Parker or to his issue, but that it is or has been set apart "for the benefit of" Parker and his issue, and it implies that the property is to be held by the trustees and disposed of by them as directed; that is, when the youngest minor child becomes of age after Parker's death. There is no direction that any title to or estate in that share shall pass out of the trustees in any manner until the event last mentioned occurs. The only words providing for the transmission of title to this future interest by or from the trustees are those directing that, when the youngest child becomes of age, "then the property shall be distributed among his issue as aforesaid"; that is, equally, the children of any deceased child "taking by right of representation." This clause defines the manner in which this remainder held in trust is to be disposed of by the trustees, and it is the only clause that does define it. The trust would then terminate, because no further duties or powers are left for the trustees to perform regarding that share. The use of the word "taking" in the phrase "the children of any deceased child taking by right of representation" implies that the ultimate beneficiaries are to take the property; that is, that they are to receive the title thereto. And since it could not be determined until that time who would be the persons entitled to take, or the proportion going to each, the necessary implication is that the persons who are to take are the children and grandchildren, as the case may be, then surviving, and that the heirs, as such, of any who had in the meantime died, would not take any interest. The widow of a deceased child would be an heir, but would not take. Under these circumstances the provision that the property shall then be distributed to the designated class should be construed to mean that the property previously held by the trustees shall then vest in and be delivered to the persons composing the class.

While the provisions as to Helen's share are not couched in precisely the same words, there is no substantial difference in meaning, and the same conclusions follow. The same result would be declared as to Vincent's part in the event, possible at the time of the creation of the trust, that he should die under the age of 35 years.

[6] It is to be further noted that the effect of the provisions concerning the income of the property after the death of the testator is to provide for an accumulation of all of the income in excess of $2,100 a month and such additional allowance as the trustees may give to Helen, if there should be such excess. The three children were adults at the death of the testator. These provisions are void, so far as they provide for such accumulations during the lives of the three children, because they are contrary to sections 722 to 726, inclusive, of the Civil Code, forbidding accumulations of income except for the benefit of minors in being and during their minority.

The result is that the dispositions of these remainders are void, that the testator died intestate as to that portion of his estate, and that, as this trust cannot be separated from the others without changing the dispositions intended by the testator and practically making a new will, the entire trust provision is void. The trustees took no title to or interest in the property.

In Estate of Yates, 170 Cal. 254, 149 Pac. 555, cited by respondents, there were words denoting a clear intent to vest the title to the bequests in the beneficiaries at the death of the testator; the time of delivery only being postponed. The case is not in point here. The law is thus stated in Estate of Blake, 157 Cal. 459, 108 Pac. 287:

> "The general rule is that where the legacy or devise is given to a person to be paid at a future time, it vests immediately. When, however, it is not given until a future time, it is contingent, and does not vest until that time occurs."

The decision in Estate of Winter, 114 Cal. 186, 45 Pac. 1063, is to the same effect and the language of the will there construed is substantially the same as that of the limitation here involved.

[7] A further statement is necessary in regard to the rights of the widow of the testator. The will declared that it was the intention of the testator thereby to dispose of all of his property, including any community property in California, "with the written consent and acceptance" of his wife. It directs the trustees, out of the residue given to them in trust, to pay to his wife $1,200 a month from the time of his death until her death, and makes certain specific bequests to her which are not embraced in the residue. Attached to the will was an instrument, executed by the wife on the day of the execution of the will, whereby she declared:

> That she had read the will, and that, "clearly understanding that my said husband by his said will, disposes not only of all his individual property, but also all of our community property, in case there is any such, including my half as well as his own, I hereby elect to accept and acquiesce in the provisions of the said will, and hereby waive all claims to my share of any community property, and any and all other claims that I may have upon any of the estate disposed of by the said will, being fully convinced in my own mind of the reasonable and proper character of the said will, and the wisdom of its provisions, and hereby accepting such of the said provisions as apply to or concern me."

We are satisfied that this instrument, under the circumstances of this case, does not waive the widow's rights to claim a share, under the law of succession, in any property of the decedent of which the will makes no valid disposition. By its terms she waived only such claims as she had upon property disposed of by the will. Her annuity was to be paid by the trustees out of the residue given to them to be held in trust. It was in consideration of this annuity, the payment of which was made a paramount charge upon the trust property, that she elected to waive all claims to the other avails of the residue and in the corpus thereof. Now that the trust disposition of the residue must be declared void, the trustees will have no property, and she can receive nothing from them. Justice requires that she be relieved of her election and restored to her legal rights as widow and heir in the residue. The sums already paid to her on the annuity will be chargeable against her as advances upon her share.

The will stands as to the special legacies, amounting to something over $16,000. The disposition of the residue to trustees being void, such residue must be distributed according to the law of succession, and, upon the facts found and admitted, both Parker and Helen were entitled to partial distribution.

The respective orders denying partial distribution are reversed.

In re WHITTINGTON. (Cr. 557.)

EXTRADITION ⚷30—"FUGITIVE FROM JUSTICE."

One is not a fugitive from justice from the state of Texas, so as to be subject to extradition thereto, where, having been arrested in that state for an offense there committed, he was with permission of its authorities taken on process under extradition to the state of California, there to answer to a charge of having committed a crime, though the latter charge was later dismissed.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Fugitive from Justice.]

In the matter of the application by Calvin K. Whittington for writ of habeas corpus. Petition discharged.

William Thomas Helms, Frank Dominguez, Milton Cohen, and Guy Eddie, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner. F. W. Shelley, Deputy Dist. Atty., of Los Angeles, for respondents.

JAMES, J. Petitioner herein claims to be illegally restrained of his liberty, and prosecutes this writ for the purpose of securing discharge from custody of the police authorities of the city of Los Angeles and from the custody of the sheriff of Tarrant county, state of Texas. The latter officer claims the right to the custody of the petitioner under the authority of a warrant of rendition issued by the Governor of California upon a requisition made by the Governor of Texas.

The facts shown are these: Petitioner was heretofore arrested in the state of Texas, for a crime alleged to have been there committed, and was taken into custody by the peace officers at Ft. Worth. While there held in custody a requisition issued by the Governor of California was honored by the Governor of the state of Texas. This requisition upon the Governor of Texas was made upon a showing that petitioner here had theretofore committed the crime of murder in the state of California. The police authorities at Ft. Worth, upon having presented to them the Governor's warrant of that state then in the hands of the agent of the state of California, relinquished control and custody of the petitioner, and he was immediately taken under the warrant mentioned to the state of California to answer to the charge of murder. The latter charge was not pressed to trial in California. It was dismissed or otherwise disposed of, whereupon the Governor of Texas made requisition upon the Governor of California to have petitioner returned to Texas to answer to the same offense for the alleged commission of which he was held under arrest at the time the police authorities of Ft. Worth relinquished him into the hands of the state agent to be returned to California. Petitioner has never been released from custody since he was first arrested in the state of Texas for the crime there alleged to have been committed by him.

It is his contention now that under these facts he cannot be considered as being a fugitive from justice, within the meaning of that term as it is included in section 2 of article 4 of the Constitution of the United States. That provision is, in part, as follows:

> "A person charged in any state with treason, felony, or other crime, who shall flee from justice, and be found in another state, shall, on demand of the executive authority of the state from which he fled, be delivered up to be removed to the state having jurisdiction of the crime."

No serious contention is urged as to the right of the court upon habeas corpus to go behind the warrant of rendition and inquire as to the matter here put in issue. It is the contention, however, of respondents that whenever, upon examination of the question, it appears that the person sought to be extradited has committed a crime in a sister state, and is found within the state issuing the warrant of rendition, it must be at once concluded that such person is a fugitive from justice, and that the inquiry there ends. We are cited to People v. Pinkerton, 17 Hun (N. Y.) 199; Roberts v. Reilly, 116 U. S. 80, 6 Sup. Ct. 291, 29 L. Ed. 544; Appleyard v. Massachusetts, 203 U. S. 223, 27 Sup. Ct. 122, 51 L. Ed. 161, 7 Ann. Cas. 1073; State v. Richter, 37 Minn. 436, 35 N. W. 9. These cases are all harmonious to the point that the question of the motive or intent of a person who, having committed a crime in one state, leaves that state and is apprehended in another jurisdiction, is immaterial, and that it will be presumed that his leaving the state within which the offense was committed was with intent to avoid prosecution therefor. Some very broad language is used in People v. Pinkerton, supra, where the court says:

> "The charge that he committed a crime in that state, coupled with the fact that he is found in this state, is conclusive upon the question whether he is a fugitive from justice."

None of these cases present facts which fit those illustrated by the evidence before us, in that no question was involved as to the act of the accused in departing from the state being other than one governed by his own volition and not under the compulsion of legal process, and therein we think lies a most important distinction. In this case the petitioner had been taken into custody to answer to the charge pending in the state of Texas, and the authorities there voluntarily turned him over to the agent of the state of California, to be brought here to answer for the offense alleged to have been committed in California. The California authorities held him in custody, and, deciding finally not to prosecute him in this state, continued to restrain him of his liberty, and delivered him into the custody of the agent from the state of Texas, to be taken back there to answer for the crime which he was not permitted to have trial of when first arrested. This we think may not be done. Cases have arisen where a person, having committed a crime in state A, has appeared in state B, there committed another crime, and in turn fled to state C, from which latter state he has been extradited, and returned to state B. After the authorities of state B no longer desired to hold the prisoner, state A has sought by requisition to extradite him, and the accused by habeas corpus has presented the question that, having been brought forcibly back into state B from state C, he could not be returned to state A without being first allowed his liberty. The courts have held in such a case that the controlling fact against the prisoner was that he left state A in the first instance through his own volition, and therefore became a fugitive from justice in whatever state he might thereafter be apprehended. Some of these cases are referred to in Hackney v. Welsh, 107 Ind. 253, 8 N. E. 141, 57 Am. Rep. 101. The court there in remanding the prisoner lays particular stress upon the fact that the accused was shown to have voluntarily departed from the state which sought his extradition.

We find no cause to dispute the proposition, as announced in the authorities cited by respondents, that where a person has committed a crime in one state, and is found in another state, he will be presumed to have fled from the jurisdiction of the first. But in this case the prisoner did not leave the state of Texas by any voluntary act of his own. He was taken out of the state against his will and under compulsory process, at a time when the state of Texas had him in custody, with full right and power to prosecute him for the offense for which it now seeks to have him returned. Not only may it be said that he is not a fugitive, because he did not voluntarily leave that state, but because, also, the state of Texas voluntarily relinquished the jurisdiction of its courts over his person and waived its right to thereafter have him brought back from the California jurisdiction to answer for the same offense. In an argumentative way the case of Hess v. Grimes, 5 Kan. App. 763, 48 Pac. 596, is authority for the conclusion last announced.

The prayer of the petition is granted, and petitioner is ordered to be discharged from the custody of respondents.

PEOPLE v. LENSEN. (Cr. 396.)

GRAND JURY 🔑5—JURORS—QUALIFICATIONS—WOMEN—"MEN."

The word "men," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 190, defining a jury as "a body of men," and section 192, providing that a grand jury is "a body of men," did not include women, notwithstanding Pen. Code, § 7, providing that words used in the masculine gender include feminine; hence an indictment presented by a grand jury of 11 men and 8 women, prior to the amendments approved May 29, 1917 (St. 1917, p. 1282), was not "found as prescribed in this Code," within the meaning of Pen. Code, § 995, providing that such indictments be set aside.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Men.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Modoc County; Clarence A. Raker, Judge.

R. E. Lensen was convicted of crime, and he appeals from the judgment and from orders denying his motions for a new trial and to set aside the indictment. Order denying new trial reversed, with direction to grant motion to set aside the indictment.

Jamison & Wylie, of Alturas, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CHIPMAN, P. J. The defendant is charged by indictment with having sold alcoholic liquors in violation of the statute. On his arraignment, he filed a motion to set aside the indictment upon the ground that the grand jury that found and presented the indictment was not a legal grand jury, in that it was composed of only 11 men; that is to say, it was composed of 11 men and 8 women, and that 12 men did not concur in finding the indictment. He was tried by a jury, and convicted, filed his motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and was sentenced to pay a fine of $400. It is now specified as error: (1) That the court overruled defendant's motion to set aside the indictment; (2) that there was no evidence presented by the prosecution to the jury that the alleged beer, which the defendant was charged with selling, contained in excess of 1 per cent. of alcohol.

We do not think it necessary to notice other than the first assignment of error. At the time this indictment was found, section 192 of the Code of Civil Procedure read as follows:

"A grand jury is a body of men, nineteen in number, returned in pursuance of law, from the citizens of a county, or city and county, before a court of competent jurisdiction, and sworn to inquire of public offense committed or triable within the county, or city and county."

Since the first statutory enactment in 1863, defining a grand jury, the law has remained unchanged. A "jury" is defined by section 190 of the Code of Civil Procedure to consist of "a body of men." Section 990 of the Penal Code provides that the defendant may, upon his arraignment, move to set aside the indictment; and by section 995 of the Penal Code, it is provided that the indictment must be set aside by the court in which the defendant is arraigned:

"(1) Where it is not found, indorsed, and presented as prescribed in this Code."

Unless it can be said that in the enactment of these provisions of law it was intended that women should be regarded as qualified to act as members of a grand jury, we cannot hold that an indictment presented by women or by 12 members of a grand jury, one of said 12 necessarily being a woman, would be an indictment "found" as prescribed by law.

"A jury is a body of men summoned and sworn to decide upon the facts in issue at the trial." Hunnel v. State, 86 Ind. 431, 434.

"A jury is a body of men temporarily selected from the qualified inhabitants of a particular district, and invested with power (1) to present or indict a person for a public offense. * * *" Ann. Codes & Stats. Or. 1901, par. 959; Ballinger's Ann. Codes & Stats. Wash. 1897, par. 4730.

"Forsyth, in his History of Trial by Jury, published in 1852, says: 'The distinctive characteristic of the system is this: That the jury consists of a body of men taken from the community at large, summoned to find the truth of disputed facts.'" Hopkins v. Nashville, C. & St. L. R., 96 Tenn. 409, 34 S. W. 1029, 1031, 32 L. R. A. 354.

"Trial by jury is by 12 free and lawful men, who are not of kin to either party, for the purpose of establishing the truth of the matter in issue." Smith v. Times Pub. Co., 178 Pa. 481, 499, 36 Atl. 296, 297, 35 L. R. A. 819.

"'Jury,' as the term is used in the clause of the Constitution providing that the right of trial by jury shall not be denied, 'means 12 competent men, who are free from all ties of consanguinity and all other relations that would tend to make them dependent on either party. It means 12 men who are not interested in the event of the suit, and who have no such bias or prejudice as would render them partial towards either party.'" State v. McClear, 11 Nev. 39, 46.

"The terms 'jury' and 'trial by jury' are, and for ages have been, well known in the language of the law. They were used at the adoption of the Constitution, and always, it is believed, before that time, and almost always since, in a single sense. A jury for the trial of a cause was a body of 12 men, described as upright, well-qualified, and lawful men, disinterested and impartial, not of kin or personal dependents of either of the parties," etc. Dennee v. McCoy, 4 Ind. T. 233, 237, 69 S. W. 858, 860.

From the earliest period in the history of the common law, juries, grand and petit, have been composed exclusively of men. In speaking of challenges to the polls, which were, by Coke, reduced to four heads as mentioned by Blackstone, one of these was on account of incompetency (propter defectum). Mr. Blackstone said:

"Under the word 'homo,' also, though a name common to both sexes, the female is, however, excluded, propter defectum sexus (because not of the male sex), except when a widow feigns herself with child, in order to exclude the next heir, and a suppositious birth is suspected to be intended; then upon the writ de ventre inspiciendo (of inspecting pregnancy), a jury of women is to be impaneled to try the question, whether with child or not." Volume 2, Cooley's Blackstone (4th Ed.) p. 1123.

The grand assize was chosen by the sheriff selecting 4 knights, who in turn selected 12 others to serve with them, "and these, all together, form the grand assize, or great jury, which is to try the matter of right, and must now consist of 16 jurors." Id. p. 1115.

Blackstone defines an indictment to be "a written accusation * * * presented upon oath by a grand jury" to consist of "24 good and lawful men of the county." Id. p. 1453. Mr. Justice Field, while on circuit, gave an extended charge, frequently referred to as an admirable statement of the functions of a grand jury. Among other things, he said:

> "No person shall be required, according to the fundamental law of the country, except in the cases mentioned, to answer for any of the higher crimes, unless this body, consisting of not less than 16, nor more than 23, good and lawful men, selected from the body of the district, shall declare," etc. Charge to Grand Jury, 2 Sawy. 667, Fed. Cas. No. 18,255, cited in note, Jones' Blackstone, vol. 2, p. 2525.

Section 7 of the Penal Code, in defining the senses in which words are used in that Code, provides that "words used in the masculine gender include the feminine and neuter"; and the other Codes have similar provisions. We do not think the word "men," as found in the sections above referred to, is used in its generic sense, and hence was intended to include women, as, for example, the word "horse" at common law was held to include "mare," and as held in People v. Pico, 62 Cal. 50.

> "The English Representation of the People Act, 1867, giving the franchise to every man possessed of a certain qualification, did not enfranchise women. Although by the statute 13 & 14 Vict., c. 21, par. 4, it was enacted that 'in all acts, words importing the masculine gender shall be deemed and taken to include females,' the word 'man,' in the ordinary and popular sense of words, is used in contradistinction to the word 'woman.' Chorlton v. Lings, L. R. 4 C. P. 374." 19 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) pp. 705, 706.

When the statute was enacted defining the terms "jury" or "jurors," or the persons qualified to act in finding indictments, and mentioning such persons as "men," the statute carried with it the implication that they should be males, for such was then the common law that women were incompetent to act as jurors. Mr. Justice Turner, in Harland v. Territory, 3 Wash. T. 131, 13 Pac. 453, held that this implication arose even where the Code declared all "qualified electors" as competent to serve as grand jurors, and the Code also made females of like age with males qualified electors.

The question has been removed from the field of controversy by the recent statute, approved May 29, 1917 (St. 1917, p. 1282), by which the various sections of the Code of Civil Procedure relating to jurors are so amended as to render women competent to act both as grand jurors and trial jurors, and also to sit upon juries of inquest. By section 7 of the act it is made the duty of the superior court in each of the counties of the state, in making an order designating the estimated number of grand and trial jurors for the year, to make the selections "of men and women suitable and competent to serve as jurors," etc. The question now here must, of course, be decided with reference to the statute law heretofore existing.

The order denying defendant's motion for a new trial is reversed, with direction to grant the motion to set aside the indictment.

WRIGHT v. LOCOMOBILE CO. OF AMERICA. (Civ. 2062.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. May 17, 1917.)

APPEAL AND ERROR ⚷1011(1) — REVIEW — FINDINGS OF FACT.

Decision on a substantial conflict in evidence that a contract for laying a floor was substantially complied with will not be disturbed on appeal, especially where the judge took a view of the premises.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by Charles Wright against the Locomobile Company of America. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Elliott McAllister and H. S. Young, both of San Francisco, for appellant. Jacob Samuels, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Action upon a contract for the laying of a floor of a specified description in a building. Plaintiff recovered judgment, from which defendant appeals, as also from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

The main question relied upon for a reversal of the judgment and order is as to whether or not there was a substantial compliance with the terms of the contract, and the appellant is challenging the sufficiency of the evidence to support the finding of the trial court to that effect. The judge of the court below, after hearing all of the evidence and going into all of the technical facts in relation to the different classes of floor, visited the building and examined the floor itself. It seems to the court, upon an examination of the entire record, that this is a case where there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, and that particularly is true where the judge of the court, after hearing the testimony of the respective contractors and experts went and examined the premises himself, saw the floor, and then decided that there had been a substantial compliance with the terms of the contract. Under those circumstances we will not undertake to review or reverse the decision of the trial court, and for the reasons stated the judgment and order are affirmed.

KEITH v. RAMSEY, County Auditor.

1. Officers ⚷100(2) — Compensation — Increase—Constable.

A constable of a township is within Const. art. 11, § 9, inhibiting increase, during his term of office, of the compensation of a county, city, town, or municipal officer.

2. Officers ⚷100(1)—Statutes—Operation —Presumption.

St. 1915, p. 1379, amending Pol. Code, § 4281, by increasing salary of certain officers and changing compensation of constable from fees to salary, not declaring that the change does not increase the constable's compensation, will be presumed intended to have a uniform operation, and so not to apply to any of the officers mentioned during their terms theretofore commenced.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lassen County; H. D. Burroughs, Judge.

Mandamus by Joe Keith against C. L. Ramsey, Auditor of Lassen County. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Grover C. Julian, of Susanville, for appellant. J. A. Pardee, of Susanville, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Plaintiff was on the 18th day of October, 1915, appointed constable of No. 3 township, Lassen county, to serve an unexpired term of that office which commenced on the first Monday in January, 1915. At the commencement of the term, constables were compensated by the fee system, as provided in section 4281 of the Political Code amended in 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 1226). At the session of the Legislature in 1915, said section was amended by fixing the salary of the constables in Lassen county at $25 per month. Plaintiff made demand upon the county auditor for payment of salary as provided by the section as amended in 1915, but warrant was refused. Thereupon plaintiff brought his action in mandamus against the said auditor in the superior court of Lassen county, and judgment went in favor of defendant. Plaintiff thereupon appealed to this court, and now contends: (1) That the office of constable is a township office, and that the constitutional inhibition of article 11, section 9, does not apply thereto; and (2) that the change from fee to salary does not constitute an increase in compensation.

[1] In support of the first point it is contended that said section 9 of article 11 of the Constitution prohibits an increase in the compensation of county, city, town, or municipal officers, but does not apply to constables, for the reason that they are neither county, city, town, nor municipal officers. This question was raised in the case of Cox v. Jerome, 31 Cal. App. 97, 159 Pac. 884, and was decided adversely to appellant's contention. The court there said:

"In cases in which the question as to the right to increase the compensation of justices or constables was involved, and there have been several, it has never been denied that the provisions of section 9 of article 11 affect these officers, and the Supreme Court has so assumed, without any suggestion that the subject was open for debate."

As bearing somewhat upon the subject, Smith v. Mathews, 155 Cal. 752, 103 Pac. 199, and Crockett v. Mathews, 157 Cal. 153, 106 Pac. 575, may be consulted.

[2] The position taken by appellant upon the second proposition is:

"Where an act substitutes a salary for the previous fee system, and fails to disclose whether an increase of compensation is thereby produced, and is to take effect during the incumbency of the officer, the conclusive presumption is that the Governor and the Legislature have investigated and determined that the change does not result in an increase of compensation, and the courts have no right to review such determination"—citing Crockett v. Mathews, supra.

In that case it was expressly stated in the opinion that the doctrine of Smith v. Mathews, supra, is not opposed to the conclusion reached in Crockett v. Mathews. In Smith v. Mathews attention was called by appellant—

"to the fact that in numerous sections of the new law [then under consideration] salaries of various officers in several classes of counties are plainly and unequivocally raised, and since it cannot be held that the Legislature intended those parts of the act to be operative on the incumbents of current terms, there is no reason for holding it to be operative upon those officers whose compensation is altered without disclosing whether the result is an increase or reduction of compensation."

The Chief Justice stated, in rendering the majority opinion, that this view was well sustained by the appellant. He said:

"If it was not intended to put in immediate operation provisions raising salaries, upon what ground are we to hold that it was intended to have immediate operation in those instances where it changes the compensation attached to an office without disclosing whether the change effects an increase or reduction, and where, as far as the court can see, it is as likely to be an increase as a reduction? If in one case the old law continues to operate, why not in the other?"

Section 4281 of the Political Code relates to salaries of various county and township officers, and plainly shows that by it the compensation was increased as to several officers; for example, the section as amended in 1915 provides that the recorder shall receive a salary of $1,900 per annum, while his salary theretofore was fixed at $1,600 per annum. Stats. 1913, p. 1225. The salary of the auditor was increased from $500 to $800. As in the section there is no finding or declaration by the Legislature as to whether it was intended that there should be or should not be any increase in compensation of constable, and as it clearly appears on the face of the act that it was intended to increase the compensation of some of the officers named therein, it is a fair presumption that it was intended by the Legislature that the act should be given uniform operation, and was not intended to apply to any of the officers therein mentioned during their current terms of office.

In a concurring opinion by Mr. Justice Shaw in Smith v. Mathews, supra, he said:

> "If it [the amendatory act] changes from fees to salaries, as it may if it finds that the salary allowed will not increase the compensation, it can declare that there is no increase and that it is to apply immediately to the present incumbents. Perhaps the fact of no increase would be inferred from the declaration that it should apply to present incumbents; but, where neither statement appears, it is to be inferred that an increase was contemplated and that it was intended to apply prospectively only."

Where it appears, from a comparison of the provisions of the statute as it stood before and after amendment, that there was by express direction in the new law an increase in compensation intended, "it has been the settled doctrine of this court ever since the decision in Dougherty v. Austin, 94 Cal. 601, 28 Pac. 834, 29 Pac. 1092, 16 L. R. A. 161," said the Chief Justice in Smith v. Mathews, supra, "that in such cases the incumbent cannot claim the increased compensation, but continues to receive that which was provided by the law in force at the date of his election, which as to him continues in force (unless expressly repealed) to the end of his term notwithstanding the fact that the amended law is also in force in most cases for more than 18 months before the end of his term for the purpose of fixing the compensation of his successor in a new term." See, also, Harrison v. Colgan, 148 Cal. 73, 82 Pac. 674. The same, we think, is also true where, by fair implication, though not by express direction, an increase in compensation was intended.

The fact that plaintiff is seeking to obtain compensation by salary, instead of by fees, is a very strong circumstance tending to show that the compensation has been increased by the amendatory act, for it is not probable he would be invoking the power of the court to obtain a salary which was no greater than he was receiving under the fee system.

We think the judgment should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

We concur: BURNETT, J.; HART, J.

BAILEY v. SECURITY TRUST CO.

1. MANDAMUS 🔑154(2)—PETITION.

Statements in petition to Supreme Court for mandamus, while not essential to showing legal rights of parties, will not be stricken, being appropriate under Supreme Court rule 26 (119 Pac. xiv), requiring petition to set forth the circumstances which, in applicant's opinion, render it proper that the writ issue originally from the appellate court.

2. REPLEVIN 🔑49—CLAIM AND DELIVERY—FAILURE OF DEFENDANT TO JUSTIFY SURETIES—RIGHT TO DELIVERY.

Failure of defendant in claim and delivery to cause its sureties to justify on its redelivery bond is an abandonment of its attempt to require return of the property, giving plaintiff right to have it delivered to him by the sheriff as though no such undertaking had been given.

3. MANDAMUS 🔑151(2)—PROPERTY HELD BY SHERIFF'S AGENT.

The sheriff having wrongfully redelivered the property to defendant in claim and delivery, its possession is that of the sheriff as his agent, as regards right, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1085, to mandamus to require delivery to plaintiff in such action.

4. MANDAMUS 🔑151(2)—PARTIES.

Where sheriff wrongfully redelivered property to defendant in claim and delivery, and then went out of office, his successor is not a necessary party to mandamus to compel delivery of the property by such defendant to plaintiff in such action.

5. MANDAMUS 🔑154(2)—PETITION—PLEADING COMPLIANCE WITH STATUTE.

It is enough for the petition for mandamus to state that the affidavit, undertaking, and order in claim and delivery, which constituted the process under which the property was seized by the sheriff, were made in accordance with the provisions and requirements of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 510–512, without setting out their contents; those sections stating what their contents should be.

6. MANDAMUS 🔑164(3)—RETURN—DENIALS.

The return in mandamus, denying the respondent was ever served with a copy of the affidavit made by petitioner in the claim and delivery action, as set forth in the petition, but that a copy of the only affidavit served on him in said action is annexed, does not charge a defect in the affidavit in the claim and delivery action, but merely that the sheriff did not serve on him a true copy.

Mandamus by Matthew Bailey against the Security Trust Company. Peremptory writ granted.

E. L. Foster and Charles A. Barnhart, both of Bakersfield, and Leon E. Morris, Sullivan & Sullivan, and Theo J. Roche, all of San Francisco (Robert M. Clarke, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for petitioner. Wiley & Lambert, of Bakersfield, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. This is an application for a writ of mandate to require that the respondent deliver to the petitioner the personal property described in the petition. An alternative writ was issued. Respondent is now before the court for the purpose of showing cause why a peremptory writ should not be granted. Such writ should not issue unless it appears that respondent should be compelled to perform the demanded act as an act which the law specially enjoins upon respondent "as a duty resulting from an office, trust or station," or unless the writ should issue to compel the admission of petitioner "to the use and enjoyment of a right or office to which he is entitled, and from which he is unlawfully precluded by such * * * person." Code Civ. Proc. § 1085.

This is a proceeding incidental to an action for the possession of the described property. An appeal by the defendant from a judgment in that action is now pending in the Supreme Court. At the time of commencement of the action in June, 1913, an affidavit and undertaking in claim and delivery were made, which, on July 18, 1913, were delivered by the plaintiff to the sheriff, together with an order indorsed by the plaintiff's attorney upon the affidavit, requiring the sheriff to take the property from the defendant. These documents were filed by the sheriff, T. A. Baker, on the 26th day of July, 1913, in the office of the clerk of the superior court of Kern county, with the sheriff's return thereon, showing that on the 18th day of July, 1913, he took possession of the property. In his return the sheriff further stated that:

> "At the same time I delivered to the defendant, Security Trust Company, a copy of the within affidavit and order and undertaking duly approved by me, and the defendant, not having excepted to such surety, claimed the redelivery of said property by giving me an undertaking in due form, and the sureties thereon having justified, and no other person having made claim to such property in due form, I redelivered the said property to the defendant."

At the time of filing its return to the alternative writ herein, respondent by its attorneys moved this court to strike from the petition filed in this proceeding those portions thereof reading as follows:

> (1) "That prior to said demand, and on the 12th day of January, 1917, this petitioner made a written demand, a copy of which is hereto annexed, and made a part hereof, and referred to as 'Exhibit B,' upon one D. B. Newell as sheriff of the said county of Kern, said D. B. Newell being the duly elected successor in office to said T. A. Baker, whose term of office expired January 2, 1915, to take said property into his possession and deliver the same to said petitioner, but said sheriff then refused and has ever since refused to do so; that at the time of this demand upon said D. B. Newell, to wit, the 12th day of January, 1917, petitioner made a written demand upon the respondent herein, a copy of which demand is hereto attached, marked 'Exhibit C,' and referred to and made a part hereof, to deliver said property to said D. B. Newell for delivery to said E. L. Foster and Chas. A. Barnhart as attorneys for this petitioner; that said respondent failed and refused to do so; that the said property now is, and at all times herein mentioned, except as otherwise alleged in paragraph V hereof, has been, in the possession and control of the respondent herein."
> (2) "That said property has greatly increased in value since the commencement of the action in claim and delivery mentioned in paragraph IV hereof, and is now worth more than eighteen thousand ($18,000.00) dollars, and is worth seventy thousand ($70,000.00) dollars; that this petitioner is as of right entitled to the possession of said property; that the possession of said property would greatly enhance said petitioner's security for the due execution and satisfaction of the judgment rendered by the superior court hereinabove referred to in the event that said judgment should be affirmed by the Supreme Court of this state; that in the event said judgment be so affirmed this petitioner would prefer and desire to have the said property, rather than a sum of money, in satisfaction of said judgment; that the said property would be of greater value to him than the sum of eighteen thousand ($18,000.00) dollars; that said property is of a peculiar value, in that the shares of stock of the said Kern Mutual Telephone Company are very limited in number and cannot be obtained in the market."
> (3) "That petitioner has constantly tried to obtain the possession of said property, and for that purpose has taken the following proceedings, all of which failed: On or about the 26th day of August, 1913, the petitioner herein petitioned the superior court of the state of California in and for the county of Kern, for a writ of mandate to compel the aforesaid T. A. Baker as sheriff of the county of Kern, to deliver to said petitioner the said property. The writ was denied by the said superior court, but on an appeal to this, the honorable District Court of Appeal of the State of California for the Second Appellate District, the judgment of the lower court was reversed. Bailey v. Baker (1915) 28 Cal. App. 537, 153 Pac. 242. Upon a subsequent trial in the said superior court, the writ of mandate was issued. From the judgment therein said T. A. Baker appealed, and pending said appeal refused to comply with the mandate. Thereupon the petitioner herein presented to said superior court an affidavit setting forth the fact of said Baker's refusal to comply with the order of the court, and upon which he prayed that a citation be issued to said Baker, requiring him to appear and show cause why he should not be punished for contempt of court in so refusing to obey the writ of mandate. The court refused to issue such citation, whereupon petitioner herein petitioned this, the honorable District Court of Appeal of the State of California for the Second Appellate District, for a writ of mandate to be directed to the said superior court, requiring it to issue the citation to said Baker as prayed for. This writ was issued. Bailey v. Superior Court (July 11, 1916) 31 Cal. App. 78, 159 Pac. 990. The citation was then issued, and said Baker, failing to show cause, was committed by said superior court for contempt. The said Baker then petitioned this, the said honorable District Court of Appeal, for a writ of habeas corpus. This writ was issued on the ground that said Baker was no longer sheriff, his term having expired January 2, 1915. Matter of T. A. Baker (Dec. 13, 1916) 162 Pac. 922."
> (4) "That this petition is made in the first instance to this, the honorable District Court of Appeal of the State of California for the Second Appellate District, rather than to the superior court of the state of California in and for the county of Kern, for the reason that petitioner desires to have the possession of said property at and before the time when the Supreme Court of the state of California shall render its decision in the aforesaid action entitled 'Matthew Bailey, Plaintiff, v. Security Trust Company, a Corporation, John Doe and Richard Roe, Defendants'; that any process or writ issued from any court will be useless after such decision; that an application to the said superior court would involve the possibility of a great and injurious delay; that such delay might be sufficient to prevent this petitioner from securing the desired, or any, relief prior to a decision by the Supreme Court as above stated; and that this proceeding is the only plain, speedy, and adequate remedy available to petitioner."

[1] We find no important reason for striking from the petition the quoted paragraphs. While the facts stated in those paragraphs may be not essential to a complete statement exhibiting the legal rights of the parties, they serve to show that the plaintiff has diligently sought to obtain the relief demanded by him, and the facts stated are appropriate when the petitioner is appealing to the discretion of the court, particularly in the matter of granting the writ originally in this court without requiring the petitioner in the first instance to resort to the superior court. Rule 26 of the rules of the Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal (119 Pac. xiv) requires that the petition, "in addition to the necessary matter requisite by the rules of law to support the application, shall also set forth the circumstances which, in the opinion of the applicant, render it proper that the writ should issue originally from the appellate court to which such application is made, and not from such lower court." The motion to strike said paragraphs from the petition is denied.

[2] The petition states that at the time of commencing his action, in June, 1913, the petitioner "made an application in accordance with the requirements and provisions of section 510 of the Code of Civil Procedure and delivered said affidavit, together with an order and an undertaking executed in accordance with the provisions and requirements of section 512 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to one T. A. Baker, as sheriff of the county of Kern, in which county the said property was then and is now located, requiring said sheriff to take the said property from the respondent herein; that the said sheriff forthwith took into his possession the property described in said affidavit, which is the same property described in paragraph II hereof." Then follows a statement of the subsequent return of the property by the sheriff to the defendant, under circumstances stated, which are the same as are described in our decision in Bailey v. Baker, 28 Cal. App. 537, 153 Pac. 242. In that decision we held that the failure of the Security Trust Company to cause its sureties to justify (after notice to plaintiff), on its redelivery bond, amounted to an abandonment of its attempt to require the return to it of the property; that such abandonment gave to the plaintiff the right to have the property delivered to him by the sheriff the same as if no such undertaking had been given at all. We remain satisfied that the law is as in that decision it was held to be.

[3] The return of respondent herein does not deny the essential facts. In the meantime Sheriff Baker has gone out of office without completing the performance of his duty. Wrongfully he delivered to the defendant, Security Trust Company, the property held by him as sheriff under valid process which constituted his authority to act in the matter. Ex parte Baker, 162 Pac. 922. Wrongfully the defendant received, and wrongfully it holds, that property in its possession. The affidavit, undertaking, and order under which the seizure was made by Sheriff Baker are in the office of the clerk of the superior court, although they should now be in the hands of Newell, the present sheriff. Ex parte Baker, supra. In the proper performance of his duty Newell would obtain possession of those papers, and would execute the process by taking the property and delivering it to the plaintiff; but he has refused to do so, notwithstanding that the plaintiff has demanded of him the performance of that duty. The property, when taken into possession by Sheriff Baker, became property in custodia legis, and its status has never changed. Detroit & M. Ry. Co. v. Alpena Cir. Judge, 152 Mich. 201, 115 N. W. 724; August v. Gilmer, 53 W. Va. 65, 44 S. E. 143. The Security Trust Company holds this property in its actual possession, but not in legal possession. So far as this proceeding is concerned, its possession is the sheriff's possession, in the same sense that this would be true if Sheriff Baker had left the property in the hands of some keeper employed by him. Such keeper or deputy would have the property in possession by virtue of no rights other than those pertaining to an agent of the sheriff. See Aigeltinger v. Whelan, 133 Cal. 110, 65 Pac. 125, where a warehouseman receiving attached goods from a sheriff was held to be the sheriff's agent. Such agent would be compellable by mandate to surrender the goods to the person entitled. So it is with this defendant. It holds property that is in custody of the law. Its holding under the circumstances constitutes a trust for the delivery of the property to the plaintiff. The performance of that duty is by the law specially enjoined upon the sheriff, and therefore is enjoined upon his agent, the defendant. In refusing to perform the duty and execute the trust enjoined upon it, the defendant is unlawfully excluding the plaintiff from the use and enjoyment of a right to which he is entitled.

[4] Upon the stated facts, the petitioner might ask for and would be entitled to a writ of mandate against Sheriff Newell, and that officer would have been a proper party defendant in this proceeding. But the demurrer filed by the respondent does not include any claim of defect of parties, and we think that the failure to join the sheriff as defendant does not affect the validity of the plaintiff's cause of action as stated against the defendant Security Trust Company. The plaintiff being entitled to immediate possession of property which is legally in the custody of the court, the remedy is essentially the same, whether the delivery be made directly by the defendant to the plaintiff, or whether it be made through the hands of the sheriff. The difference between the two modes of delivery would be rather of form than of substance. If there is any force in the law, plaintiff should have the benefit thereof as directly as legal procedure will allow. It has been held that, even where by authority of claim and delivery proceedings property seized in replevin was rightfully delivered by the sheriff to one of the parties, the property continued to be in custodia legis, and the party in possession thereof stood substituted for the sheriff as custodian pending the action. Mohr v. Langan, 162 Mo. 474, 63 S. W. 409, 85 Am. St. Rep. 503. Much more should this be so when the sheriff, without right to do so, put such property into the possession of the party not entitled thereto.

[5] Respondent claims that the petition herein does not state a cause of action, because it does not set out the contents of the affidavit, undertaking, and order which constitute the process under which the property was seized by the sheriff. As quoted above, the petition merely states that these documents were made in accordance with the provisions and requirements of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that upon receiving those documents the sheriff took the property into his possession. We think that this was a sufficient pleading for the purpose of stating a cause of action, and that the objection could only be reached by a demurrer for uncertainty, if the objection could be maintained at all. If it were necessary for the plaintiff in an action to show that a summons from a court of record had been duly issued and served prior to the entry of a default, the mere statement of those facts, without setting out a copy of the summons, would ordinarily be sufficient. A denial of the facts alleged would require that the plaintiff produce the record; but in the absence of such denial the fact that the summons was in due form would be assumed. The allegations of a pleading are to be liberally construed. Code Civ. Proc. § 452. Here we have the statement that the affidavit and undertaking were made in accordance with the provisions of sections 510 and 512 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that an order was made in connection therewith requiring the sheriff to take the property from the defendant. Code Civ. Proc. § 511. Those sections of the Code state what the contents of such documents should be. The allegations of the petition may fairly be construed as equivalent to a statement of the facts showing that the documents were in form and substance in accordance with the requirements of those sections. The sheriff acted upon those documents in taking the property into his possession, and his right so to do was not challenged by the defendant.

Let the peremptory writ issue.

We concur: WORKS, Judge pro tem.; JAMES, J.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. [6] In its petition for rehearing in this cause respondent insists that we did not fully dispose of its claim that the affidavit filed by plaintiff in the claim and delivery proceeding was insufficient to authorize the sheriff's seizure of the property. We held that the petition herein sufficiently stated facts showing that the affidavit met the necessary requirements of the law. But respondent now directs our attention more particularly to its return filed in this proceeding, wherein respondent "denies that it was ever served with a copy of the affidavit or any affidavit made by or on behalf of petitioner in the cause mentioned and set forth in paragraph IV of petitioner's petition; that the only affidavit ever served upon or received by this respondent in said cause is set forth by an order [copy?] thereof annexed hereto and made a part hereof and marked 'Exhibit A.'" Exhibit A purports to be a copy of an affidavit made by Matthew Bailey wherein Bailey says:

> "That he is the plaintiff in the above-entitled action and that he is entitled to the possession of the following described personal property [giving the description]; that the said property is in the possession of and wrongfully detained by the defendant in this action, and that the alleged cause of detention, as this plaintiff is informed and believes, is that they claim one Matthew S. Platz has some claim on said property; that said property has not been taken for a tax," etc.

It is true that in our decision of this case we did not pay special attention to the foregoing language of the return. This arose out of the fact that respondent's written argument purported to be "in support of demurrer to petition," and we were considering, and our attention was principally directed to, that demurrer, and to the sufficiency of the petition attacked by the demurrer. We did say, however, that the return filed by respondent herein does not deny the essential facts alleged in the pleading, and the record justifies our statement. The return did not state that the copy of affidavit annexed thereto was a copy of the affidavit which had been delivered by the plaintiff to the sheriff in connection with the undertaking and order. On the contrary, respondent denied that it was ever served with a copy of the affidavit made by the plaintiff. Therefore the allegations of the return charge no defect in the process, but merely charge that the sheriff did not serve on the defendant a true copy.

The other points mentioned in the petition for rehearing were considered in rendering the principal decision, and our opinion thereon stands unchanged.

The petition for rehearing is denied.

PEOPLE v. FLORES. (Cr. 544.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. July 31, 1917. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 27, 1917.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑517(4) — EVIDENCE — CONFESSIONS—PROOF OF "CORPUS DELICTI."

The elements of the "corpus delicti," evidence of which must be introduced to render defendant's confessions admissible, are certain facts forming its basis and the existence of a criminal agency as the cause of them, and to establish the corpus delicti it is not essential to show that the crime charged was committed by defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Corpus Delicti.]

2. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑1170(1)—HARMLESS ERROR—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE.

In a criminal case, the testimony of a phonographic reporter, who took down statements made by defendant, was admitted. Some of the statements were in English, and some in Spanish, and those in Spanish were translated by an interpreter, and taken down as given to the reporter through the interpreter. On defendant's objection, the reporter's testimony as to those portions of the statement made in Spanish were excluded. Held that, as these rulings were in defendant's favor, he had no ground for complaint.

3. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑531(3) — EVIDENCE — CONFESSIONS—LAYING FOUNDATION.

Where, before defendant's incriminating statements were admitted, witnesses were asked whether they made any promises or held out any inducements to get defendant to talk, and whether he talked freely and voluntarily, there was no basis for the claim that no foundation was laid for the admission of the statements, assuming that they were such confessions as required the laying of a foundation.

4. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑1169(9)—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

The overruling of objections to questions as to whether any promises were made or inducements held out to induce defendant to make incriminating statements, and whether he talked freely and voluntarily, on the ground that they called for conclusions, if erroneous, was harmless, where opportunity for cross-examination was given, but no improper influences were shown.

5. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑519(9)—EVIDENCE—CONFESSIONS—VOLUNTARY CHARACTER.

That accused is under arrest and in the custody of officers, and that an alleged confession is made in answer to questions, will not authorize its rejection, if it fairly and clearly appears that defendant's statements were voluntary.

6. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑814(10)—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO EVIDENCE.

Where, though defendant did not testify, marks on his face were pointed out in connection with evidence offered in an effort to show that his mental condition had been affected by an injury, it was not error for the court to charge that, in determining the matter of his insanity, idiocy, or lunacy, the jury should consider the evidence in the case and the appearance of the defendant before them since the beginning of the trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; S. E. Crow, Judge.

Albert Flores was convicted of murder, and he appeals. Affirmed.

B. F. Thomas and Francis Price, both of Santa Barbara, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Robert M. Clarke, Deputy Atty. Gen., E. W. Squier, of Santa Barbara, and M. F. Shannon, of Los Angeles, for the People.

CONREY, P. J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of murder, and sentenced to imprisonment for life. He appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] The first error claimed by appellant is based upon the ground that the court admitted in evidence testimony concerning confessions made by the defendant, and that at the time when that testimony was admitted evidence establishing the corpus delicti had not been received. The so-called confessions were not confessions by the defendant that he committed the crime charged. In connection with the statements made by him, the defendant insisted that he did not kill the child, Renata Maccianti. His statements consisted in admissions of fact which tended to show that the murder was committed by him. At the time when these admissions were received in evidence, testimony had been received strongly tending to show, not only that the child was dead, but that at the time and place charged in the indictment she came to her death by violent means, and by the criminal act of some person. At the time when the testimony showing the admissions made by the defendant was received, there was not before the court any evidence tending to show that the crime had been committed by the defendant.

The contention urged by appellant's counsel is that, in order to establish the corpus delicti, it is necessary that the evidence shall not only establish the fact of commission of the crime, but also that it must have tended to connect the defendant with the commission of that crime. Upon this proposition we do not agree with appellant's counsel. The two elements of corpus delicti are: (1) Certain facts forming its basis; and (2) the existence of criminal agency as the cause of them. To establish the corpus delicti it is not essential to show that the crime charged was committed by the defendant. People v. Vertrees, 169 Cal. 404, 146 Pac. 890; People v. Wagner, 29 Cal. App. 363, 155 Pac. 649; People v. Swaile, 12 Cal. App. 192, 196, 107 Pac. 134; People v. Tarbox, 115 Cal. 57, 46 Pac. 896; People v. Ford, 25 Cal. App. 388, 419, 143 Pac. 1075.

[2] The court received in evidence the testimony of the phonographic reporter, who took down in shorthand one of the statements introduced as constituting admissions made by the defendant. Some of the statements made by the defendant at that time were in the Spanish language, and some were in English. Appellant claims that the court erred in receiving the testimony of the reporter concerning the statements made by the defendant in his presence, since it appeared that the statements made in Spanish were translated into English by an interpreter, and were taken down by the reporter as given to him through the interpreter. But the record shows that, on objection made by the defendant, the court excluded from the testimony of the reporter those portions of defendant's statements which were made in the Spanish language, and refused to receive the same in evidence. Those rulings having been made in favor of the defendant, he is left without foundation for his complaint respecting that testimony.

[3-5] The next point relied upon is that, preliminary to the reception in evidence of testimony concerning the statements or confessions made by the defendant, it was not shown that no inducements were offered or threats made to the defendant before those statements were made by him. Referring to the transcript pages referred to by appellant's counsel in their argument, we find that the record does not in fact support the claim made concerning it. The conversations in which those statements were made by the defendant all occurred on the 30th day of June, 1916; two of them before noon, and two in the afternoon. As to each of those conversations testimony was given to the effect that no threats or promises were made to the defendant, and that his statements were made voluntarily. The district attorney asked such questions as the following:

> "Did you make any promises or hold out any inducements to the defendant to get him to talk on that occasion?" "Did he talk to you freely and voluntarily at that time?"

Objections were made to those questions as calling for the conclusions of the witness, and the objections were overruled. Assuming that these rulings were erroneous, yet on the complete record it does not appear that they were prejudicial. Opportunity was given for cross-examination, and questions were asked by defendant's counsel with respect to the circumstances under which the statements were made; but it was not made to appear that any improper influences were used to open the lips of the defendant. His several statements were made at different times and places—on a public street, and at the scene of the crime, as well as at the jail. It is true that the court reporter, in giving his testimony as above mentioned, did not say anything with respect to the circumstances leading up to the statement of the defendant as reported by him. But that ground had been covered by another witness referring to the same conversation, and the reporter stated that he did not come into the room until the other persons present had assembled there, and that he only took down the formal questions and answers.

Assuming that the extrajudicial statements, or some of them, made by the defendant, should be treated as confessions, and subject to the rule here invoked by the defendant, we nevertheless hold that the record does not establish the claim that there was no foundation for the reception in evidence of the testimony covering those statements. "The mere fact that the defendant is under arrest and in the custody of officers, and that the alleged confession is made in answer to questions, will not authorize the rejection of such confession, if it fairly and clearly appears that the statements of the defendant were of a voluntary nature." People v. Hoge, 25 Cal. App. 456, 458, 143 Pac. 1072.

[6] The court gave to the jury the following instruction:

> "From the evidence in this case, and the appearance of the defendant before you since the beginning of this trial, you are to determine the matter of his insanity or idiocy or lunacy at the time it is alleged that he committed the crime charged in the indictment; these questions being questions of fact, of which you are the sole judges."

Appellant claims error in this instruction, in that defendant was not a witness at the trial, and that the "appearance of the defendant" before the jury was not a fact in evidence. The record shows, however, that the personal appearance of the defendant was brought to the attention of the jury by defendant's counsel in at least one instance. While they were examining the father of the defendant as a witness in his behalf, the witness testified that when five years old the defendant was kicked by a horse, and marks on defendant's face caused by the accident were pointed out and identified by the witness. This evidence was introduced as a part of the effort made to show that the mental condition of the defendant had been affected by the injury so received.

The other objections presented by counsel for defendant with respect to instructions given and with respect to instructions refused, in so far as they are not covered by the propositions heretofore considered in this opinion, are of such slight importance that they do not require discussion. The law of the case was fairly and fully stated to the jury.

EARLEY v. PACIFIC ELECTRIC RY. CO.

DEATH ⚷25—ACTION—RELEASE.

Code Civ. Proc. § 377, providing for action for damages against a person causing death by wrongful act creates an entirely new cause of action unknown at common law, and hence, as the damage of widow for the wrongful death of her husband includes not only financial loss, but loss of consortium, the husband's execution prior to his death of a release for damages from the injury which finally resulted fatally will not bar the widow's right of action.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

Action by Sadie F. Earley, a widow, against the Pacific Electric Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Frank Karr, R. C. Gortner, and A. W. Ashburn, Jr., all of Los Angeles (W. P. Millar, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant. Harry A. Hollzer, T. A. Williams, W. O. Morton, and C. B. Morton, all of Los Angeles, for respondent. T. A. Williams, Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, and Norman S. Sterry, all of Los Angeles, amici curiæ.

HENSHAW, J. This appeal is from the judgment and from the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. The action was brought under section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure, by the widow of W. H. Earley. Her husband had been a passenger upon a car of defendant corporation, and was injured by a collision. As the result of his injuries he died. Before his death he executed a release to the defendant in consideration of the payment to him of his hospital expenses and of $5,200 in money. The contract was in writing and released "the Pacific Electric Railway Company from any and all claims and causes of action on account of any and all personal injuries * * * suffered by me * * * and due to collision of a car * * * upon which I was a passenger." When, following her husband's death, the widow commenced and prosecuted this action, this release was presented to and urged upon the court as a complete defense thereto, and around this single proposition revolve all the questions presented upon this appeal.

Section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure, under which this action was brought, provides that:

> "When the death of a person not being a minor is caused by the wrongful act or neglect of another, his heirs or personal representatives may maintain an action for damages against the person causing the death, or if such person be employed by another person who is responsible for his conduct, then also against such other person. In every action under this and the preceding section, such damages may be given as under all the circumstances of the case may be just."

The attorney for the appellant, and amici curiæ adopting the same construction of the law as does appellant's attorney, have presented for the consideration of this court elaborate briefs discussing the origin of the right of action for wrongful death under Lord Campbell's Act, the varying statutes of the states of the United States passed after, and some in copy of the English act, and from a learned and elaborate analysis reach the conclusion that the wrong which the defendant committed—the tort upon the person of the deceased—was necessarily but a single wrong, and that, as the defendant had received its full acquittance and discharge from all consequences arising from that wrong from the injured man himself, the wrong itself was compensated for, and in point of law was extinguished, so that it could not be made the basis of any further action by any person whatsoever.

It would not be without interest, but at the same time it is wholly unnecessary to follow these learned counsel in their analyses of the varying statutes and the decisions of the courts upon them. For when the last word shall have been said in such a consideration, the paramount fact will still remain that rights under our section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure are to be defined not by what other courts have said touching their own statutes, but from the meaning and intent of our own law derived from a reading of it. Upon this matter we are not without light from previous decisions. Thus in Monroe v. Dredging Co., 84 Cal. 515, 24 Pac. 303, 18 Am. St. Rep. 248, referring to this section, it is said:

> "It may be observed that the language of the statute of this state (section 377 C. C. P.) is broader than the language of the English statute."

In the case of Burk v. Arcata & Mad River R. R. Co., 125 Cal. 363, 57 Pac. 1065, 73 Am. St. Rep. 52, it is said:

> "The statutes in the different states, though varying greatly, follow generally Lord Campbell's Act, 9 and 10 Victoria, c. 95. In that it was recited that no right of action existed at common law for such damages. It was then a new right of action. It could not be a continuance of the right which the injured man had for the injury; for the loss to his heirs did not accrue until he died. Under our statute the injured person might survive long enough to sue and recover damages, or to settle with the wrongdoer, and then, by his death, a new cause of action would accrue to his heirs. True, it has been held differently in some states, which have what are called 'survival statutes.' Here it has been ruled, as the fact evidently is, that the statute creates an entirely new cause of action."

Some statutes are but statutes of survivorship. They carry over to some living person after the death of the injured person precisely the right of action and precisely the right of recovery which the injured person would have had if his injuries had not resulted fatally. Manifestly under such a statute a composition agreement and release of the wrongdoer deprives the living person, who may have been empowered by the statute to commence or carry on the action, of all right of recovery. But such is not our statute. Our statute creates a new right of action with a different measure of damage from that which accrued to the injured person as a result of the defendant's wrongdoing. The right of action is to the heirs or representatives of the deceased and the elements of damage (without here attempting to specify them all) include in the case of the widow an admeasurement of the financial loss occasioned to her by the death of her husband through the deprivation of his society, comfort, and protection. Upon the other hand, the right to recover for physical suffering—a right which is always an element of damage when the action is prosecuted by the wronged and injured person—is not from its nature an element of the damage which the heir or personal representative may recover under the action given by our statute.

One simple illustration, we think, will make the matter quite plain. A servant suffers wrongful and debilitating injuries at the hands of a third person. That third person is, of course, liable to the injured servant. The injured servant, however, compromises with the wrongdoer for the injuries which he has received and gives him a full release and acquittance. At the same time and by reason of the same single tort the master has his right of action against the wrongdoer for the loss of his employé's services. This was a right of action recognized at common law and is recognized by the statute law of this state. Civ. Code, § 49. Would any one contend that the release of the wrongdoer by the servant operates also as a release and discharge of the wrongdoer from his liability under the independent right of action given by the law to the master? That right of action is wholly independent, precisely as is the right of action created in favor of the heirs, and it is no less independent because it has its origin in the same tort. The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

HILL v. BOARD OF SUP'RS OF BUTTE COUNTY et al. (Sac. 2600.)

1. Counties ⚿105(2)—County Buildings—Right to Initiative and Referendum.

Under Const. art. 4, § 1, as to initiative and referendum, the voters may compel a reference on a resolution for the erection of a county building; such resolution being legislative in character.

2. Statutes ⚿110½(1)—Subjects and Titles of Acts—Validity.

The act to provide for direct legislation, including the initiative, referendum, and recall (St. 1911, p. 577), does not, by designating the act as a provision for direct legislation, invalidate it on the ground that the recall is not legislative, and that therefore it violates Const. art. 4, § 24, requiring every act to embrace but one subject.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; W. T. O'Donnell, Judge.

Mandamus by W. F. Hill against the Board of Supervisors of the County of Butte and others. From an order for a peremptory writ, the Board appeals. Affirmed.

Raymond A. Leonard, A. F. Jones, and George F. Jones, all of Oroville, for appellant. Lon Bond and J. R. Robinson, Jr., both of Chico, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. The board of supervisors of the county of Butte passed its resolution declaring the necessity for the construction of a new hall of records in Butte county, for the purpose of keeping in a safe place the valuable records of the county and for relieving the congested condition of the courthouse. By this resolution it accepted plans, specifications, strain sheets, and working details submitted by an architect for the erection and construction of this building. The clerk of the board was directed forthwith to advertise for bids for the construction of the building in accordance with the plans and specifications. Within due time thereafter a petition was presented to the board, legally sufficient in form and containing the requisite number of signatures of the electors of Butte county, requesting the board to reconsider its resolution, and upon such reconsideration either to repeal it or submit it to a vote of the electors under the referendum. The board refusing to comply with either request, this action in mandate was instituted and determined by the superior court in favor of the petitioner. That court issued its peremptory writ of mandate, and from its judgment the board of supervisors has appealed.

[1] Appellant board of supervisors first contend that the action which it has taken and proposes to take is not subject to the referendum under the law, founding its argument herein upon the indisputable propositions of fact that counties are parts of the political subdivisions of the state; that the duties of county officers are largely duties pertaining to the government of the state, and that to enable them to perform these duties the Legislature required them to construct and maintain safe and suitable public buildings; that, as these duties are in their nature state duties, the laws governing their performance are state laws. From this is drawn the conclusion that it was never intended that the people of a county could thus, under the referendum, interfere and thwart the policy of the state and its legislation evincing that policy. In this, it is argued, is found the distinction between the referendum as applicable to counties and as applicable to cities. It is conceded that this case has a close analogue in Hopping v. Council of the City of Richmond, 170 Cal. 605, 150 Pac. 977; but it is argued that, as the Hopping Case was addressed to the right of referendum in a case of a city, whose council desired to erect a city hall, it is not authority, owing to the reasons indicated, controlling the determination of the case at bar.

Unfortunately, however, for appellants' argument, to sustain it would do violence to the express provisions of the Constitution. That Constitution, in section 1 of article 4, reserves to the people of the state the power of instituting legislation under the initiative and of repealing or affirming enactments of the state Legislature under the referendum. These constitutional provisions have received careful analysis from this court in bank in the Hopping Case, supra. The same article and section of the Constitution declares that:

> "The initiative and referendum powers of the people are hereby further reserved to the electors of each county, city and county, city and town of the state, to be exercised under such procedure as may be provided by law. * * * This section is self-executing, but legislation may be enacted to facilitate its operation, but in no way limiting or restricting either the provisions of this section or the powers herein reserved."

Touching these reserved powers, it may be noted that it is not at all singular that the people should reserve to themselves in matters of lesser magnitude (that is to say, in county and in municipal affairs) powers equal to those reserved in matters of greater magnitude (that of state legislation); and so the people have done. Next, it is to be noted that the people have made no distinction, nor effort to distinguish, between those powers so reserved in the case of cities or towns and those reserved in the case of counties. Since the language of the reservation is the same as to each, it would be a strained, distorted, and unwarranted construction which held that the powers thus reserved in identical language may be distinguished and discriminated for or against in the case of any of these public agencies. And, finally, it is self-evident that the Legislature itself could not abridge, nor even hamper, the exercise of those powers by any of the subordinate mandatories of the state—first, because the reservation, being in the Constitution, is not subject to such legislative abridgment; and, second, because the Constitution in terms declares that the Legislature shall have no authority to limit or restrict the powers reserved. That a resolution such as is here under consideration is legislative in character, is conclusively established by the decision in the Hopping Case, supra.

[2] The Legislature of 1911 proposed two amendments to the Constitution—one (article 4, § 1) providing for the initiative and referendum in state, county, and city affairs, quotations from which have heretofore been given; and a recall of public officers (article 23, § 1). Precisely as the constitutional amendment touching the initiative and referendum reserved the same rights and powers to the electors of counties, cities, and towns, so, in the matter of the recall, this constitutional amendment provided that it should also be exercised by the electors of each county, city and county, city, and town of the state with reference to the elective officers thereof. Both amendments were declared in the Constitution itself to be self-executing. The same Legislature adopted an act entitled "An act to provide for direct legislation, including initiative, referendum, and recall by electors in counties, by adding two new sections to the Political Code, to be numbered section 4058 and section 4021a respectively." St. 1911, p. 577. Section 1 of this act, thus placed upon the statute books, declared that:

> "A new section is hereby added to the Political Code, to be numbered section 4058, and to read as follows."

This section set forth a scheme in detail for the exercise of the reserved powers of the initiative and the referendum. Section 2 of the same act of the Legislature declared that:

> "A new section is hereby added to the Political Code, to be numbered section 4021a, and to read as follows."

Section 4021a made provision for the recall of any elective officer of any county or township or supervisorial district thereof, and provided in detail the method of such recall. Our Constitution (article 4, § 24) prescribes that:

> "Every act shall embrace but one subject, which subject shall be expressed in its title."

It is argued that the legislative enactment violates this plain mandate of the Constitution, for that in its title and in its body it deals with two entirely unrelated subject-matters, namely, elections under the initiative and under the referendum provisions, which clearly have to do with legislation, and elections for the recall of officers, which matter has no bearing whatsoever upon legislation, and that, notwithstanding that the general description in the title of the act declares that the act itself provides for "direct legislation," this legislative enactment cannot operate to transform the character of the recall, so as to give it any of the attributes of legislation. If the foregoing is conceded to be sound, then the result contended for is inevitable—the whole act must fall. Cooley, Const. Lim. (7th Ed.) p. 211; Lewis' Sutherland, Stat. Con. (2d Ed.) § 144. To the same effect are

State v. Ferguson, 104 La. 249, 28 South. 917, 81 Am. St. Rep. 123; State v. Lancaster County, 17 Neb. 87, 22 N. W. 228; Oxnard Beet Sugar Co. v. State, 73 Neb. 57, 102 N. W. 80, 105 N. W. 716; Ritchie v. People, 155 Ill. 98, 40 N. E. 454, 29 L. R. A. 79, 46 Am. St. Rep. 315; Pioneer Irr. Dist. v. Bradbury, 8 Idaho, 310, 68 Pac. 295, 101 Am. St. Rep. 201.

The question thus presented is one not free from difficulty; yet, for reasons to be given, we hold the act to be valid. Manifestly, if the title had declared that the act dealt with "elections governing," instead of "direct legislation," all of these objections to the act itself would fall to the ground; for it would be quite within the powers of the Legislature by a single enactment to provide an elective scheme governing the operation of the initiative, the referendum, and the recall, and in the body of the act this is in fact what the Legislature did do. In the last analysis, therefore, the difficulty arises over an unhappy phrase of description found in the title to the act, namely, "direct legislation," and the question to be resolved is whether we shall permit that phrase to control to the destruction of the whole act. Says Sutherland (1 Stat. Con. § 115):

> The courts "agree that, whilst it is necessary to so expound this provision as to prevent the evils it was designed to remove, it is no less desirable to avoid the opposite extreme, the necessary effect of which would be to embarrass the Legislature in the legitimate exercise of its powers, by compelling needless multiplication of separate acts, as well as to introduce a perplexing uncertainty as to the validity of many important laws which must be daily acted upon."

Says Cooley (Const. Lim. p. 206):

> "If the act is not made to cover legislation incongruous in itself, and which by no fair intendment can be considered as having a necessary or proper connection, a title in general terms will be good."

And, finally, declares Sutherland (1 Sutherland, Stat. Con. § 134):

> "The general subject need not appear in the title, if it is clearly disclosed or readily inferred from the details expressed."

We have then before us an act, the body of which deals with elections. It was well within the power of the Legislature to pass such an act. The subject, elections, is one. These new powers reserved by the people to themselves afford a reason as well as a justification, for framing the machinery of these elections in a single act. There is nothing hostile, nor even inharmonious, in the matters treated of in the body of the act. The Legislature was unfortunate merely in selecting for the title of the act a descriptive phrase which unduly circumscribed the legislation actually enacted. But in this it committed no wrong which the constitutional mandate was designed to prevent, and for this reason we hold that the argument against the validity of the act is not well taken.

The judgment appealed from is therefore affirmed.

In re WINETEER'S ESTATE. (L. A. 4982.)

1. Appeal and Error 🔑683—Record—Matters Presented for Review.

Under Const. art. 6, § 4½, providing that no judgment shall be set aside or new trial granted because of the improper admission or rejection of evidence, unless after an examination of the entire cause the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice, and Code Civ. Proc. § 475, prohibiting reversals for errors, unless it shall appear from the record that such error was prejudicial and caused substantial injury, a judgment will not be reversed because of any error of the court in limiting the number of depositions which would be received regarding the sanity of a testatrix, where there was nothing embodied in the record by bill of exceptions or otherwise to show what the testimony in the excluded depositions was, or whether it was material or competent.

2. Appeal and Error 🔑970(1)—Discretion—Limiting Number of Depositions.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 2044, providing that the court may stop the production of further evidence upon any particular point, when the evidence upon it is already so full as to preclude reasonable doubt, a judgment will not be reversed because the court limited the number of depositions which it would admit on the question of the sanity of a testatrix, where it does not appear that it abused its discretion.

3. Trial 🔑57—Limiting Number of Witnesses.

The testimony of numerous intimate acquaintances of a testatrix regarding her mental competency or incompetency is evidence on one point, within Code Civ. Proc. § 2044, authorizing the court to limit the amount of evidence upon any particular point.

4. Wills 🔑334—Contests—Findings.

In a will contest on the ground that the testatrix was not of sound and disposing mind, but insane and mentally incompetent to make a will, the court found that the testatrix conceived and was possessed of the idea that her husband and children had inflicted and were going to inflict great injury and bodily harm upon her, and intended to kill her for the purpose of obtaining her property, that they were conspiring to obtain her property; that this mental condition continued, and was present on the date of the execution of the will; that it was false and utterly lacking in foundation, that the husband and children were dutiful, kind, considerate, and patient, and she had no cause or reason to hold such belief; that at the time of the execution of the will she was possessed of an insane delusion that her husband and children had done her bodily harm, etc., and that on the date of the execution of the will she was not of sound and disposing mind, but was possessed of insane delusions, and was incompetent to dispose of her property by will or otherwise. Held, that these findings were adequate and sufficient.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Proceeding for the probate of the will of Elizabeth A. Wineteer, deceased. From a judgment denying probate, proponent appeals. Affirmed.

Wadham & Munkelt, of San Diego, for appellant. Patterson Sprigg and Dwight D. Bell, both of San Diego, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. A contest was instituted over the admission to probate of the will of Elizabeth A. Wineteer, deceased. The sole ground of contest pressed at the trial was that the deceased "was not of sound and disposing mind, but was, on the contrary, of unsound mind, and insane and mentally incompetent to make a will." At the trial of this contest evidence, oral and documentary, was introduced, the documentary evidence consisting of depositions, many in number. Of these a large proportion were the views of intimate acquaintances respecting the mental sanity of the deceased, accompanying which views the reasons for the opinions must be given. Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 10. A time came in the reading of these depositions when the court of its own motion interposed and set a limit to the further introduction of such testimony. Its ruling in so doing is the principal error presented upon this appeal, which follows the findings and determination of the court that the will was the product of an unsound mind.

Herein it becomes of consequence to consider the record. It is as follows: The court declared:

"I have frequently limited the number of witnesses who would be permitted to testify upon a given line in any case. That is a well-recognized practice of the courts, * * * which I have followed where the evidence is purely cumulative. We cannot be expected to sit here and hear every witness that can be dragged into court upon a proposition; time does not permit it, nor is it necessary, nor does it conduce to the best results nor to the furtherance of justice. The limit ordinarily is about four or five witnesses upon a point. * * * Now, I do not know any reason why I should sit here and hear more than 15 witnesses on each side upon this proposition of the sanity or insanity of this party by nonexperts, and all this kind of cumulative testimony, and I am going to ask you to tell me why I should, and, if you do not tell me why, I shall limit the further production of witnesses or depositions on the part of the proponents to three more depositions, and the examination of these brothers, who are present, if they want to. What do you say to this proposition?

"Mr. Munkelt: Had we known we would be limited to a certain number, we could have intensified our testimony.

"The Court: I should say if there is anything special about any of the depositions that takes them out of the general rule that they are not substantially cumulative, you may offer them and have them specially ruled on; of course, you can offer them and have them ruled on any way. I believe that I am justified, that the proper practice would be to limit the production of further evidence on the part of the proponent to three additional depositions along the line of the deposition of the acquaintances—the intimate friends' testimony. You may go over your depositions, and produce such of them as you see fit, not to exceed three; then you can take your oral testimony.

"Mr. Wadham: If the court please, we understand that the order has been made limiting us to the deposition testimony that has now been introduced and is before the court; but, for the purpose of preserving our record, we ask permission to offer certain depositions. First we offer the deposition of L. H. Currier, superintendent, particularly as to the opinion on the sanity of Mrs. Wineteer, the decedent; to the same effect, the deposition of Mary Belle Gray; to the same effect, the deposition of Mrs. Nancy McDonald; to the same effect, the deposition of F. McDonald; to the same effect, Chris Nielson; to the same effect, Mrs. Olive Sherman, Thomas Thompson, Mrs. Ida Devore, Anna Guendel, B. G. Harvey, Sarah Harvey, G. D. Lacey, G. F. Lacey, Mrs. Lottie Lacey, J. M. Miller, and Margaret Miller, and also the deposition of Mary J. Lacey; and we offer to show by her deposition that, when Mr. Wineteer came to her place in 1910, and made inquiry for his wife, he did not make any statement to Mrs. Lacey that he had, or was about to, or had any intention of committing or charging Mrs. Wineteer with insanity.

"The Court: I think you should be permitted to use that portion of Mary J. Lacey's deposition. As to the others, due to the order which the court has made limiting the number of depositions to be used, the court will of its own motion decline to hear the depositions; but as to the deposition of Mary J. Lacey, in so far as it tends to contradict statements made by the husband of the decedent, you may use it.

"Mr. Wadham: To which ruling of the court the deponent excepts in so far as the proffered offer of testimony is ruled out."

[1-3] To appellant's contention that the court erred in the foregoing ruling, respondent's preliminary answer is conclusively sound. Herein it is insisted that conceding error, appellant's record fails utterly to establish injury, and that such injury must be shown, and, failing to show it, the error must be disregarded. Const. art. 6, § 4½; Code Civ. Proc. § 475. It is truly said that appellant has not caused to be embodied in the record, by bill of exceptions or otherwise, anything to show what the testimony in the excluded depositions was, whether it was material, and, if material, whether it was competent. The soundness of respondent's position in this regard is established beyond question by all the authorities. Adams v. Weaver, 117 Cal. 42, 48 Pac. 972; Estate of Angle, 148 Cal. 102, 82 Pac. 668; 4 Corpus Juris, Appeal and Error, p. 150.

But in addition to this, conclusive though it is, it is not here shown that in exercising its discretion in controlling the production of evidence—a discretion which is not only inherently within the power of the court, but which is expressly recognized by our Code (section 2044, Code Civ. Proc.)—this discretion was abused. The Code declares that the court "may stop the production of further evidence upon any particular point when the evidence upon it is already so full as to preclude reasonable doubt." The particular point upon which the court curtailed evidence was that of the mental competency or incompetency of the testatrix under the views of "intimate acquaintances." The industry of appellant furnishes us with one opinion from the Supreme Court of Delaware, holding that the question of soundness or unsoundness of mind under the evidence of such intimate acquaintances is not evidence going to one point. That court bases its determination upon the fact that opportunities for observation of the different witnesses, and consequently their reasons for their determinations, are not identical, and therefore the evidence is not addressed to one particular point, saying:

> "They get different points of observation; different facts and statements * * * which tend to prove one fact. * * * But here is a condition that grows out of a number of observations, and the rule in this case does not apply." Pritchard v. Henderson, 3 Pennewill (Del.) 128, 50 Atl. 217.

We are not persuaded by this reasoning. The cases to the contrary are well considered and numerous. Larson v. Eau Claire, 92 Wis. 86, 65 N. W. 731; In re Winslow's Will (Iowa) 122 N. W. 971; Covington v. Taffee (Ky.) 68 S. W. 629; Madisonville v. Thomas, 140 Ky. 143, 130 S. W. 975; Montgomery v. Morton, 143 Ky. 793, 137 S. W. 540; Eaton v. Green River Coal, etc., Co., 157 Ky. 159, 162 S. W. 807; Burhans v. Norwood Park, 138 Ill. 147, 27 N. E. 1088; Nelson v. Wallace, 57 Mo. App. 397; Carpenter v. Knapp, 66 Hun, 632, 21 N. Y. Supp. 297; Huett v. Clark, 4 Colo. App. 231, 35 Pac. 671; Gray v. St. John, 35 Ill. 222; Ragsdale v. Southern Railroad Co. (C. C.) 121 Fed. 924. Here not only is there a failure to show the materiality, or even the admissibility, of the matters contained in the depositions; but there is likewise an utter failure to show that this evidence, if admissible, was anything other than cumulative.

[4] The only other proposition which appellant advances is that the decree appealed from must be reversed for the court's failure to make adequate findings. The ground of contest was as above quoted. The court found:

> "That the testatrix conceived and was possessed of the idea that her husband and children, and each of them, had inflicted and were going to inflict upon her great injury and bodily harm, and that they intended to kill her for the purpose of obtaining her property, and that they were conspiring together to obtain her property, and that this mental condition, idea, and belief continued and developed, and was present during all of the times, and especially on the date of the execution of the alleged will."

The court further found the falsity and utter lack of foundation of this belief, and further affirmatively found that the husband was "dutiful, kind, considerate, and patient," and that the testatrix had no cause or reason to hold her belief. The same findings are made concerning her children. Still further, the court found that at the time of the execution of the will, and for some time prior thereto, the testatrix "was possessed of an insane delusion that her said husband and children had done her bodily harm and injury, and were about to do her bodily harm and injury, and were going to destroy and kill her for the purpose of getting her property, and were conspiring together to obtain her property." And, further, so runs the finding:

> "It is true that on the 21st day of November, 1907 (the date of the execution of the purported will), said Elizabeth A. Wineteer was not of sound and disposing mind, and was suffering under and possessed of insane delusions, and was not competent to dispose of her property by will or otherwise."

No discussion as to the sufficiency of these findings is called for.

The judgment appealed from is therefore affirmed.

BURKETT v. DOTY. (Sac. 2323.)

1. Bills and Notes 🔑310—Assigning Note—Executed Contract—"Assign."

An instrument which in terms "assigns" notes is not an executory contract; to "assign," as applied to choses in action, being to transfer the title or ownership.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Assign.]

2. Gifts 🔑31(1)—Assignment of Notes—Consideration.

Consideration is not necessary to valid assignment of notes; a "gift" being, by Civ. Code, § 1146, a voluntary transfer without consideration of personal property.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Gift.]

3. Gifts 🔑31(1)—Delivery—Written Assignment.

As between the parties to a gift inter vivos by writing transferring title, and so right to immediate possession and control, passing of possession of the thing given is not essential to its validity.

4. Gifts 🔑31(1)—Assignment of Notes and Mortgage—Provision Against Recording.

Provision of assignment of notes and mortgage that the assignment shall not be recorded duing the assignor's life does not detract from its effect to transfer title.

5. Gifts 🔑49(3)—Delivery of Assignment—Evidence.

It is no substantial evidence of want of complete delivery of an acknowledged assignment without consideration of notes and a mortgage, constituting, under Civ. Code, § 1053, a grant, delivery of which to the grantee, by provision of section 1056, cannot be conditional, and acknowledgment of which, by provision of Code Civ. Proc. § 1948, is prima facie evidence of complete execution—that is, of delivery with intent to make it operative immediately as a transfer of title—that after its immediate transfer to the assignee the assignor pledged the notes without the assignee's knowledge, and that the assignee made no effort to take possession of the notes till after assignor's death, six months after the assignment, which provided that it should not be recorded till after the assignor's death.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Action by Emma M. Burkett against W. M. Doty. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Devlin & Devlin, of Sacramento, and Lon Bond, of Chico, for appellant. Guy R. Kennedy, of Chico, and W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment. The action is in claim and delivery for the possession of two promissory notes, or for the value thereof, in case a delivery cannot be had.

On September 25, 1911, Harry Harrington executed to Nellie Mead Doty three promissory notes and a mortgage to secure the same. The notes were each for $1,385.95, and were due, respectively, on October 1, 1912, October 1, 1913, and October 1, 1914. Nellie Mead Doty was the wife of the defendant, W. M. Doty. The notes and mortgage were her separate property. This action concerns the two notes falling due in 1913 and 1914 respectively. The answer denies that the plaintiff is the owner, or is entitled to the possession, of the two notes, and alleges that the note falling due on October 1, 1913, was indorsed by said Nellie Mead Doty to the defendant prior to her death, that the note falling due October 1, 1914, was her property at the time of her death, that the defendant has been appointed the administrator of her estate, and that he now holds the last-named note as such administrator.

The findings of the court, in effect, are that the plaintiff is not and never has been the owner of the notes in controversy; that Nellie Mead Doty died on July 18, 1912; that the defendant has been duly appointed and now is the administrator of her estate, and as such administrator holds the possession and title to both of said notes for the benefit of such estate. Thereupon judgment was given for the defendant.

The essential facts are not disputed. On December 30, 1911, Nellie M. Doty was the owner of said notes. At that time they were not in her immediate possession, but were deposited in a tin box kept by her in the vault of the Sacramento Valley Bank at the town of Biggs, and, except as presently stated, they remained there until her death. On December 30, 1911, she duly signed, acknowledged before a notary public, and delivered to Emma M. Burkett, the plaintiff, an instrument in writing which declares that Nellie Mead Doty, in consideration of $10, "by these presents assigns to the party of the second part" the notes and mortgage aforesaid, describing them particularly. The party of the second part was Emma M. Burkett. The instrument differed from the ordinary assignment only in that it contained a clause as follows:

"This assignment of said mortgage is not to be placed as of record during the lifetime of Nellie Mead Doty, the party of the first part."

There was in fact no valuable consideration for the assignment. There is neither an allegation nor a finding that it was made with intent to defraud the creditors of the assignor, or that it was fraudulent or void as to such creditors.

The introduction of the instrument, with the notary's certificate of acknowledgment thereof, was prima facie evidence of the due execution thereof. Code Civ. Proc. § 1948. There was no evidence to the contrary. The instrument was introduced in evidence by the plaintiff and was in her possession. There is no evidence tending to show that the delivery thereof to her was made for any other purpose than that of completing its due execution as an assignment. The notes and mortgage described therein were not produced or delivered to Emma M. Burkett at that time, or at all.

In the following February (1912), in order to obtain funds to pay the necessary expenses of Mrs. Doty at a hospital, to which she was about to be taken on account of her sickness, she directed her husband to get from the box in the bank and bring to her the note due on October 1, 1912. He did so, and she then indorsed it, and at her direction he pledged it to the bank, and thereby obtained money from the bank. So far as appears, the bank still holds the note under said pledge. That note is not in controversy here. It was the subject of an action for damages for conversion against Doty, wherein judgment was given for Doty, which judgment was afterwards reversed by the District Court of Appeal. The facts are more minutely set forth in the opinion of that court on the appeal. Burkett v. Doty, 32 Cal. App. 337, 162 Pac. 1042. A petition for the rehearing of that case was denied by this court. After the pledge of the first note, Nellie Mead Doty, in June, 1912, indorsed to her said husband the note due on October 1, 1913, for a like purpose; but it was not pledged, no money was obtained thereon, and the defendant thereafter retained the same in his possession. No other disposition of either of the notes was ever made by Mrs. Doty.

The respondent claims, first, that the assignment was an executory contract, and that, being without a valuable consideration, it is of no force; second, that if it was a sale of personal property it was void, under section 3440 of the Civil Code, because it was not accompanied by an immediate delivery and followed by an actual and continued change of possession of the notes; third, that it is not valid as a gift of personal property, because there was no evidence of an intent on the part of Nellie Mead Doty to completely divest herself of dominion over the property, and because she did not relinquish all present right to or control over the notes, nor make an immediate transfer of the title thereto.

[1, 2] The assignment is not an executory contract. By its terms it "assigns" the notes to the plaintiff. To "assign," in ordinary legal usage, as applied to choses in action, is to transfer the title or ownership. A chose in action may be transferred by the owner. Civ. Code, § 954. "A gift is a transfer of personal property, made voluntarily, and without consideration." Civ. Code, § 1146. "Transfer is an act of the parties, or of the law, by which the title to property is conveyed from one living person to another." Civ. Code, § 1039. "A transfer vests in the transferee all the actual title to the thing transferred which the transferor then has, unless a different intention is expressed or * * * necessarily implied." Civ. Code, § 1083. "The interest intended to be transferred is, under section 1054 of the Civil Code, vested in the transferee upon the donor's delivery of the grant." Driscoll v. Driscoll, 143 Cal. 536, 77 Pac. 471; Francoeur v. Beatty, 170 Cal. 746, 151 Pac. 123. The fact that there was no valuable consideration, therefore, does not deprive the assignment of its effectual force to pass the title to the notes.

[3] Section 3440 of the Civil Code does not require an immediate delivery, or an actual or continued change of possession, in order that a transfer of a thing in action shall be valid as to creditors. It applies to personal property "other than a thing in action." Hence it has no application to this case. As to a chose in action, to destroy the validity of its transfer, there must be proof of actual fraudulent intent, or of insolvency, or of contemplation of insolvency. Civ. Code, §§ 3439, 3442. Moreover, an administrator cannot avoid a transfer of personal property on the ground that there was not such delivery or change of possession, unless he alleges and proves that there are creditors of the estate and a deficiency of assets to pay the debts. Murphy v. Clayton, 114 Cal. 526, 43 Pac. 613, 46 Pac. 460. The record here contains no allegation or finding to that effect, or on that subject.

The assignment itself purported to transfer the notes immediately to the plaintiff. As it was duly signed, acknowledged, and delivered to the plaintiff, it constituted the strongest of evidence of the intention of the assignor to transfer the notes to the plaintiff in the manner there specified. And as the effect of that assignment, according to its terms, was to immediately transfer to the plaintiff the title and ownership of the notes, it constituted satisfactory, if not conclusive, evidence of the intent of the assignor to do that which the instrument, in law, would accomplish; that is, to divest herself of all right of dominion over the notes, and of all present right to, or control over, them, and to make an immediate transfer of the title thereto. It must be remembered that, as between donor and donee, it is not necessary to the validity of a gift inter vivos, if made by a written instrument transferring the title to the donee, that the possession of the thing given be passed to the donee. The transfer of the right to its immediate possession and control, the title thereto, is sufficient, and the gift then takes effect, although the donor retains all the power of control that can arise from such possession. Driscoll v. Driscoll, supra; Francoeur v. Beatty, supra.

[4] The provision declaring that "this assignment of said mortgage is not to be placed as of record during the lifetime" of the assignor does not purport to operate upon the notes, which, of course, were not entitled to record, as such. It does not purport to operate upon the title to either the mortgage or the notes, nor in any way to change the legal effect of the instrument as a conveyance thereof. The transfer of both was complete without such record.

> "A grant cannot be delivered to the grantee conditionally. Delivery to him, or to his agent, as such, is necessarily absolute, and the instrument takes effect thereupon, discharged of any condition on which delivery was made."

The word "grant," as here used, includes transfers of personal property as well as of real property. Civ. Code, § 1053. There are cases where such grant has been passed over by the grantor to the manual possession of the grantee for inspection only, or for some other purpose than that of completing its execution as a contract, wherein it is always held that such possession of the instrument does not constitute a delivery and does not pass the title to the thing. Gould v. Wise, 97 Cal. 532, 32 Pac. 576, 33 Pac. 323; Gould v. Adams, 108 Cal. 368, 41 Pac. 408. The act of delivery of possession of the instrument must be accompanied with the intent that it shall become operative as a conveyance or transfer. Kenney v. Parks, 137 Cal. 531, 70 Pac. 556. But here the acknowledgment, immediately followed, as it was, by the transfer of the possession of the instrument of assignment to the donee, without explanatory or qualifying words or acts to indicate any other intent, is, by force of section 1948 of the Code of Civil Procedure, prima facie evidence of complete execution; that is, of delivery with intent to make it operative immediately as a transfer of title. And by section 1055 of the Civil Code such an assignment, when thus duly executed, is presumed to have been delivered at its date. No evidence was given to show a different date. There is no substantial evidence of any other or different intent.

The subsequent pledge of the first note and indorsement of the second were made after the delivery of the instrument to the donor. The title had then passed. It was neither proved nor suggested that the plaintiff consented to these dealings, or that she had knowledge thereof at the time, or that she was ever informed thereof until after the death of Mrs. Doty. Those transactions, therefore, cannot be taken as evidence against her. The only fact, in connection with the notes, occuring after the delivery of the assignment, which can be evidence against the plaintiff, is that, although she had the absolute title to them, and the present means of proving such title and of obtaining possession of the notes, she did not take possession, but suffered them to remain in the possession of Mrs. Doty, who, it appears, was her niece. As she had accepted the assignment providing that she should not record it until after the donor's death, and as only six months elapsed before that event occurred, the fact is not of much significance. The failure to take possession, coupled with the direction against recording, might support the inference that there was an expectation by the plaintiff, or an understanding between the parties, that the donor, in the meantime, by reason of the ostensible authority she had from her possession, might receive payments on the notes, or make some disposition thereof for her advantage to innocent third parties. This would be contrary to the legal effect of the instrument, and if given that effect it would operate to change its terms. Its admission as evidence would be contrary to the principle that an agreement in writing, made without fraud or mistake, and not ambiguous, is to be considered as embracing all the terms of the contract and that, between the parties, or their successors in interest, there can be no evidence of the agreement other than the contents of the writing. Code Civ. Proc. § 1856. Under the circumstances shown, the delay in taking possession cannot be deemed substantial evidence that the assignment was not completely delivered as an operative instrument.

The evidence considered in the cases of Estate of Hall, 154 Cal. 527, 98 Pac. 269, and Knight v. Tripp, 121 Cal. 674, 54 Pac. 267, to the effect that there was no intent to make a complete delivery of the written transfers there involved, was of much greater force than the evidence here presented. Those cases go to the extreme limits that can be allowed in holding transfers in the hands of the transferee ineffectual, and we do not think it necessary or advisable to enlarge further the opportunities of attacking contracts deliberately and ceremoniously executed by applying those cases as precedents here.

PEOPLE v. GRIESHEIMER. (Cr. 2045.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑1167(1)—APPEAL.

Under Const. art. 6, § 4½, providing that no judgment shall be set aside or new trial granted for error as to pleading unless the court is of the opinion that it resulted in a miscarriage of justice, an alleged defect in an information, charging the crime of obtaining money by false pretenses, in that it failed to show the causal connection between the pretense and the surrender of the money, is not a ground for reversal.

2. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑823(4)—INSTRUCTIONS—ERROR CURED.

In prosecution for obtaining money by false pretenses, alleged defect in instruction, permitting conviction on proof of falsity of a single pretense without proof of causal connection between the pretense and the surrender of the money, was not erroneous, where the further instruction clearly set out the elements of the offense, so that the jury could not have been misled.

3. FALSE PRETENSES 🔑4—ELEMENT OF OFFENSE.

The crime of obtaining money by false pretenses is complete when the defendant obtains the money from the prosecuting witness by false and fraudulent representations, and it is not necessary to show his disposition of the money.

Henshaw, Melvin, and Lorigan, JJ., dissenting.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Frederick Griesheimer was convicted of obtaining money by false pretenses, and from the judgment and an order denying new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Rothchild, Golden & Rothchild and Oliver Dibble, all of San Francisco, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., and C. M. Fickert and James F. Brennan, both of San Francisco, for the People.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of obtaining money by false pretenses under section 532 of the Penal Code, and prosecutes this appeal from the judgment and from on order denying a new trial.

1. It is claimed by the appellant in support of this appeal that his general demurrer to the information should have been sustained. The charging part of the information is as follows:

"The said Frederick Griesheimer, on or about the 25th day of May, A. D. 1915, at the said city and county of San Francisco, state of California, then and there devising and intending by unlawful ways and means, and by false and fraudulent pretenses and representations, to obtain and get into his possession the goods, money, and personal property of one Karl Muck with intent then and there to cheat and defraud the said Karl Muck of the same, did then and there willfully and unlawfully, knowingly and designedly, falsely and fraudulently, pretend and represent to said Karl Muck that he, the said Frederick Griesheimer, was then and there employed by the Fatherland Magazine, a corporation, organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of New York, and that he, the said Frederick Griesheimer, was then and there authorized, empowered, and instructed by said corporation to solicit loans and subscriptions on behalf of said corporation, and that he, the said Frederick Griesheimer, was then and there authorized and empowered by said corporation to receive and receipt for said subscriptions and loans for and on behalf of the said corporation, and that he, the said Frederick Griesheimer, had then and there solicited and received several specific and distinct contributions of money from the following German-American citizens of the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, to wit: That N. Ohlandt of San Francisco, Cal., had subscribed for and paid to him. the said Frederick Griesheimer, $150 in lawful money of the United States of America, for and on behalf of said corporation; that E. L. Hueter of San Francisco, Cal., had subscribed for and paid to him, said Frederick Griesheimer, the sum of $300 in lawful money of the United States of America, for and on behalf of the said corporation; that C. E. Grunsky of San Francisco, Cal., had subscribed for and paid to him, the said Frederick Griesheimer the sum of $300 in lawful money of the United States of America, for and on behalf of said corporation; that Max Schmidt of San Francisco, Cal., had subscribed for and paid said Frederick Griesheimer the sum of $75 in lawful money of the United States of America, for and on behalf of said corporation, and the said Frederick Griesheimer did then and there show and exhibit to said Karl Muck, a certain written list which said Frederick Griesheimer then and there represented contained the names of each of said parties so subscribing, together with the amounts subscribed by each written in the individual handwriting of each of the said parties so subscribing respectively.

"Whereas, in truth and in fact, he, the said Frederick Griesheimer, was not then and there employed by the said Fatherland Magazine, a corporation organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the State of New York, and he, the said Frederick Griesheimer, was not then or there authorized, empowered, or instructed, by said corporation to solicit loans or subscriptions on behalf of said corporation, and he, the said Frederick Griesheimer, was not then or there authorized or empowered by said corporation to receive or receipt for any subscription or loans for or on behalf of said corporation, and he, the said Frederick Griesheimer, had not then or there solicited or received the several and distinct contributions of money from said German-American citizens of San Francisco, Cal., as said Frederick Griesheimer then and there represented to said Karl Muck; that N. Ohlandt of San Francisco, Cal., had not subscribed for or paid to him, the said Frederick Griesheimer, the sum of $150 in lawful money of the United States of America, or any sum in excess of $50 for or on behalf of said corporation; that E. L. Hueter of San Francisco, Cal., had not subscribed or paid to him, the said Frederick Griesheimer, the sum of $300 in lawful money of the United States of America, or any sum in excess of $20 for or on behalf of said corporation; that C. E. Grunsky of San Francisco, Cal., had not subscribed for or paid to him, the said Frederick Griesheimer, the sum of $300 in lawful money of the United States of America, or any other sum of money whatsoever, for or on behalf of said corporation; that Max Schmidt of San Francisco, Cal., had not subscribed for or paid to him, the said Frederick Griesheimer, the sum of $75 in lawful money of the United States of America, or any other sum for or on behalf of said corporation; that said written list which said Frederick Griesheimer showed and exhibited to said Karl Muck, as aforesaid, was not signed by either said Max Schmidt or said C. E. Grunsky, and the amount and amounts as shown on said list as being subscribed by said N. Ohlandt and said E. L. Hueter were false and fraudulent, and he, the said Frederick Griesheimer, did not have any authority whatsoever then or there or at any time to solicit subscriptions for said corporation or to solicit loans for said corporation, and had not authority of any kind or description from said corporation, as he, the said Frederick Griesheimer, then and there well knew:

"And the said Karl Muck then and there believing the said false pretenses and representations so made as aforesaid by the said Frederick Griesheimer to be true, and relying thereon and being deceived thereby, was induced by reason of said false and fraudulent pretenses and representations, so made as aforesaid to deliver, and did then and there deliver, to said Frederick Griesheimer the sum of $300 in lawful money of the United States of America of the value of $300 in gold coin of the United States of America and of the goods and personal property and moneys of the said Karl Muck; and the said Frederick Griesheimer then and there by means of the said false and fraudulent pretenses and representations so made as aforesaid, did then and there willfully and unlawfully, knowingly and designedly and fraudulently, receive and obtain from the said Karl Muck the said goods and personal property and money hereinbefore described with intent to cheat and defraud Karl Muck of the same, and the said Frederick Griesheimer did then and there willfully and unlawfully take and carry away the same."

The particular defect in this information, as urged by appellant, is that it does not show the causal connection between the false pretense and the parting of the property by the prosecuting witness, and therefore fails to state facts sufficient to constitute a public offense.

[1] We are of the opinion that as against the defendant's general demurrer the information should be held sufficient on appeal. While there is no direct allegation that the money was paid to the defendant as a subscription or loan to the Fatherland Magazine, a reader of the information could hardly draw from it any other inference than that the payment was made for such purpose. It may be conceded that a direct allegation to this effect would have been more in accord with technical requirements. But what was intended to be charged in this connection is perfectly plain from the language in fact used, and no person of common understanding could fail to understand that it was substantially charged, by necessary inference at least, that the money was paid because of the alleged false representations, and for the purpose suggested thereby. Section 4½, art. 6, of the Constitution provides that:

> "No judgment shall be set aside, or new trial granted in any case, * * * for any error as to any matter of pleading, * * * unless, after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice."

We are satisfied that to reverse the judgment on this ground would be to entirely ignore this provision of our Constitution.

2. Complaint is made as to a certain instruction given to the jury. The court instructed the jury as follows:

"In a case of this kind there can be no actual fraud, and there can be no criminal offense, unless the prosecuting witness was actually defrauded; or, in other words, unless the prosecuting witness sustained an actual injury from the alleged false representations. It is not sufficient that the prosecuting witness parted with his money by reason of the alleged false representations, but it must also be proved and established, beyond all reasonable doubt and to a moral certainty, that the prosecuting witness actually sustained a money injury by reason of the same.

"As an amplification of that instruction, and with a view, perhaps, to further and better explain the doctrine which it announces, I will say to you that if a list purporting to contain the names of subscribers to any fund, whatsoever may be its character, is exhibited to another person with a view of inducing him also to subscribe for the fund, and false statements are made as to the giving of subscriptions by some of those whose names are written down upon the fund list, and if misrepresentations are made as to amounts actually subscribed or contributed by some of those whose names are written down upon the fund list, and the party making those misrepresentations knows, at the time he makes them, that they are false, and makes them with intent to thereby prevail upon or induce the party to whom they are made to subscribe money to the fund and to deliver money over to him to be applied to the fund or purpose, and if as a matter of fact those statements made under those circumstances are, by the party to whom they are made, believed to be true, and if he by reason of that fact, namely, his belief in the truth of the representations, subscribes toward the fund and actually pays over money to be applied to it, and he is induced so to do, I think I have already stated, by reason of the misrepresentations made under those circumstances, the party so making those misrepresentations would, as a matter of law, be guilty of the offense of obtaining money under false pretenses.

"In order to constitute the offense of obtaining money or property by false or fraudulent representations or pretenses, four separate and distinct things must concur: First, there must be an actual fraud committed; second, false pretenses must be used for the purpose of perpetrating the fraud; third, the fraud must be accomplished by means of the false pretenses, and the false pretenses must be made use of for that purpose, and the false pretenses must be the cause which induced the owner to part with his money or property; fourth, there must be an intent to defraud; and where one is charged with the commission of such crime, before he can be convicted, you must find, beyond a reasonable doubt and to a moral certainty, that each and all of such elements existed and concurred.

"If you find that some of the alleged false representations set forth in the information, one or more, but not all, have been established to a moral certainty and beyond all reasonable doubt, and further find, to a moral certainty and beyond all reasonable doubt, that the complaining witness was induced, by reason of his belief in the existence of one or several of the alleged false representations, and he was by reason of his belief in their existence induced to part with his money, you would in that case adjudge the defendant guilty, provided you so find, of course, to a moral certainty and beyond all reasonable doubt.

"If you entertain any reasonable doubt as to whether any one of those false representations has been established to a moral certainty and beyond all reasonable doubt, or if you entertain any reasonable doubt as to whether—assuming that you do find false representations to have been made; if you entertain any reasonable doubt as to whether they, or any one of them or any several of them, caused or induced the complaining witness to part with his money, why, of course, in that case also it would be your duty to return in the case a verdict of not guilty.

"* * * And I think I have made it clear to you, and will again undertake to state the proposition, that, if there be any one false pretense or representation of the several charged in the information, which you find, to a moral certainty and beyond all reasonable doubt, to have been made by the defendant, and which one misrepresentation you further find, to a moral certainty and beyond all reasonable doubt, caused or induced the complaining witness to part with his money, why, that would meet every requirement of the law quite as much as if each and every one of the false pretenses or representations so charge were shown to exist, and so shown to a moral certainty and beyond all reasonable doubt."

[2] It is earnestly urged that the particular instruction commencing with the words, "As an amplification of that instruction," is erroneous in that it directs a conviction on proof of the falsity of only one of the alleged representations as to the amounts subscribed by the various persons whose names appeared on the list shown Mr. Muck, even though the jury was not satisfied that the particular representation was a material inducement to Mr. Muck's subscription. Of course it is admitted that where an information charges several false pretenses, a conviction may be had, and will be sustained by proof of only one of such pretenses, provided it be established to the satisfaction of the jury that the particular pretense provided was material in inducing the complaining witness to part with his property. It requires a somewhat critical and technical analysis of the particular instruction complained of to find anything therein in conflict with this well-settled law, and we are satisfied that in view of all that was said by the court to the jury in this immediate connection, no such effect as is claimed could reasonably have been attributed by the jury to the instruction. Reading the instructions on this subject as we have set them forth, it is plain enough that it was made perfectly clear to the jury that in order to convict upon the ground that any particular representation was falsely and fraudulently made, they must be satisfied beyond all reasonable doubt that the particular representation was material in inducing Mr. Muck to part with his money.

3. As to the claim of insufficiency of evidence: We have carefully considered the record, and feel warranted in asserting that any jury of reasonable and fair men could not but be convinced by the evidence beyond all reasonable doubt of the guilt of the defendant of the offence charged, in so far as the representation that he was employed by the Fatherland Publishing Company and authorized to solicit loans and subscriptions on behalf thereof was concerned, which it clearly enough appears, was an effective representation inducing the parting with his money by Muck. This transaction was at a time prior to the entry of the United States into the war in which we are now engaged, and the Fatherland was supposed to be engaged in creating sentiment in this country in favor of Germany as against the Allies. Such was the purpose of the requested assistance as outlined in the purported authorization exhibited by defendant to Muck, and the latter, as a strong sympathizer with the cause of Germany, was an easy victim to the scheme of defendant. That this representation had a controlling effect with him indisputably appears from his testimony. Much reliance is placed upon the fact that no direct evidence was introduced showing that the purported written authorization to one "Henry M. Meyers" bearing date April 2, 1915, which was exhibited to Mr. Muck on May 21st by this defendant, as his credentials, he claiming to be Meyers, was not a genuine instrument. Under the circumstances such evidence was not essential. The falsity of the representation as to authority was otherwise sufficiently shown to satisfy beyond all reasonable doubt any fair juror. Admittedly the purported telegram of May 24, 1915, from the Fatherland to "Meyers and Schmidt, Special Representative Fatherland Magazine," exhibited by defendant as Meyers to Muck on May 25th, implying authority in every line, and on the strength of which the last $200 of the $300 was obtained from Muck on that day, was an absolute forgery concocted by defendant. This particular transaction, the obtaining of the $200 on May 25th, was the one as to which the district attorney elected to rely. This, together with other facts and circumstances disclosed by the evidence, amply showed the falsity of the representation as to authority. There is no force in the claim that the $300 was not obtained by defendant. The evidence sufficiently shows that the checks on a Boston bank given by Muck to defendant, after being cashed by defendant at the Fairmont Hotel office, were forwarded in due course of business to the drawee bank and never repudiated. In fact, we are satisfied, as already stated, that every essential element of the offense is clearly and and absolutely shown by the evidence, and that, in view of the record, there can be no doubt of the guilt of the defendant.

[3] 4. It is urged that it was not affirmatively shown that the money obtained by defendant was not in fact subsequently paid by him to the Fatherland. Without this proof it is urged there is no proof of injury to Muck. The crime charged against this defendant was complete upon his obtaining the money from Muck by false and fraudulent representations, and it was not necessary to show what defendant did with it. See People v. Bryant, 119 Cal. 597, 51 Pac. 960.

5. It cannot be held to have been error warranting reversal for the court to refuse to give the requested instruction as to the burden of proof being on the prosecution to prove beyond all reasonable doubt the alleged false representation that defendant was authorized to collect moneys for the Fatherland. The jury could not have understood otherwise from all the instructions given than that such was the situation as to each and all of the material allegations of the information, and there was nothing in this case to make imperative the giving of such an instruction directed specially to one of such allegations.

We find no other point in the briefs of learned counsel that requires notice. We may properly say in conclusion that in our opinion the record shows no error substantially affecting defendant's rights, and that it undoubtedly shows his guilt of the offense charged. This case falls as clearly within the provisions of section 4½, art. 6, of the Constitution as any case that has ever been presented to us.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

We concur: SHAW, J.; SLOSS, J.; LAWLOR, J.

HENSHAW, J. I dissent. In the opinion of the learned CHIEF JUSTICE three main propositions are discussed. The first, the sufficiency of the indictment; the second, the legality of the instructions; the third, the adequacy of the evidence. As to each of these propositions it is demonstrably true that this court's decision is at variance with that of every other court which makes the English common law the basis of its jurisprudence. But even for this I would not feel impelled to express my dissenting views at length saving for the additional fact that section 4½, art. 6, of our Constitution is employed, like the mantle of charity, to cover this multitude of sins. It is against this entirely unwarranted extension of the provision of this section of the Constitution that I am moved to protest.

1. The sufficiency of the indictment. It is to be noted and remembered that the indictment does not charge that Karl Muck gave his money to the Fatherland Magazine, or that he gave it to defendant for the Fatherland Magazine. On the contrary, it is distinctly charged that he gave it to the defendant. The profession is advised by the learned CHIEF JUSTICE that "a reader of the information could hardly draw from it any other inference than that the payment was made for such purpose" (that is, to be delivered to the Fatherland Magazine), and, further, that "no person of common understanding could fail to understand that it was substantially charged, by necessary inference at least, that the money was paid because of the alleged false representations, and for the purpose suggested thereby" (namely, to be delivered to the Fatherland Magazine). To this I make answer that direct averments are required in every indictment and information, and the only inferences which can be drawn are those which the law itself draws, such as the presumption that a defendant intends the consequences of his act, that he has passed his nonage and is therefore accountable for his acts, and that he is sane and therefore responsible for his acts. Such, and such inferences alone does the law permit. Juries in weighing the evidence may draw inferences if reasonably deducible from the evidence, but I take it that this is the first time in the history of criminal pleading that inferences have been indulged in to make good an indictment otherwise lacking in averment, and that such inferences are indulged against the direct allegation of the indictment. Generally, as has been said, inferences to make out the charge of crime are not permissible, for two most obvious and oft-repeated reasons: The first, because every inference to be drawn shall be one of fair dealing and not of guilt; the second, because the presumption of innocence countervails against all other inferences or presumptions until the proofs establish the contrary. Second, we have not the omission of an allegation in this indictment. We have the direct allegation that the money was given to the defendant, and this, by inference, is distorted to mean what is not alleged, that it was given to the defendant as the agent, for transmission to the Fatherland Magazine. Again, even if such an inference could be indulged as against the express allegation to the contrary, it becomes necessary, as a matter of good pleading, to charge that in fact this money was not so delivered by the defendant to the Fatherland Magazine, or there has been a failure to state the crime, and this is not done. This is not charged. Still further we have an indictment which the defendant, under every rule and principle of law, is entitled to take at its face value. So taking it, the indictment charges in terms that by reason of certain false misrepresentations Karl Muck gave the defendant $300. There is an absolute failure to show the causal connection between the allegations of false representations and the allegation of payment of money, and in any such indictment it is only where the payment follows inevitably and as matter of necessary consequence from the allegations of false representation that the omission so to charge that causal connection does not constitute a fatal defect, in the indictment.

The rules of pleading of actual fraud in a criminal case are certainly no more relaxed than the rules which obtain in pleading the same fraud in a civil case, and if anything should be the more stringently applied where a man is put on trial for a crime. People v. McKenna, 81 Cal 158, 22 Pac. 488. But to make clear my meaning beyond peradventure, let those rules here be briefly summarized. The acts constituting the fraud must be sufficiently set forth. It must be charged that these acts, of speech or conduct, were uttered and done with intent to deceive; that the plaintiff or person injured relied on them and was justified in his reliance on them; that they were false, and either known to be false at the time the defendant committed them, or were said and done under circumstances not warranted by the knowledge of the defendant; and, finally, that because of his justified reliance upon these statements and acts the plaintiff, or person injured, parted with money or property when otherwise he would not have done so. People v. Jordan, 66 Cal. 10, 4 Pac. 773, 56 Am. Rep. 73.

It is manifest, therefore, that the connection between the fraudulent acts by the one and the parting with money or property by the other must appear from the pleading. The fraud and the injury must be shown as cause and result, or, as it is commonly phrased in the law, the "causal connection" between the false pretenses and the deprivation of property must appear. 3 Bishop, Crim. Pro. § 169 et seq.; 1 McLain, Crim. Law, §§ 680, 681. Let this be illustrated by a single simple example. The crime charged is that A. told B. that he had erected a flagstaff 200 feet high in Golden Gate Park. B. was entitled to rely on the statement, and did rely on it. It was made to induce B. to give A. $300. The statement was wholly false, and known to A. to be wholly false at the time he made it, but B. relied on it, and in his reliance was induced to give B. $300, and did so. The human mind might infer and presume to an unlimited extent over the reason why B. gave $300 simply because A. had told him falsely that he had erected a flagstaff in the park. But when the last word was said, that word would be speculative guesswork because no causal connection between the false declaration by A. and the parting with the money by B. is shown. If, however, the complaint further charged that B. had commissioned A. to erect this flagstaff and had promised to pay him $300 when it was erected, the motive inducing B. to part with his money is at once shown, the causal connection appears, and the complaint is a sufficient pleading.

As has already been said, since fraud is never presumed and since a defendant charged with crime is presumed to be innocent, no inferences or presumptions can be indulged in to support a pleading radically defective in its effort to charge fraud (Harding v. Robinson, 166 Pac. 808); although, of course, the usual presumptions accompany and all legitimate inferences may be drawn from the evidence.

The charges of misrepresentation and false representation in this information are two: (1) Touching the defendant's agency and right and power to solicit, receive, and receipt for "loans and subscriptions on behalf of the Fatherland Magazine, a corporation"; (2) that sundry German-American citizens of the city and county of San Francisco, four of whom are named, "had made contributions of money on behalf of the said corporation," while the truth was that two of these citizens had made contributions in sums less than the defendant stated, and the other two had not contributed at all. Karl Muck it is charged, in reliance on these false and fraudulent statements, "did then and there deliver to said Frederick Griesheimer the sum of $300," and Frederick Griesheimer thus and thereby "did then and there willfully and unlawfully, knowingly and designedly and fraudulently, receive and obtain from the said Karl Muck the said goods and personal property and money hereinbefore described with intent to cheat and defraud Karl Muck of the same, and the said Frederick Griesheimer did then and there willfully and unlawfully take and carry away the same." There is in this no charge that Muck "delivered" the money to Griesheimer as the agent of the Fatherland Magazine as and for a loan or subscription to or on behalf of the corporation bearing that name, and as this is not alleged and as the allegation is simply that he "delivered" the money to Griesheimer, and, finally, as the averments cannot be helped out by guesswork or inferences, this charge amounts to nothing more than that because Griesheimer had falsely represented his agency and his power as agent for the Fatherland Magazine, Muck gave him $300. Why he gave him this $300 does not appear. The causal connection is lacking absolutely. It cannot be said, we repeat, that he gave it to him as the agent of the Fatherland Magazine because this is not averred, and, not being averred, the pleading is not open to the inference that such was the fact. To the contrary, the legal inference to be drawn is that it was not the fact or it would have been pleaded. Why then, under this pleading did Muck give $300 to Griesheimer or "deliver" it to him, as the pleading phrases it? Entering the realm of speculation it may be said, as in the flagstaff instance which we have given, that Muck, interested in Griesheimer, had suggested to Griesheimer that he engage in this employment as agent of the Fatherland Magazine, and had assured him that he would make him a donation of $300 when on behalf of the magazine he had succeeded in obtaining "loans and subscriptions" from four or more prominent German-American citizens of San Francisco. If this were true, or if any one of a thousand other sets of circumstances which will readily come to mind was true and was pleaded, the complaint would be sufficient, but without it there is an absence of all showing why the representation, even though false, should have led Muck to part with his money and deliver it to Griesheimer.

Turning to the second phase of this information—the charge of false representation in the matter of the number of subscribers and the amounts of their subscription, the same difficulty appears. Why should Muck have delivered $300 to Griesheimer because Griesheimer had falsely represented that the four men named "had subscribed for and paid to him" (Griesheimer) stated sums of money? Here again we are left in the realm of speculation. Conceivably, A., soliciting for charity from B., might be told by B. that the latter was in no wise interested in his charity, and would not donate to it, but that C. was a wealthy man and a miser. Let A. go to C. and secure a donation from C., and B. would double the amount of that donation either as a gift personal to A. or as a donation to his charity. A. goes to C., tells him what B. has said, declares to him that he will not exact the payment of the money from C., but asks C. to give him a letter addressed to B., stating that he, C., has donated $1,000. With this false letter A. returns to B., and B. "delivers" to him $2,000. A. and C. under this set of circumstances manifestly have defrauded B., but to plead that fraud requires much more than the statement that A. represented to B. that C. had subscribed $1,000 wherefore B. "delivered" to A. $2,000.

It may be well to amplify somewhat the statement hereinbefore made touching the necessity of showing by sufficient pleading the causal connection between the false pretenses and the injury. Says Bishop (3 Bishop Crim. Proc. sec. 175):

> "Such obtaining must not come independently of the false pretenses, but by their means; so must be the allegation and sufficiently in detail to put the defendant in a position duly to make his defense."

Says Cyc. (19 Cyc. p. 429):

> "The indictment must show that the property was obtained by means of the false pretense alleged. Accordingly when there appears to be no natural connection between the pretense and the delivery of the property, such additional facts as are necessary to show the relation must be alleged. A defect in the indictment arising from failure to show the connection between the false pretense and the obtaining is a material one and is not cured by verdict."

In People v. White, 7 Cal. App. 99, 93 Pac. 683, the above language from Cyc. is made the basis of the decision, and that it is sound in principle and abundantly supported by the authorities there can be no doubt. And in People v. Kahler, 26 Cal. App. 449, 147 Pac. 228, it is held that an information which charged a defendant with the crime of obtaining money under false pretense by knowingly and falsely representing that he had a contract for the furnishing of orchestras for cafés and theaters, and that the person to whom these representations were made believed the same to be true, and, relying thereon, paid and delivered to the defendant a certain sum of money, "fails to state facts constituting a public offense, for the lack of causal connection between the payment of the money and the false representations." No single authority is given to support the mere declaration of the prevailing opinion that this indictment is sufficient; no single authority, that is, other than section 4½ of the Constitution. Yet the cases holding such an indictment to be insufficient are very numerous and uniform. A few of them only need be cited: Johnson v. State, 75 Ind. 553; State v. Green, 7 Wis. 571; State v. Baggerly, 21 Tex. 757; Simmons v. People, 187 Ill. 327, 58 N. E. 384; Enders v. People, 20 Mich. 233; Roper v. State, 58 N. J. Law, 420, 33 Atl. 969; Commonwealth v. Dunleay, 153 Mass. 330, 26 N. E. 870; Copeland v. State, 97 Ala. 30, 12 South. 181; Roberts v. State, 85 Ark. 435, 108 S. W. 842; State v. Fitzgerald, 18 N. C. 408; Curtis v. State, 31 Tex. Cr. R. 39, 19 S. W. 604; Campbell v. State, 154 Ind. 309, 56 N. E. 665; White v. State, 3 Tex. App. 605; People v. Gates, 13 Wend. (N. Y.) 311; Jones v. State, 50 Ind. 473; People v. Kinney, 110 Mich. 97, 67 N. W. 1089; State v. Whedbee, 152 N. C. 770, 67 S. E. 60, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 363; People v. Brown, 71 Mich. 296; Jacobs v. State, 31 Neb. 33, 47 N. W. 422; State v. Kelly, 170 Mo. 151, 70 S. W. 477; State v. Williams, 103 Ind. 235, 2 N. E. 585.

Moreover, it is held with equal unanimity that where an indictment or information fails by proper allegation to show this causal connection, then, under the principle above enunciated and the authorities cited, there has resulted a fatal omission of a material allegation, with the result that the information or indictment fails to charge a crime. Such a defect in the information, says Cyc., supra, "is a material one, and is not cured by verdict." Such being the case, not only is a general demurrer adequate to raise the legal point, but it may be raised without demurrer at all at any stage of the proceedings. That it can be and has been so raised, a brief consideration of some of the many authorities will demonstrate. Thus, in People v. White, supra, the failure to properly allege the causal connection was raised on general demurrer. The general demurrer was sustained, and the judgment following the demurrer, in turn, was sustained by the Court of Appeals.

In People v. Kahler, supra, the demurrer was general as well as special. While it is frequently said, and while it is often true, that a failure to plead in accordance with section 952 of the Penal Code may be made the ground of special demurrer, it is equally true that when the ground of demurrer is the failure of the pleader to comply with subdivision 3 of this section by omitting properly to charge "the particular circumstances" when such a charge is "necessary to constitute a complete offense," that ground is a ground of general demurrer if the omission be, as here, of a substantive and material allegation. A reading of the decision in People v. Kahler will at once disclose that the court was discussing the insufficiency of the pleading under an attack by general demurrer.

In State v. Miller, 153 Ind. 229, 54 N. E. 808, the defendant moved to quash the indictment simply "on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a public offense." Says the Supreme Court of Indiana:

> "The indictment was fatally defective in at least two particulars * * * it showed no connection between the false pretenses and the payment or delivery of the money by White to the appellee."

In Cummings v. State, 36 Tex. Cr. R. 152, 36 S. W. 266, the indictment charged that the defendant falsely represented to Cohen that he was the owner of and had the right to sell to Cohen for $75 a diamond stud; that Cohen relied upon and was induced by said representation to deliver to the defendant the sum of $75. Against this indictment there was presented no demurrer and no motion to quash. But an objection was interposed to the introduction of evidence under the indictment, and this objection the trial court overruled. On appeal the Supreme Court held this indictment to be fatally defective, in that "there was no allegation * * * that the defendant sold to said Cohen, or any one else, the diamond stud." Further proceeds the opinion:

> "We have searched in vain for an allegation that Cummings, as a part of the transaction, sold and delivered to said Cohen said diamond stud. Unless this actual sale and delivery are alleged, we fail to see how the transaction was completed in such shape as to afford the basis of an indictment for swindling."

In Jones v. State, 22 Fla. 532, the indictment charged that the defendant falsely pretended to one Carr that he, the defendant, was one Kirby, by means of which said false pretense the defendant did fraudulently obtain from Carr said money, and Carr was induced to part with the money by reason of this false pretense. The defendant was convicted, and after conviction moved in arrest of judgment upon the ground that the indictment did not allege facts sufficient to charge any offense and sufficient to support any verdict of guilt. Says the Supreme Court:

> "The indictment merely states that Jones represented to Carr that his name was Kirby, whereupon Carr gave him $102. It is insufficient unless it be shown that Kirby had a right to demand the money of Carr, and that it was incumbent on Carr to pay the same to Kirby, or that some such relation was existing between Carr and Kirby as would be sufficient to induce Carr to loan or deliver the money to Kirby, of which Jones in his assumed character availed himself."

In State v. Saunders, 63 Mo. 482, the indictment charged that the defendant falsely represented to the prosecutor that he, the defendant, had loaned one Marshall the sum of $300; that Marshall was solvent and still owed defendant that sum; that the account was good and collectible, and that defendant could and would assign the account to the prosecutor for the sum of $200; that the prosecutor believed such representations and pretenses, confided in them, and parted with the sum of $200; that all the pretenses were false, and "by reason of said false pretenses the defendant feloniously obtained from the prosecutor the sum of $200." Here the defendant was convicted, and on appeal the judgment of conviction was reversed upon the ground that the information failed to state a cause of action, the Supreme Court saying:

> "We think the indictment is defective because it is nowhere averred in it that defendant either sold, assigned, or delivered the account to Sullivan (prosecutor), or that Sullivan bought it and parted with his money for it, relying on the false and fraudulent representations of defendant."

Further, the court quotes with approval the cases of Commonwealth v. Goddard, 4 Allen (Mass.) 312, and State v. Bonnell, 46 Mo. 395, saying:

> "The indictment, failing to aver material facts necessary to be proved on the trial before a conviction could have been had, is not sufficient to support the judgment, and it should have been arrested."

In State v. Bonnell, above cited, the indictment averred that the defendant, intending to cheat and defraud one Jacob Hoover of his goods and moneys, unlawfully, knowingly, and designedly did falsely pretend to him that he, the defendant, was then and there the owner of and had the right to sell and could make a good title to three head of cattle, whereas, Bonnell was not the owner of the cattle and had no title to them as he well knew, "by means of which said false pretenses the said Bonnell did feloniously, * * * obtain from the said Hoover the sum of $30 with intent to cheat and defraud." The defendant was put upon trial, found guilty, and moved in arrest of judgment upon the general ground that the information was insufficient to charge a crime against him. His motion was denied. On appeal the Supreme Court held the plea good, and reversed the trial court, declaring that the indictment "does not contain an averment of the material facts which the state would be bound to prove before it could ask a conviction," and further in the discussion set forth its reasons in admirable terms as follows:

> "Although under the liberal system of criminal practice now prevailing in this state the same strictness is not required that was formerly necessary, still the pleader must set out in the indictment a substantive offense, and on trial the prosecution will be confined in the proof to the allegations set forth in the indictment. [Italics my own.] It will be observed that the indictment does not allege any bargain, nor any colloquium as to a bargain for the cattle, nor is there any inducement to show by reason whereof Hoover parted with his money. I think that in a case like the present, where the alleged pretenses were injurious only by inducing another person to buy the cattle as to which said false representations were made, such sale, bargain, or agreement, which was the cause of the party advancing or parting with his money, should be set out as a part of the facts relied upon and as a material allegation in the description of the offense."

In Cooke v. State, 83 Ind. 402, the indictment charged that the defendant, with intent to defraud Watt, did falsely pretend to him that he, the defendant, was the owner of a certain tract of land; that it was free from liens and incumbrances; that it was worth $10 an acre; that the soil was rich, black loam, from 8 to 14 inches deep; that it was well-timbered with hardwood timber; that there were no swamps or lakes on it, that the land was situate not more than six miles from Evart, a railroad town and a good market; that it was also not more than nine miles from Hersey, the county seat of the county; which said false pretenses were made by the defendant for the purpose of inducing Watt to execute and deliver, and to induce his wife to join with him, in a deed of conveyance (set forth in full) conveying to the defendant in consideration of the sum of $2,000 the said land; that Watt was then and there the owner of the land described, which was of the value of $5,000; that, believing said false pretenses and representations and relying on them as true and being deceived thereby, he and his wife executed and delivered to defendant said deed of conveyance of the land. It was charged that all these representations of the defendant were in fact false, and were known by the defendant to be false. The defendant moved to quash the indictment, a motion which, of course, is in effect, a general demurrer to it. His motion was denied. He was convicted, and on appeal the judgment of conviction was reversed on the stated ground that his motion to quash should have been granted, the court saying:

> "The first objection urged to the proceedings below is that the court erred in overruling the appellant's motion to quash the indictment. It is insisted that the averments in the indictment did not, in any material sense, show that the false pretenses alleged to have been made by the appellant were the operative cause in inducing Watt to sign the deed of conveyance set out in the indictment. In our opinion the indictment was, in the respect suggested, fatally defective. It contained no averment of any contract or agreement between Watt and the appellant concerning the Michigan land, or of any interest, either present or prospective, which Watt may have had in the subject-matter of the pretenses and representations charged to have been made as an inducement to him to sign the deed. It is true the indictment averred that Watt relied upon these pretenses and representations when he signed the deed. But why did he rely upon them? What reason had he for doing so? That is left to conjecture merely. It may have been that an exchange of lands was at the time in contemplation, but the indictment did not make any such averment. Conceding the representations which the appellant may have made concerning Michigan land to have been false in every particular, why should Watt, for that reason, have made him a deed for another tract of land? We are unable to see any natural connection between the two transactions."

In Wagoner v. State, 90 Ind. 508, the indictment charged, with the usual allegations of fraudulent intent and guilty knowledge, that defendant falsely represented that a certain written order for the payment of money in the sum of $5.50 was good and genuine and of the value of $5.50 and was his, the defendant's, property, "by means of which * * * false token and pretense the said Jacob Wagoner did then and there obtain of and from the said Morrison certain personal property [describing it], all of the aggregate value of $5.50;" that Morrison relied upon and believed these representations, and, "thus relying on the genuineness and validity of said order, then and there delivered said goods to said Wagoner." There followed the usual allegations of the known falsity of the representations. A motion to quash this indictment was made and overruled. Upon appeal following conviction the court held the indictment fatally defective, saying:

> "Appellant's counsel further says: 'It is not shown in the indictment that the order was delivered to Lynn and Morrison, or that it was received by them in exchange for, or in payment of the goods.' This objection to the indictment seems to be well taken, is supported by authority, and must be sustained (citing cases)."

In State v. Fitzgerald, 18 N. C. 410, the defendant moved in arrest of judgment on the ground of a fatally defective indictment. His motion was denied. On appeal the denial was held to be error, the court saying:

> "It is not necessary to inquire whether by means of such a false affirmation a cheat or fraud might not be practiced under circumstances which would subject the offender to a criminal prosecution; but it seems to us essential, in a case where there is no obvious connection between the result produced and the falsehood practiced, that the facts should be set forth which do connect the consequence with the deceitful practice."

In Commonwealth v. Dunleay, 153 Mass. 330, 26 N. E. 871, the agent of an insurance company was indicted for obtaining money under false pretenses by sending to the insurance company a fictitious application upon the acceptance of which he was to receive a commission. The indictment charged that the employment of defendant by the insurance company was to solicit and obtain applications to said insurance company for a compensation to be paid the agent, alleged that the compensation would be due the defendant upon the acceptance by the insurance company of the application. The Supreme Court declared:

> "The indictment does not allege that this application for insurance was ever accepted by the company. We think that the connection between the false pretense and the obtaining of the money or the bank check is not set out with the technical precision required in this commonwealth."

In Commonwealth v. Lannan, 1 Allen (83 Mass.) 590, the indictment charged that the defendant made certain false pretenses to the prosecutor by reason of which he was induced to purchase of defendant a certain horse and gave to the defendant the sum of $250. The defendant's motion in arrest of judgment was denied; the Supreme Court of Massachusetts held that it should have been granted, saying:

> "Although the allegation is directly made that he gave and delivered to the defendant certain property in payment for the horse, it is not averred that he made this payment and delivery by reason of the false pretenses alleged."

In People v. Brown, 71 Mich. 296, 38 N. W. 916, the indictment charged that the defendant represented to the complaining witness that he was the agent of a corporation; that the corporation was a responsible and reliable company; that it had a paid-up capital of $100,000; that it would faithfully fulfill all its contracts, and that, relying on these representations, the complaining witness was induced to sign and deliver two certain promissory notes to the defendant. After conviction defendant appealed, urging that the information did not state a public offense. The Supreme Court of Michigan said:

> "The information does not point out for what consideration these notes were given, or to whom they were payable, or whether negotiable or not. It does not show that the corporation, directly or by agent, made any agreement or had any dealings with respondent. In other words, it does not show in what way it concerned Harmon whether the Bohemian Oat & Cereal Company was an honest and responsible or a dishonest and swindling concern. There is nothing to connect the notes with any fraud practiced on Harmon. * * * The information charged no offense."

In State v. Freeman, 103 Miss. 764, 60 South. 774, the indictment charged that the defendant falsely and fraudulently pretended and represented to the complaining witness that he, the defendant, was authorized to represent a loan company, and "by means of the said false and fraudulent representations and false pretense, procured and obtained from said Rogers, good and lawful money of the United States," etc. A general demurrer to the indictment was sustained. The state appealed. The demurrer was sustained, the court saying:

> "In an indictment for false pretenses, it is necessary to charge that the pretenses were false; that the defendant knew them to be false; that he got from another certain money or other valuable things; and that the pretenses were the moving cause whereby the money or things were obtained. * * * The indictment fails to show why Rogers paid the money to the appellee, or why such false pretense should have moved him to make the payment to the appellee. * * * The indictment fails to sufficiently allege the false pretense, so as to show upon its face why such pretense was the moving cause whereby the money was obtained from Rogers. In fact, it fails to charge with clearness that the pretenses were enough to induce Rogers to turn over the money to the appellee."

In Roper v. State, 58 N. J. Law, 420, 33 Atl. 969, the indictment charged that the defendant falsely represented to the prosecutor that a certain company was a bona fide building and loan association and had $75,000 cash on hand to loan. Then followed allegations declaring the falsity of these statements, and the indictment proceeded to charge that "by color and means of such said false and fraudulent pretenses the said Roper did then and there willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously obtain from the prosecutor $3,000 with intent then and there to cheat and defraud him thereof." The Supreme Court of New Jersey declared the indictment to be plainly insufficient, saying:

> "The rule of pleading in these cases is entirely settled. Lord Mansfield, in a case before him, said that the indictment must contain a history of the offense; that is, the essential facts must be set forth to this extent; that is, if the facts stated shall be proved, the defendant's guilt will be established. * * * The indictment before the court, on this record, is fatally defective."

In Simmons v. People, 187 Ill. 327, 58 N. E. 384, the court overruled defendant's motion to quash the indictment and his motion in arrest of judgment based on the insufficiency of the indictment. The indictment was framed with much elaboration, and charged in six counts. It was charged that the defendant falsely represented to the complaining witness that he was the agent of a syndicate controlling certain corporations, that his son was another such agent, and authorized on behalf of the syndicate to take title of the complaining witness' lot in his, the son's, own name as trustee of the syndicate, and to agree to pay in his own name on behalf of the syndicate an incumbrance on the complaining witness' land of $7,000; that these false pretenses were made to induce the complaining witness to execute a deed conveying a lot to defendant's son, and that the prosecuting witness, by means of such inducements, did execute and deliver said deed to defendant's son, with much more to like effect. The Supreme Court of Illinois declared that, notwithstanding its elaboration, the indictment did not "show that any such pretenses had any connection whatever with the signing and delivery of Bryant's deed," saying further:

> "It was next necessary, by the indictment, to connect them with the making of Bryant's deed, so as to show that they operated in obtaining his signature. The connection between the pretenses and obtaining the signature must appear either by a natural connection between them, or by facts properly averred, so that the facts will lead to a necessary legal conclusion of the guilt of the defendant. * * * The counts in question do not show in any way that the false pretenses as to the character in which the defendant was acting induced the making of the deed."

In Curtis v. State, 31 Tex. Cr. R. 39, 19 S. W. 604, the indictment charged that the defendant falsely represented to one Hawkins that he had sold certain land belonging to him, the defendant, for $250, which would be due and payable in November; that these representations were false, and that "by means thereof he induced Hawkins to deliver to defendant a certain mule of the value of $110." On appeal after conviction the Supreme Court held that the motion in arrest of judgment should have been granted, saying:

> "There is only one question that need be considered, and that is the sufficiency of the indictment. It is not alleged that any contract was made, nor that * * * Hawkins was to be paid out of the said sum of $250 which was to become due November 15, 1891, nor that he was to be paid at all, except by inference. The indictment should allege all the material facts necessary to be proved to convict the defendant, and not leave them to inference and argument (citing cases). * * * Tested by these requirements, we think the indictment fatally defective."

In Roberts v. State, 85 Ark. 435, 108 S. W. 842, the defendant represented to the complaining witness that he was a graduate eye specialist holding diplomas from three separate schools; that he was competent to treat the eyes of the complaining witness' son, and had lawful authority so to do, and falsely pretended that he was a regular practicing oculist, and "by means of which false and fraudulent representations he, the said P. F. Roberts, did then and there fraudulently and feloniously obtain from him" certain moneys and promissory notes, "whereas in truth all of the above representations were false." Defendant, convicted, made a motion in arrest of judgment. It was denied. Upon appeal the Supreme Court held the indictment insufficient upon the ground that the causal connection was not shown, the court saying:

> "A false representation by one claiming to be a physician that he is a graduate of colleges and is authorized by law to practice his profession has, of itself, no apparent tendency to induce a person to part with his money, unless such person is alleged to have engaged his services and paid him for them on account of the false pretenses. The allegations cannot mean that the defrauded person paid the money solely on account of the alleged false pretense, for that alone is not calculated to induce one to part with his property; and yet it cannot be inferred, in the face of the omission, to allege anything else; that something else was done which induced the payment of the money."

It is thus made to appear that the omission to charge the causal connection results in a fatal defect in the information or indictment of which the defendant may avail himself by general demurrer or by motion in arrest of judgment. Nor is this defect cured by section 950 of the Penal Code, which declares that the indictment or information must contain "a statement of the acts constituting the offense, in ordinary and concise language, and in such manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended." The argument which invokes this section in aid of this information would seem to imply that any indictment or information should be held sufficient if a person of common understanding knew that the indictment meant to charge a crime. The prevailing opinion declares that:

> "No person of common understanding could fail to understand that it was charged by necessary inference at least," etc.

Here, then, is the startling announcement that the sufficiency of an information is no more to be tested by the long-established and vitally important rules governing the laying of criminal complaints, but is to be determined by what this court may think a man of "common understanding," indulging in inferences, might conclude that it meant. Heretofore I have held the belief that the Code meant that the language of an indictment should be such that the ordinary man would understand the language and know what it meant, but that the sufficiency of that language to charge a crime did not rest on what the ordinary man understood it to mean, but always on whether the reasonable meaning of the things said was adequate under the rules of criminal pleading to charge a crime. This belief must now be discarded. But I cannot discard it without the protesting declaration that such until now has never been the law of this state, and that the new law as now declared finds as little warrant in section 4½ of the Constitution as it does in section 950 of the Penal Code. The right of a defendant to have a crime charged against him with precision is a substantial right. The right of a defendant not to be put upon trial unless a crime is charged against him with due exactness is also a substantial right, and while this provision of the Constitution, with this section of the Code, is designed to aid many forms of lameness in pleading, in rulings on evidence, and in the giving of instructions, it was never designed as a panacea for all the infirmities of legal procedure, and least of all to breathe life into a criminal information or indictment which without it would be a corpse. For, I repeat, it is essential to every valid indictment that every fact necessary to charge a crime should be made the subject of direct averment and not left to inference. Barton v. People, 135 Ill. 405, 25 N. E. 776, 10 L. R. A. 306. 25 Am. St. Rep. 375; Connor v. State, 29 Fla. 455, 10 South. 891, 30 Am. St. Rep. 134; 19 Cyc. 419; 20 Cent. Digest, pars. 31 to 53. Says Lord Kenyon in Rex v. Holland, 5 Term Rep. 607:

> "Indictments should be certain, that posterity may know what law is to be derived from the record."

Says Gibson, C. J., in Hartman v. Commonwealth, 5 Pa. 60:

> Precision is "of the last importance to the innocent, for it is that which marks the limit of the accusation and fixes the proof of it."

And this court in bank has said:

> "Constructive crimes—crimes built up by courts, with the aid of inference, implication, and strained interpretation—are repugnant to the spirit and letter of English and American criminal law." People v. McNulty, 77 Cal. 164, 19 Pac. 237, 11 Am. St. Rep. 257.

Let me now address myself to the first phase of what I conceive to be a misapplication and an undue extension of the meaning of section 4½ of our Constitution. The reasoning of the prevailing opinion bears no other construction than this: That because "a reader of the information could hardly draw from it any other inference" than that the information meant to say that which in terms it does not say, and because "no person of common understanding could fail to understand that it was substantially charged by necessary inference at least" that the defendant had committed the crime of obtaining moneys by false pretenses, and as the evidence was sufficient to show his guilt, all errors, irregularities, and omissions in the information (as well as all errors at the trial) become immaterial because a guilty man has been found guilty, and therefore there is no "miscarriage of justice." I have said, and I think I have abundantly shown, that there is such a miscarriage of justice within the meaning of our law when any man is forced to trial upon a criminal charge under an information or indictment which does not measure up to the rules of legal sufficiency. The principle is not that the evidence subsequently taken may show his guilt, but that there was no proper procedure before the court to justify the taking of that evidence, and this the citations and quotations above given abundantly establish.

I have said that the reasoning of the prevailing opinion bears no other construction than that which I have given it. To the end that if it was susceptible of some other construction, that fact might be made plain, I submitted to the learned CHIEF JUSTICE the following questions, stating that his answers to them would tend to clarify to my mind his views of the law and of the scope and applicability of section 4½:

> "1. The indictment charged that 'A. defrauded B. of $300'—no more. Demurrer overruled. The evidence clearly established that within the state of California and within the period fixed by the statute of limitations A. defrauded B. of $300, in the matter of fraudulently selling land twice. Pen. Code, § 533. Is the conviction good, and under your opinion in the Griesheimer Case, and, if not, why is it not good? Every man of common understanding knows what a charge of defrauding means, namely, that by some trick or device or pretense A. cheated B. out of $300. True, fraud is but a conclusion of the pleader, and the facts are not pleaded, but they are implied, and if defendant is guilty he knows what those facts are better than anybody and if he is innocent, he has no occasion for worry and is not injured; and particularly is this true when at the trial defendant was offered all the time he desired to produce evidence to meet that of the prosecution.
> "2. The indictment charged that A. 'killed a man'—no more than this. Demurrer overruled. The evidence clearly established that within the state of California A. murdered B. Is the conviction obtained under such an indictment good, and under your Griesheimer opinion why is it not good, since 'any man of common understanding would understand' that the indictment was not a piece of waste paper, and so that it meant to charge that the killing was murder? True, the venue is not laid, but any man of common understanding would know that the state would not charge A. with the crime unless it was committed within its boundaries. True, the name of the man killed is not given, but if the defendant killed him, he knows who is meant, and if he did not kill him it makes no difference who is meant and, besides the defect is cured by the evidence which clearly establishes that the man murdered was B. Not only is this defect cured by the evidence but it is cured by the verdict which so finds.

"3. The indictment charged that 'A., while walking with B., committed robbery.' Demurrer overruled. The evidence clearly established that A., while walking in San Francisco with B., at a time within the statutory period of limitations, by force and fear and against B.'s will, feloniously took from B.'s possession his watch. Is the conviction good, and under your Griesheimer opinion why is it not good? Robbery is a crime. The indictment charged a crime. Any man of common understanding knows this. Any man of common understanding would infer that the indictment meant to charge that B. was the victim of the robbery, and, in any event, the evidence established it, the jury found it and the defects are cured by the verdict.

"4. The indictment charged that 'A. committed every felony denounced by the Penal Code.' Demurrer overruled. On trial the prosecution elected to stand on seven designated felonies, and so notified defendant. Defendant was given all the time he desired to prepare his defense to each and all of these felonies. He was convicted on one of them, namely, manslaughter. The evidence overwhelmingly established his guilt. Is this conviction good, and under your Griesheimer opinion why is it not good?

"5. Under the same state of facts above given the defendant is convicted of two of the designated felonies, manslaughter and robbery. Why, for the same reasons given in your opinion in the Griesheimer Case, are not both convictions good?"

To my regret these questions have remained unanswered.

2. The prevailing opinion discusses an instruction which the court gave, and, broadly declaring that "it requires a somewhat critical and technical analysis of the particular instruction complained of to find anything therein in conflict with this well-settled law," further declares that "the injurious effect claimed" could not "reasonably have been attributed by the jury to the instruction." I did not understand, until the CHIEF JUSTICE so states, that the "jury attributed any injurious effect" to the instruction. But, passing this by, it will be noted that this conclusion rests upon bald assertion, unsupported by argument, and, while unquestionably this is the easiest way of disposing of a legal proposition, it is certainly the most unsatisfactory. It becomes incumbent on me to show by a citation to record facts, not even adverted to in the prevailing opinion: First, that the instructions are in radical conflict; and, second, that there is strong probability that the instruction complained of, erroneous in law, worked serious injustice to the defendant, even though no injurious effect was attributed to it by the jury.

It will be remembered that the information charged the showing by defendant to the prosecuting witness of a certain written list, as to which the defendant represented that each person whose name appeared on the list had subscribed the amount written opposite his name, and in particular that four German-American citizens, whose names are pleaded, had each given the amount set opposite his name. The information contains no allegation of the falsity of this list, saving as to the four names mentioned. The evidence corresponded to the allegation in showing that two of the named men had subscribed lesser amounts than those stated in the list and charged in the information, and that two others had not subscribed at all. In argument the district attorney repeatedly declared as follows:

> "If we bring in one it is as good as a thousand; and we are not supposed, and we are not obliged, to bring in all the people whose names appear on that list. * * * Now suppose, gentlemen, that the only name that was on the list at the time it was presented to Dr. Muck was the name of Mr. Ohlandt; if we prove that as to Mr. Ohlandt the amount had been changed from $50 to $150, that circumstance would be alone sufficient to convict the defendant in this case."

It is perfectly true that where an information or indictment charges several false pretenses, a conviction may be had and will be sustained by proof of only one of such pretenses, provided, always, that it be established to the satisfaction of the jury that the particular pretense which is so proved was material in inducing the complaining witness to part with his money or property. One of the court's instructions so indicates. Another, however, declares as matter of law that, if there was a false representation as to the amounts actually subscribed by some of those whose names are on the list, the defendant is guilty. Now, it must be apparent, if A. presents to B. a subscription list showing that 20 or 50 men have contributed stated amounts of money to a given cause, that the false representation as to the amount which one or two had subscribed may or may not be the material inducement to the subscription of the complaining witness. So, if a man presents a list containing purported subscribers to the stock of a corporation, the falsity of the statement that one man had subscribed might be of no materiality whatsoever, while the falsity of the statement that another man had subscribed might be very material, as the complaining witness might subscribe only upon the faith that some particular man or men of approved business sagacity had already become stockholders. But in every such case the question is an evidentiary one for resolution by the jury itself. It is for the jury to say, under the peculiar circumstances of each case, whether or not the evidence establishes that the proved false statement was a statement inducing the prosecuting witness to part with his money or property. It is not for the court, under such circumstances, to charge the jury that any such false pretense, when established, is in and of itself material. So that, while the judge of the court was careful enough to instruct as he did in the one instruction concerning the materiality of the false pretense before a conviction could be based upon it, in the other of these instructions, following the mistaken declaration of law made by the district attorney, he erred in stating, in effect, that the proof of the falsity established the materiality as matter of law.

What, then, is the logical, reasonable result of a reading of all of the instructions bearing upon this point? It is and can be only this: That the jury was instructed that they must find the materiality of any false pretense before they could base a conviction upon it. But specifically, as addressed to the evidence of this case and as matter of law, they were told that, "if misrepresentations are made as to amounts actually subscribed or contributed, and that Karl Muck, believing in the truth of the representations as to those amounts, himself subscribed toward the fund," this misrepresentation the jury is told was material. It is perfectly easy, of course, to declare that this is a "somewhat critical and technical analysis," but we need not even rest this discussion upon the counter asseveration that it is the only natural and legal analysis. For by adding to this discussion that which is omitted in the prevailing opinion, the injury I think will become plain, even to the man of "ordinary understanding." Those omitted matters are: First, the repeated argument of the district attorney, a fraction of which is above quoted, as where he says, "if we prove that as to Mr. Ohlandt that amount had been changed from $50 to $150, that circumstance would be alone sufficient to convict the defendant in this case." Who can doubt but that the instruction complained of was directly and designedly addressed to this oft-declared view which the prosecuting officer took of the law and of the evidence? But, second, the injury becomes the more apparent because it manifestly appears from the evidence—that of Dr. Muck himself—that he was in no wise influenced in his contribution by any false representation as to any particular name upon the list, nor as to any particular amount set opposite that name. Thus his testimony is:

> "Q. Why did you give this man the money, Doctor? A. First of all because he told me it was to help the German cause, and then because he showed me this list of contributions from very famous San Francisco citizens who gave the money for the same purpose."

Mr. Ohlandt, "a famous San Francisco citizen," had in fact subscribed. Would the man of common understanding, under this evidence, and unless positively instructed by the court to the contrary, say because one name upon a list of 20 or 30 was improperly or falsely there, or because Mr. Ohlandt had given $50 and not $150, in the face of the testimony of the complaining witness himself, that these trifling variances or false representations were in any sense material? Yet by the argument of the district attorney, adopted by the court in its instruction, any one of these is declared to be sufficient to warrant a conviction. And the reason for this will appear in the discussion of the next proposition, that reason being that unless the prosecution could make good its contention upon this evidence, in other words, unless it could have the jury told that such a misrepresentation established its case, the evidence failed utterly, in at least one vital point, to justify the conviction.

3. The foregoing statement is made with a due sense of responsibility occasioned by the language of the learned CHIEF JUSTICE to the effect that the evidence "undoubtedly shows his guilt of the offense charged." But neither this statement nor the following one that the "case falls as clearly within the provisions of section 4½, art. 6, of the Constitution as any case that has ever been presented to us," being mere declarations, can be permitted to stand as a substitute for a fair discussion of the evidence itself. The indictment charged that Dr. Muck's money was given by him to the defendant. The profession is told to read this indictment as meaning to charge, and as sufficiently charging, that Dr. Muck's money was given to the Fatherland Magazine through the agency of defendant. As the indictment in fact charged the offense to have been completed by the delivery of the money to defendant, so the evidence to establish the offense charged would have been complete on a showing of a delivery to and reception by the defendant of that money. This showing was made. The prosecuting officer and the trial court, not then enlightened by this court as to the true construction of the information, and having produced evidence sufficient to establish their charge, namely, the giving of the money to the defendant, there rested, as under their pleading they were entitled to rest. But it now appearing that the information must be read to charge that the money was given to the defendant for the Fatherland Magazine and that it was delivered by him to the Fatherland Magazine, there is an utter and absolute failure of the evidence to show that the Fatherland Magazine did not in fact receive the money. The information, as this court makes it read, is (and necessarily must be to charge any crime at all) that Karl Muck gave the defendant $300 for the Fatherland Magazine on the defendant's representation that he was the authorized agent to solicit and collect donations and subscriptions for that magazine, and that the defendant did not pay the money over to the Fatherland Magazine. To simplify the matter, it is as though the information charged that the defendant represented himself as an authorized collector for the Red Cross, and that the complaining witness, relying on this representation, gave the defendant $300 for the Red Cross. Manifestly if the defendant paid the money over to the Red Cross, the complaining witness has not been injured. Manifestly he is only injured if the defendant did not pay it over. Therefore the averment that it was not paid over is necessary to charge the crime, and proof that it was not paid over is necessary to establish the crime.

Yet this is brushed aside upon the asserted authority of People v. Bryant, 119 Cal. 595, 51 Pac. 960. The case of People v. Bryant, in its essentials is this: The defendant sold to plaintiff a note and mortgage under false representations touching the character of the land, pointing out as the land mortgaged land which was in fact not included in the mortgage. The lands actually mortgaged were of no value. The holding of this court is that such false representations, as it was in reliance upon them that the complaining witness purchased the note and mortgage, are sufficient when established to make out the crime charged, without regard to the question whether or not the complaining witness could ultimately reimburse herself by civil action. The opinion of this court was upon a judgment after demurrer sustained to the complaint. In sum, it is as though A. sold to B. a promissory note signed by himself and Andrew Carnegie upon the representation that Andrew Carnegie's signature was genuine. That signature being charged and proved to be fictitious and the complaining witness charging and proving that he purchased the note upon the faith of that signature, the offense is established without regard to the question whether or no the complaining witness might ultimately collect the principal and interest of the note from the one genuine maker. What this case has to do, or can have to do, with a pleading which charges that the complaining witness gave the money to the defendant for the Fatherland Magazine upon the representation that the defendant was a collecting agent for that magazine, and that the defendant never paid it over to the magazine, while the evidence establishes only the payment to the agent, and fails utterly to show that he did not pay it over to the magazine, I am unable to comprehend.

I do not think it will be contended that it was incumbent upon the defendant to prove his innocence by showing that in fact he had paid it over to the Fatherland Magazine. I take it that it will be conceded that it was the duty of the prosecution in establishing a case under the information, as this court makes it read, to show that the Fatherland Magazine did not receive the money. The evidence of Dr. Muck himself is as follows:

> "I did not give it [the money] to him [defendant]. I gave it to the Fatherland. He told me so."

The gravamen, therefore, of the offense charged in this indictment by the inferences in which the prevailing opinion indulges is that Dr. Muck was induced to make a contribution to the Fatherland Magazine. This contribution he gave to the Fatherland Magazine by delivering it to the man whom he believed to be the accredited agent of the Fatherland Magazine. Even the man of common understanding would recognize that the whole case falls to the ground if the money was in fact delivered to the Fatherland Magazine. Even the man of common understanding, knowing that it is essential to a valid conviction to establish every element of the crime, recognizes that it was vital to the case of the prosecution to show that the Fatherland Magazine did not receive this money. No attempt to make such a showing was even attempted, for the very obvious reason above given, that under the indictment as written the information charged that the money was given to the defendant and the offense was established by showing his reception of that money. Says Bishop (3 New Crim. Pro. § 183), discussing false pretenses:

> "It is essential that the indictment should be in terms to avoid any variance at the trial between allegation and proof. Conformity to this rule is attained only by the exercise of a practical skill in conjunction with legal knowledge."

Conceding that this court can and has supplied the legal knowledge lacking to the sufficiency of this indictment as drafted, it is impossible for me to perceive how it can also supply the lack of sufficient legal evidence. And in conclusion I say that no conviction which has come under my observation falls more clearly within the provisions of section 4½, art. 6, of the Constitution, in establishing a miscarriage of justice.

1. WILLS 🔑439, 440, 456, 470 — RULES OF CONSTRUCTION—STATUTE.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 1317, 1318, 1324, a will is to be construed according to the intention of the testator as ascertained from the words of the will, which words, in the absence of a clear intention otherwise, are to be taken in their ordinary sense, while section 1321 declares that, unless irreconcilable, all parts of a will are to be construed in relation to each other so as, if possible, to form one consistent whole.

2. WILLS 🔑649 — CONSTRUCTION — INTEREST DEVISED.

By her will a married woman gave all her property to her husband, appointing him executor with power to sell any or all of her real estate and personal property without an order of court. On the death of the husband one-half of the unexpended portion of the testatrix's estate was bequeathed to a specified niece and the other one-half divided among a class. Civ. Code, § 1322, declares that a distinct devise or bequest cannot be affected by any other words not equally clear or distinct. Held, that the gift to the husband was modified by the subsequent gifts; and, while he took the estate during his life with the power to consume or dispose of it, and persons dealing with him in good faith would be entitled to protection as fully as though he were absolute owner, yet he could not, during his lifetime, make a gift of the estate or dispose of it by will.

3. GIFTS 🔑77 — CAUSA MORTIS — RIGHTS OF CREDITORS.

Where decedent, who was largely indebted, shortly before his death made a gift of the bulk of his estate, his gift is, under Civ. Code, §

1150, presumed to be a gift causa mortis, which under section 1153 may be, by creditors, treated as a legacy subject to their claims under section 1563 of Code of Civil Procedure.

4. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES ⇨58—WHAT CONSTITUTES—FRAUD IN CONTEMPLATION OF INSOLVENCY.

Though defendant's grantor took from his wife's estate property which he might have devoted to payment of his debts, yet, as it could not be reached by his creditors without his action, his gift to defendant of practically all of his own estate available for the payment of his debts, he not having exercised the right to pay his debts out of the estate of his wife, is subject to attack by the grantor's executors under Civ. Code, § 3439, declaring that every transfer of property with intent to delay or defraud any creditor of his demands is void as against all creditors of the debtor and against any person upon whom the estate of the debtor devolves in trust.

5. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS ⇨39 — ASSETS OF ESTATE—"EXPEND"—"CONSUME."

Under Civ. Code, § 1324, declaring that in the absence of a clear intention to the contrary words are to be taken in their ordinary and grammatical sense, property given by a wife to her husband is not subject to the payment of his debts, though he was given absolute control, where there was a subsequent gift of any portion unexpended to any beneficiary, for the word "expend" means pay out, use up, and is synonymous with "consume," and where the first taker did not use the property for payment of his debts, it was not expended.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Consume.]

6. WILLS ⇨698 — CONSTRUCTION—JURISDICTION OF COURT.

Where the construction of a will is involved collaterally, a court of equity has jurisdiction to make the construction, even though the construction is ordinarily a question for the probate courts.

7. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS ⇨130(2) —ACTIONS TO SET ASIDE CONVEYANCE—TIME OF INSTITUTION.

Where shortly before his death the testator gave to defendant practically all of his property available to satisfy his debts which far exceeded the amount of his estate, the executor may, before obtaining an order from the probate court for sale of the property, sue to set aside the conveyance to defendant under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1589, 1590, 1591, providing for recovery of property fraudulently disposed of by a testator.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by Edson F. Adams, as executor of the last will and testament of Thomas Prather, deceased, against Samuel D. Prather and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying motion for new trial, the named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Chapman & Trefethen, of Oakland, and R. H. Countryman, of San Francisco, for appellant. Corbet & Selby, of San Francisco, Snook & Church, of Oakland, and J. P. O'Brien, of San Francisco, for respondent.

VICTOR E. SHAW, Judge pro tem. This action arose out of the following facts: Thomas Prather and Julia P. A. Prather were husband and wife. On April 6, 1906, Julia died, leaving an estate of some $600,000, which she made the subject of testamentary disposition by an olographic will in form as follows:

> "Oakland, California, Sept. 26, 1904.
> "I, Julia P. A. Prather, hereby make my will. I give all the property of which I die possessed to my husband Thomas Prather & appoint him my executor to serve without bonds. I give him power to sell any or all of my real estate and personal property without an order from the court. Upon the death of my husband the said Thomas Prather one half of the unexpended portion of my estate bequeathed to my husband to be given to my niece Julia Adams, daughter of my brother, Edson F. Adams, the other one-half to be given to the surviving daughters of my brother Edson F. Adams in equal shares. I revoke all or any wills heretofore made by me. I declare this will is entirely written and dated and signed by my hand.
> "Julia P. A. Prather."

In due time proceedings for the probate of this will were commenced in the superior court of Alameda county, but no decree of distribution of the estate was at any time made, and as yet the estate is unadministered. On April 2, 1913, Thomas Prather was attacked with his last illness, as a result of which he died on April 19th following. On the date when taken ill Thomas Prather owned, exclusive of any interest in his wife's estate, property of the value of approximately $106,000, and owed debts, thereafter proved and allowed against his estate, in the sum of approximately $234,000, all of which had been contracted by him after the death of his wife, and all of which were due and payable on said April 2d, and none of which is shown or claimed to have been incurred by him as executor in the care and management of his wife's estate. During the latter days of his last illness, Prather, by conveyances and assignments without consideration, and by way of gifts, transferred to his brother, Samuel D. Prather, defendant and appellant herein, real and personal property then owned by him and constituting no part of his wife's estate, the value of which was approximately $96,000, leaving at the time of his death, exclusive of his wife's estate then in process of administration, property of the value of $9,737.85. His will, executed June 18, 1907, was admitted to probate, and Edson F. Adams, the brother of his deceased wife, named therein as executor, qualified as executor, and, under and by virtue of sections 1589 to 1591, inclusive, Code of Civil Procedure, brought this action to obtain a decree declaring said transfers of real and personal property, so made by the testator to his brother, Samuel D. Prather, fraudulent and void as to said creditors of deceased, as well as for incidental relief; the theory of the case being that, since there was a deficiency of assets in the hands of the executor, the transfers of property so made by deceased to Samuel D. Prather were made in contemplation of insolvency and for the purpose and with the intent to hinder and defraud his creditors. Judgment was entered for plaintiff, from which defendant appeals upon a bill of exceptions wherein, among other alleged errors, is exhibited an order of court denying his motion for a new trial.

The answer filed not only denied all the material facts upon which the fraud was predicated, but alleged affirmatively that at the time of the transfers, as well as at all times thereafter, and at the time of his death, Prather owned and possessed unincumbered property and estate, other than that so transferred to Samuel Prather, of the value of $600,000, conceded, however, by defendant to have been represented by his interest in the property of the estate of Julia P. A. Prather, deceased, then in process of administration. It is likewise conceded that, other than the interest in his deceased wife's estate and exclusive of the property so transferred as gifts to his brother, Samuel D. Prather, Thomas Prather at the time of his death left property not exceeding the sum of $10,000 in value with which to pay creditors, whose established claims amounted to upwards of $234,000.

If, in fact, Prather, as alleged by defendant, left an unincumbered estate of $600,000 subject to the payment of his debts, then manifestly there was no deficiency of assets within the meaning of section 1589 of the Code of Civil Procedure under which his executor was entitled to maintain the action. Nor, since, if such condition existed, there was ample property to meet in due course all demands of the creditors, could the transfers be said to have been made "for the purpose and with the intent to hinder, delay, and defraud the creditors" or "in contemplation of insolvency." The only evidence offered by defendant in support of the alleged fact that Prather left this large estate and was not insolvent at the times in question was the will of Julia P. A. Prather, copy of which is hereinbefore set out.

The determination of the questions involved depend largely, indeed almost wholly, upon the interpretation of this will. The contention of the appellant is that by virtue of its terms and provisions Thomas Prather acquired title in fee simple absolute to the entire estate of his deceased wife, while respondent insists that he took a life estate therein without restriction as to his use of the same.

[1, 2] "A will is to be construed according to the intention of the testator" (Civ. Code, § 1317), and that "intention is to be ascertained from the words of the will, taking into view the circumstances under which it was made" (Civ. Code, § 1318), which words, in the absence of a clear intention to use them otherwise, "are to be taken in their ordinary and grammatical sense" (Civ. Code, § 1324). Unless irreconcilable, "all the parts of a will are to be construed in relation to each other, and so as if possible to form one consistent whole." Civ. Code, § 1321. Applying these rules, and having in mind that "a clear and distinct devise or bequest cannot be affected * * * by any other words not equally clear and distinct" (Civ. Code, § 1322), we find no difficulty in arriving at the intention of Julia P. A. Prather as expressed in her will. In disposing of her property she recognized her husband as being first entitled to consideration, but in providing for him she gave expression to the thought of her nieces, particularly the one who bore her name, Julia. While the first dispositive clause of the will, namely, "I give all the property of which I die possessed to my husband Thomas Prather, * * *" is clear and, taken alone, admits of no construction other than that an absolute disposal of her estate to him was intended, the second dispositive clause, to wit, "Upon the death of my husband the said Thomas Prather one-half of the unexpended portion of my estate bequeathed to my husband to be given to my niece Julia Adams, * * * the other one-half to be given to the surviving daughters of my brother Edson F. Adams in equal shares," is equally clear and distinct. Estate of Tooley, 170 Cal. 164, 149 Pac. 574, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 516. Hence, unless irreconcilable with the first clause, it should be construed in relation therewith. Read in connection with the first clause, it is clear that in using the words "unexpended portion of my estate," she had reference to that portion of her estate which should remain unconsumed by her husband at his death, and this part of her estate so remaining was, by the terms of the will, addressed, not to her husband as legatee, but to the executor of her will, "to be given" in the manner provided by law to her nieces. Thus addressed to the executor the words were not precatory in character, but are words of command. Estate of Marti, 132 Cal. 666, 61 Pac. 964, 64 Pac. 1071. The second clause cannot be construed as the expression of a wish or recommendation of Julia as to the husband's disposition of the unexpended portion of the estate, since she herself makes it the subject of a legacy to her nieces. Her intention was to limit the estate given the husband to such part thereof only as he might in his lifetime expend, consume, or make use of, without in any manner restricting him in the control and disposition thereof for such uses. Subject to such control and disposal for his use and consumption to its complete exhaustion, it was Julia's estate, and, after such carving therefrom as the husband might make for his use and consumption, the portion, if any, remaining at his death, and designated by Julia as "the unexpended portion of my estate," she made the subject of testamentary disposition, directing it "to be given," not by her husband, who, as we have seen, had no interest therein, but by her executor and the law to the nieces mentioned. The meaning of the second clause of the will, when viewed in connection with the first, in our opinion is as clear and distinct as any other part of the will, and, thus construed in relation to the first, effect is given to both, and the intention of the testatrix made clear.

Not only is this construction of the will justified by statutory rules of interpretation, but like interpretations of like provisions of wills have been frequently made by the courts. Thus in the case of In re Dickinson's Estate, 209 Pa. 59, 58 Atl. 120, the language of the will was as follows:

> "All the rest, residue, and remainder of my estate, real, personal and mixed, and wherever situated. I give, devise, and bequeath unto my beloved husband, Henry B. Dickinson, his heirs and assigns. * * * And should my husband not expend the whole of my estate, then it is my desire at his death to give so much of it as remains to my sister, Annie Ulrich, and my two brothers, Algernon J. Martin, and John J. Martin."

In construing this language, the court said:

> "The concluding sentence expresses the desire of the testatrix to give the whole of her estate, not expended by her husband, to her sister and brothers. It is her wish to thus give her estate. It is not her desire or wish or recommendation that her husband shall give the unexpended estate to them. The estate is not committed to him with expressions of desire as to how he dispose of it. The testatrix makes the disposition herself. She gives him the estate. This carries with it the power to convert, sell, convey, assign, and transfer. He could have expended the whole of it, for there is no limitation, restraint, or condition attached to the bequest. But if he did not consume or expend it, then what remained at his death she gave to others. This is the reasonable interpretation of the will. He did not consume the whole. What remains, therefore, is her estate, and passes by her will to the legatees."

The language quoted is peculiarly applicable here. In the Estate of Tooley, 170 Cal. 164, 149 Pac. 574, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 516, the wording of the will considered was as follows:

> "I give all my property at my death to my daughter Logan Mattie Tooley. If at her death she has neither husband or children I desire any property that may be left divided equally among my sisters and brother."

In construing the will this court, speaking through Mr. Justice Shaw, held that the words of disposition contained in the second clause were equally clear and distinct as those of the first, and that upon the death of the daughter, Logan Mattie Tooley, leaving neither husband nor children, the property of the estate passed to the sisters and brother of the testatrix, and hence was not subject to testamentary disposition by Logan Mattie Tooley. The words "unexpended portion of my estate to be given" used in the will now under consideration are certainly more apt and appropriate as dispository words than those "I desire," used in the Tooley will.

In Johnson v. Johnson, 51 Ohio St. 446, 38 N. E. 61, the will under consideration gave all property of the testator to his wife, will full power to dispose of the same, which clause, considered alone, concededly vested her with absolute title. The will, however, contained a clause to the effect that if at the time of the wife's decease any of the property should remain unconsumed, it should be equally divided between the testator's brothers and sisters. In construing the will the court said:

> "The plain intention of the testator as shown by the whole will is that the property is given to the widow to be by her used and consumed, and that, while so using and consuming the same, she is empowered to bargain, sell, convey, exchange, or dispose of the same as she may think proper, limited, however, in the exercise of such power, to the purpose for which the property is given to her; that is, for her consumption. The devise over to his brothers and sisters and their children is of itself enough to show that the testator intended, that his widow should use and consume the property only during her lifetime, and that he did not intend to empower her to dispose of the fee by gift during her life, nor by will at her death. This is clearly the intention of the testator, when effect is given to the whole will, and the intention should always govern."

The intention of Julia P. A. Prather as expressed in her will was to give her estate to her husband for his unrestricted use and consumption during the term of his natural life, with power to control, manage, exchange, sell, and dispose of the same, limited, however, in the exercise of such power to the purpose for which the property was given him, viz. his use and consumption thereof. While as to the property, persons dealing with him in good faith would be entitled to protection as fully and to like extent as though he were absolute owner in fee thereof, he could not, as of right in his lifetime, give it away or make it the subject of testamentary disposition at his death. Hardy v. Mayhew, 158 Cal. 95, 110 Pac. 113, 139 Am. St. Rep. 73, and cases there cited. And herein lies the distinction between the case at bar and those cited by appellant, wherein the first taker is vested with the absolute jus disponendi. It follows that Thomas Prather's estate has no interest in the unadministered estate of Julia P. A. Prather, deceased, without which the former's estate is concededly insolvent.

[3] This insolvency, in part at least, is due to the gifts of the property here involved made to the defendant Samuel Prather during the last illness of the deceased. "A gift made during the last illness of the giver * * * is presumed to be a gift in view of death." Civ. Code, § 1150. Section 1153 of the Civil Code declares that "a gift in view of death must be treated as a legacy, so far as relates only to the creditors of the giver." Hence the property so transferred by Thomas Prather during his last illness must, as to the creditors, since there exists a deficiency of assets with which to meet their demands, be deemed the subject of testamentary bequest, and as such is therefore, as provided in section 1563, Code of Civil Procedure, liable for the debts and obligations of the deceased.

[4] Assuming that, under the will of his wife, Thomas Prather obtained a life estate only, coupled with the powers hereinbefore mentioned, appellant insists that at the time of making the gifts he could, in the exercise of such powers, have used the property of the estate and proceeds of the sale thereof for the purpose of paying his debts. Conceding this to be true, it is answered by the fact that he did not exercise such power which he alone could exercise, but during the latter days of his illness, lasting less than three weeks, conscious as he must have been of his early demise, charged with knowledge that the interest in his wife's estate, from which during his lifetime he was empowered voluntarily to pay his debts, would terminate upon his death, and knowing that, in the absence of such voluntary payment, his creditors, who under the circumstances were powerless to enforce their demands by process of law, must look to his estate for payment, he gave away the sole and only property possessed by him which at his death could be subjected to the payment of his large indebtedness, and which but for such acts would have been appropriated to such purpose. A man controlling property out of which he may voluntarily pay his debts, if he will, but which for any reason cannot be reached by process of law, and thus without his consent subjected to such payment, is nevertheless insolvent. Eddy v. Baldwin, 32 Mo. 369; Schwabacher v. Kane, 13 Mo. App. 126. The property of Prather's deceased wife was so situated that, conceding he might voluntarily have used it to pay his debts, the circumstances were such that it could not, by legal process, be reached after his death by his creditors who, as we have seen, were dependent for payment upon an act, the performance of which he withheld. The effect of his acts, under the circumstances shown, was, as found by the court, to create a condition of insolvency as to his creditors, and ample evidence exists for the finding that the gifts were made in contemplation of the insolvency of his estate and with the intent and purpose of defrauding his creditors. Section 3439, Civil Code, provides that:

> "Every transfer of property * * * with intent to delay or defraud any creditor * * * of his demands, is void against all creditors of the debtor * * * and against any person upon whom the estate of the debtor devolves in trust for the benefit of others than the debtor."

[5] In Julia's will she described the property devised and bequeathed to her nieces as the "unexpended portion" of the estate remaining at the death of her husband. Appellant insists that the contraction of obligations to pay money, such as the incurrence of an indebtedness, in itself amounts to an expenditure, and that in accordance therewith, notwithstanding Prather received but a life estate in that of Julia, there must be deducted from the portion thereof remaining at his death sufficient property to meet all his outstanding indebtedness. This argument, while ingenious, denies to the word "unexpended" its proper signification and meaning, thus violating section 1324 of the Civil Code, which provides that in the absence of a clear intention to use them otherwise, "words * * * are to be taken in their ordinary and grammatical sense." The word "expended" is defined: "to pay out, or lay out, use up, disburse." It is synonymous with "consume," and it cannot be said that one has paid out, spent, disbursed, or consumed that which remains unappropriated in his possession and control. The part of the estate which during his lifetime he had not disbursed and paid out in the liquidation of his debts constituted the "unexpended portion" of Julia's estate which, under the view hereinbefore expressed, was devised and bequeathed to the nieces.

[6] Notwithstanding the fact that the question at issue depended for its determination upon the construction of Julia's will, offered by defendant as the sole evidence in support of his affirmative allegation that at the time deceased made the gifts he was not insolvent, but owned and left at his death property of the value of $600,000, appellant insists that the trial court was without jurisdiction to construe the will. In other words, he is in the anomalous position of predicating error upon his own action in asking the court to construe the will. However this may be, and conceding that a court of equity will not entertain a suit, the sole or chief purpose of which is to obtain the construction of a will, jurisdiction so to do being vested in the probate court, it is nevertheless true that a court of equity is, when necessary to the determination of a question properly before the court, vested with jurisdiction to construe a will as incidental to the equitable relief sought. 40 Cyc. 1839; Pingrey v. Rulon, 246 Ill. 109, 92 N. E. 597; Evins v. Cawthon, 132 Ala. 184, 31 South. 442; Rowley v. Rowley, 143 Wis. 325, 127 N. W. 1003; Martin v. Martin, 52 W. Va. 381, 44 S. E. 204. In the instant case the subject of litigation was the validity of the gifts which were made by Thomas Prather, the solution of which question depended upon whether or not, in the making thereof, he impoverished his estate to an extent that rendered it insolvent, which in turn, by reason of the issue tendered by the answer, and as incidental to the main question, depended upon the interpretation of the will. To the extent necessary in determining the rights of the parties the court was authorized to construe the will. Such interpretation, however, is of value only in so far as determinative of the rights of the parties in this case. It cannot be deemed as ousting the jurisdiction of the probate court which, save in so far as the decision is advisory, is left untrammeled in the exercise of its power to construe the will and distribute the property in accordance therewith.

Since the creditors of Thomas Prather are not seeking to subject the property in the estate of his deceased wife to the payment of their claims, we are unable to perceive any force in appellant's contention that they should, before extending him credit, have informed themselves of the condition of his title thereto. For aught that appears to the contrary, they did. But, assuming they did not, their rights asserted in this action are unaffected by such fact.

That the judgment is against the interest of the creditors is no concern of the appellant. Suffice it to say that they are not here complaining.

[7] The contention that the action is premature for the reason that plaintiff had not obtained from the probate court an order of sale of property is without merit. The existence of debts in the sum of upwards of $234,000 was stipulated by defendant, and the evidence conclusively established the fact that the assets, aside from (or for that matter with) the gifts to the defendant, are insufficient to pay them. These facts warranted the executor in instituting the action. Sections 1589, 1590, 1591, Code Civ. Proc.; Field v. Andrada, 106 Cal. 107, 39 Pac. 323. Moreover, not only by virtue of the law, but as provided in the judgment rendered, the executor can only sell such part of the property as may be necessary to pay the debts upon obtaining an order so to do from the probate court, and the surplus of any funds derived from such sale must be returned to the defendant.

To answer in detail the numerous points with which appellant's argument is punctuated would, in view of what has been said, serve no purpose, and unnecessarily prolong the discussion. In a general way they are sufficiently covered in the consideration given to what we deem matters determinative of the appeal.

PACIFIC COAST CASUALTY CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION.

1. Insurance 🔑435—Indemnity Insurance—Right to Recover—Policy—Construction.

An employer's accident indemnity policy covering miners, hoistmen, surface tram men, timekeeper, and roustabout, millmen, blacksmith and helper, and cook and waiter, does not cover the mine superintendent, though he was killed while actually doing manual labor.

2. Insurance 🔑141(4)—Indemnity Insurance—Right to Recover—Waiver of Condition.

Where an employer's indemnity policy provided that no erasure or change should be valid unless indorsed by certain officers, and an erasure on the policy accepted by insured was not so indorsed, if insurer stands on the policy, insured cannot question validity of contract accepted by it.

3. Stipulations 🔑14(9)—Construction—Documentary Evidence.

Where the parties stipulated that an instrument offered was a true copy of the policy, the stipulation must be taken to refer to the copy as it read on its face, and therefore to contemplate an erasure actually appearing therein.

In Bank. Certiorari by the Pacific Coast Casualty Company, to review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission of workmen's compensation in favor of William Angus, against petitioner and the White Gulch Mining Company. Award annulled as to petitioner.

T. T. C. Gregory and D. Hadsell, both of San Francisco, and Jos. G. Sweet, of Berkeley, for petitioner. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco (Warren H. Pillsbury, of Oakland, of counsel), for respondent.

SLOSS, J. Certiorari to review an award of the Accident Commission. William Angus was president of White Gulch Mining Company. While acting as superintendent of its mine he entered the mine and met his death through asphyxiation. Application for compensation was made by his widow, Pacific Coast Casualty Company, as insurance carrier, being joined with the mining company. The commission made an award against both defendants. The petition for review was presented by the Casualty Company alone. In addition to other points, the petitioner contends that Angus, if shown to be in the employ of the mining company, was not within the class of employés whose injuries were covered by the policy of insurance issued by it. If this position be well taken, the award against the Casualty Company cannot, of course, stand.

[1] At the hearing before the commission it was stipulated between all the parties to the proceeding that the mining company had "a workmen's compensation policy with the Pacific Coast Casualty Company covering the employés operating in its mining properties at Coulterville covering miners, hoistmen, surface tram men, timekeeper, and roustabout, millmen, blacksmith and helper, and cook and waiter." The commission's award is based upon a finding that Angus was killed while in the employment of the mining company as a mine superintendent. It seems perfectly clear that the occupation of a mine superintendent is not included within any of the employments specifically designated in the stipulation. The respondents do not, indeed, dispute this. But it is argued that the policy itself, a copy of which is attached to the return, was intended to have a broader scope, and to cover the superintendent, as well as the miners performing manual labor in the mine. It is questionable whether the effect of a stipulation can be altered by pointing to evidence which may conflict with it. But waiving this point we think the policy itself was clearly intended to cover only employès engaged in the specified employments. The opening clause of the policy states that:

> "In consideration of the estimated premium herein provided and of the statements set forth in the schedule of statements appended hereto and made a part and the basis hereof (herein called the schedule), which statements * * * the assured makes and warrants to be true, * * * the Pacific Coast Casualty Company * * * does hereby agree (1) to assume all liability of the assured for the payment of the medical, surgical, and hospital services * * * and for the compensation required by the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act, known as chapter 176 of the Laws of 1913 of the state of California."

The respondents argue that by this general language the insurer undertook to meet any liability for which the mining company might, under the Workmen's Compensation Act, become liable to any of its employès, of whatever class or kind. But the policy, like any other contract, must be read as a whole, and as including the "appended" application, or "schedule of statements," expressly made a "part and the basis of" the policy. People's Ice Co. v. Employers', etc., Corp., 161 Mass. 122, 36 N. E. 754; Carson v. Jersey City Ins. Co., 43 N. J. Law, 300, 39 Am. Rep. 584; Jennings v. Chenango County Mut. Ins. Co., 2 Denio (N. Y.) 75; Bobbitt v. Insurance Co., 66 N. C. 70, 8 Am. Rep. 494; Chrisman v. State Ins. Co., 16 Or. 283, 18 Pac. 466; Philbrook v. New Eng. Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 37 Me. 137. One of the provisions of the policy shows that the premium is based "upon the entire compensation earned during the period of this policy by all employès of the assured engaged in the business or occupations set forth in the schedule and not specifically excepted." It is further provided that if, at the end of the policy period, it shall appear that such compensation exceeds the amount estimated at the time of the issuance of the policy, the assured shall pay a further premium calculated on said excess; while if the actual compensation is less than the amount estimated, the company shall refund a proportional part of the premium. One of the statements in the schedule describes, under the head "The kind of trade, business, profession or occupation (manual classification)," the following occupations: "Miners, hoistman, surface tram men, timekeeper, and roustabout, millmen, blacksmith and helper, and cook and waiter." There is no other statement indicating either the business of the employer, or the occupations of its workmen.

It is apparent, therefore, that the premium for which the Casualty Company undertook to insure the mining company was based upon the pay received by the specified employès. The fair construction of the policy is that which the parties adopted when they made their stipulation of facts, namely, that the insurance was designed to cover employès of the designated classes, they being the ones whose compensation furnished the measure of the premium, in consideration of which the Casualty Company assumed the risk.

[2, 3] The copy of the policy, as it appears in the return, shows a certain statement in the "schedule" to have been stricken out by the running of lines through it. This statement, if permitted to stand, would make the policy cover superintendents. The respondents argue that the cancellation must be disregarded under a clause in the policy providing that "no erasure or change appearing on this policy as originally printed, and no change or waiver of any of its terms" shall be valid unless set forth in an indorsement signed by certain designated officers of the company. This clause was manifestly intended for the protection of the insurer against unauthorized acts of its agents. If the Casualty Company is willing to stand on the policy as issued to the insured, the latter is in no position to question the binding force of the contract accepted by it. Furthermore, the original policy was not introduced in evidence, and there was presented to the commission no question of the form in which it was written. The Casualty Company presented a copy, and it was stipulated that this was a "true and correct copy" of the policy issued and in force. The stipulation must be taken to refer to the copy as it read on its face, i. e., with the statement in question eliminated.

The award against the Casualty Company was therefore not justified. This conclusion does not, however, affect the position of the White Gulch Mining Company, which has not attacked the award against it. The award is annulled in so far as it is directed against Pacific Coast Casualty Company.

TRANSCONTINENTAL TELEGRAPH CO. v. NEYLAN et al., State Board of Control.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. July 30, 1917. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 27, 1917.)

1. TAXATION ⚷155 — OCCUPATION TAXES — TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES — OPERATIVE COMPANIES.

Under Const. art. 13, § 14, as amended November 8, 1910, providing that taxes of telegraph companies shall be exclusively for state purposes and be placed upon the gross receipts from operation of the companies, and shall be in lieu of all other taxes upon the property enumerated, and the Corporation Franchise Act (St. 1911, p. 530), a paper corporation, not rendering service to the public, is not within the law, and its property is nonoperative, and subject to all of the taxes that may be imposed upon nonoperative property, as well as any state license charge exacted by the Legislature.

2. TAXATION ⚷155 — OCCUPATION TAXES — TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES — OPERATIVE COMPANIES.

The provision of Corporation Franchise Act, § 8, subsecs. 2, 3, that property owned by a telegraph company constructing, but not operating, shall be deemed nonoperative property, and subject to assessment, does not, by mentioning the kinds of taxes to which such property is subject, preclude the assessment thereof for other purposes, in view of Const. art. 13, § 1, providing that all property shall be taxed in proportion to its value.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. C. Crothers, Judge.

Application by the Transcontinental Telegraph Company against John F. Neylan and others, individually and as members of the State Board of Control. From a judgment on demurrer sustained to the application for a writ of mandate, the plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Willard P. Smith and B. B. Blake, both of San Francisco, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John T. Nourse, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from a judgment of the superior court, rendered upon demurrer sustained to an application by the plaintiff for a writ of mandate, to compel the defendants, constituting the state board of control, to allow a claim against the state for the return to it of certain license taxes, pursuant to chapter 278 of the Statutes of 1915, providing for the repayment of license taxes erroneously collected. The license taxes paid by plaintiff and sought to be recovered were paid in and for the years ending June 30, 1912, June 30, 1913, and June 30, 1914. Plaintiff paid the corporation license taxes for each of the above periods, and during the same period filed with the state board of equalization reports, as required by the so-called Corporation Franchise Act of April, 1911. Acting under such reports, the board of equalization fixed the value of plaintiff's franchise, and plaintiff paid the franchise tax for that period as so fixed. Such tax was fixed upon the value of the franchise, and not upon the gross receipts of plaintiff, as it appears that plaintiff was not during any of said periods operating any telegraph lines, and that it showed no gross receipts for any of those periods.

In the year 1905 the Legislature of the state enacted a law, which was known as the Corporation State License Tax Act of that year, and which fixed an annual license tax upon every corporation, domestic or foreign, doing business in this state; the amount of such license tax being based upon the capital stock of the corporation. This act, in its relation to foreign corporations engaged in interstate commerce, was held to be unconstitutional and void in the case of Mulford Co. v. Curry, 163 Cal. 276, 125 Pac. 236. Thereafter, and before the decision in the case of Pick & Co. v. Jordan, reported in 169 Cal. 1, 145 Pac. 506, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 1237, reversing the Mulford decision and holding the act to be valid, the Legislature, in the year 1913, repealed the Corporation State License Act of 1903, the repeal becoming effective in June, 1914. Stats. 1913, p. 680. The license taxes, however, sought to be recovered in this proceeding, were paid before such repeal became effective. In the year 1910 a constitutional amendment was adopted, which worked a radical change in the system of taxation in the state, and the object of which was to separate state from local taxation, and to enable the state to impose upon persons, firms, or corporations engaged in certain kinds of business—such as public service corporations and insurance, banking, and trust companies—the obligation to pay certain taxes to be applied exclusively to state purposes; the concerns thus engaged and the property employed in such undertakings to be to a greater or less degree free from the burden of local taxation. San Francisco v. Pac. Tel. & Tel. Co., 166 Cal. 244, 135 Pac. 971. The provisions of this constitutional amendment bearing on the present case are found in section 14 of article 13, as amended November 8, 1910, which section, so far as material here, provides:

> "Taxes levied, assessed and collected as hereinafter provided upon railroads * * * telegraph companies * * * shall be entirely and exclusively for state purposes. * * * Said tax shall be equal to the percentages hereinafter fixed upon the gross receipts from operation of such companies and each thereof within this state. * * * The percentages above mentioned shall be as follows: * * * telegraph and telephone companies, three and one-half per cent. * * * Such taxes shall be in lieu of all other taxes and licenses, state, county and municipal, upon the property above enumerated of such companies except as otherwise in this section provided." (Italics ours.)

Acting under the provisions of the foregoing section of the Constitution, the Legislature in 1911 adopted what is known as the Corporation Franchise Act. Stats. 1911, c. 335. In this act are incorporated provisions similar to those found in the Constitution relating to the method of assessment of taxes for state purposes, and in section 8, subsection 1, subdivision D thereof, the term "operative property," as used in the act, is defined as including:

> "In the case of telegraph and telephone companies doing business in this state: The franchises, rights of way, poles, wires, pipes, * * * cables, switchboards, telegraph and telephone instruments, batteries, generators and other electrical appliances and exchange and other buildings used in the telegraph and telephone business, and so much of the land on which said buildings are situate as may be required for the convenient use and occupation of said buildings."

Subsection 2 of the same section provides that:

> "Any property of the classes mentioned in this section owned by a company constructing * * * telegraph or telephone system * * * shall not be considered operative property, and shall be subject to assessment and taxation for county, municipal and district purposes. The property of any company mentioned in this section shall be deemed to be in operation as to such part of the new road, line, plant, or system as may be in use as soon as it offers and renders service to the public for compensation: Provided, however, that the state board of equalization shall finally determine the fact of such operation and the liability of any such company to be taxed upon its gross receipts as provided in section 2 of this act."

Subsection 3 of the same section then provides:

> "When any property in this state belonging to a company of the classes named in this section is rendering no service to the public in this state, even though it may be rendering service to the public in some other state or states, such property shall not be considered as operative property, and shall be subject to assessment and taxation for county, municipal, and district purposes."

[1] It is the clear intention of the constitutional section above quoted and of the Franchise Tax Act to include within its terms the corporations therein designated only when such corporations are rendering a service to the public. A corporation which is merely a paper corporation, and not rendering service to the public, but possibly engaged in some other business, though it may be organized for the purpose of rendering public service, is not to be deemed a corporation coming within the terms of the constitutional section until it has in fact become a public service corporation. It is only when such a corporation is operating within this state, and rendering public service within this state, because of which operation and business it earns gross proceeds upon which the percentage tax can be based, that such a tax so paid "is in lieu of all other taxes and licenses, state, county and municipal." The mere creation of such a corporation by filing articles of incorporation, or a certificate of such articles, in the case of a foreign corporation, is not sufficient to bring such corporation within the exemptions found in section 14 of article 13 of the Constitution.

Plaintiff here alleges that it has not paid any tax upon its gross receipts, and that it was not operating any telegraph lines during said period. It is conceded that it has not engaged in any public service, and until it does so engage all of the property owned by the company is nonoperative property, and subject to all of the taxes that may be imposed upon nonoperative property, as well as any state license charge exacted by legislative enactment. That a corporation organized to engage in a public service does not, by the mere filing of its articles, become entitled to be treated as a public service corporation, is clearly decided in Del Mar Water, etc., Co. v. Eshleman, 167 Cal. 666, 672, 140 Pac. 591, 593, where our Supreme Court said:

> "It is true that these provisions are broad, and that the company might, under its charter, engage in business as a public utility. The mere chartered authority does not, however, mark the nature of the operating corporation, any more than the language of a notice of appropriation binds the appropriator to furnish all of the territory mentioned therein. Palmer v. Railroad Commission, 167 Cal. 163, 138 Pac. 997. It is the naked authority to do business; but, unless it be pursued in a certain way, it does not make the corporation a public utility."

[2] It is true that in subsections 2 and 3 of section 8 of the Corporation Franchise Act it is provided that property owned by a telegraph or other company mentioned, constructing but not operating its system, and property belonging to companies of the class mentioned in section 8 having property within the state rendering no public service in the state, but which may be rendering a public service without the limits of the state, shall be deemed nonoperative property, and subject to assessment and taxation for county, municipal, and district purposes. But we think it does not follow that, having mentioned the kinds of taxes to which such property is subject, the nonoperative properties of corporations of the class under consideration here is subject to no other tax; for the Constitution of this state (section 1, art. 13), which, of course, is supreme, provides that all property, except as otherwise provided, not exempt under the laws of the United States, shall be taxed in proportion to its value. If we were to accept as correct the position of plaintiff, we would be required to hold that corporations of the classes here under consideration would not be subject to pay any state taxes or licenses on their nonoperative property, no matter how much such property might be worth.

SCOTT v. WOODWORTH et al. (Civ. 1619.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 1, 1917. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 27, 1917.)

1. Deeds 🔑38(1) — Mortgages 🔑48(2) — Description of Property—Sufficiency.

An instrument was ineffective as a deed or mortgage where the property involved was described as bounded on the north and east by the lands of R. and B. avenue, on the east by the land of M., and on the south by C. avenue, and containing 5½ acres, without giving any western boundary, and without showing what particular lands or portions of the lands of the different owners constituted the easterly boundary, especially where the land sought to be described was not bounded by C. avenue, but was bounded on the east by C.'s addition to a town, on the west by the lands of M., on the north by a part of B. avenue, and by the lands of M., and the lands of R. bounded it on the west, and not on the north and east as stated.

2. Frauds, Statute of 🔑110(1)—Description of Property—Sufficiency.

To be valid on its face, a deed must contain such a description of the real property intended to be conveyed as will enable it to be readily located by reference to the description, and while the deed may be sufficient, though the description by boundaries be ambiguous or indefinite, if it otherwise provides means whereby the description can be made certain and the land identified and located, if the description is so vague and uncertain that the property cannot be identified and located, and the writing does not furnish the means whereby it may be made sufficiently definite, the instrument is void, as the imperfections cannot be supplied through evidence extrinsic to the writing, in view of the rule that a conveyance of real property must be in writing.

3. Quieting Title 🔑10(1)—Necessity of Title in Plaintiff.

In an action to quiet title, plaintiff must show title in himself to be entitled to relief.

4. Quieting Title 🔑10(5)—Sufficiency of Plaintiff's Title — Rights of Mortgagees.

A mortgagee's remedy is not by an action to quiet title, but by one to foreclose the mortgage and sell the property under Code Civ. Proc. § 726, providing that there can be but one action for the recovery of any debt or the enforcement of any right secured by action, which action must be in accordance with the provisions of that chapter.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Emmet Seawell, Judge.

Suit by L. G. Scott against C. W. Woodworth and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

L. G. Scott, of Sebastopol, and T. J. Butts, of Santa Rosa, for appellant. D. R. Gale and J. R. Leppo, both of Santa Rosa, for respondents.

HART, J. It is agreed by counsel for the respective parties hereto that this is an action to quiet title. The amended complaint alleges:

"That on or about the 3d day of January, 1908, plaintiff's grantors, August A. Lueger, sometimes called A. Lueger, and Hedwig Voightlander née Lueger, were the owners in fee of all that certain lot, piece and parcel of land situated, lying, and being in the township of Analy, county of Sonoma and state of California, and bounded and particularly described as follows, to wit."

There follows a description of certain land, to which reference will hereafter in this opinion be made. It is next alleged that:

On said 3d day of January the "property stood of record in the name of Ernest Lueger, and that on or about said date without the knowledge or consent of August A. Lueger or the said Hedwig Voightlander, née Lueger, the said Ernest Lueger made, executed, and delivered to one Chris Mugge a certain mortgage upon all of the aforesaid property, to secure the payment to the said Chris Mugge of the sum of $2,000, that after the execution of the said mortgage to the said Chris Mugge as aforesaid, the said Ernest Lueger made, executed, and delivered to the said August A. Lueger and Hedwig Voightlander, née Lueger, a deed conveying all his right, title, interest, and estate in and to said premises, which said deed was dated on the 27th day of June, 1911, and that the same was recorded on the 1st day of July, 1911, in Book O of Bonds and Agreements of said Sonoma County Records."

It is then alleged that, on or about July 14, 1913, "the said premises were sold by virtue of an execution issued on a judgment of foreclosure of the aforesaid mortgage"; that defendant C. W. Woodworth and O. L. Murphy purchased said property for the sum of $2,500; that thereafter said Woodworth acquired all the rights and title of said Murphy in and to said premises, and holds the certificate of purchase, "which said certificate has not been satisfied and is undischarged, and the time for a redemption of said premises has not yet expired." It is alleged that, on or about February 14, 1914, the said August A. Lueger and Hedwig Voightlander tendered said Woodworth the sum of $2,685 and demanded of defendants "a proper and lawful satisfaction and discharge of said mortgage, and said certificate of sale of said premises"; that defendants refused to accept said money, and did not state "wherein there was a deficiency or error in the amount." A deed from August A. Lueger and Hedwig Voightlander to plaintiff, executed and delivered before the commencement of the action, is alleged, the rental value of the property is stated, and the prayer is that plaintiff be decreed the owner of said premises, for damages for the withholding of possession, etc.

In their answer, defendants deny that, on or about the 3d day of January, 1908, August A. Lueger and Hedwig Voightlander were the owners of said premises, but allege that, since December 22, 1906, and until July 18, 1913, Ernest Lueger was the owner and in possession thereof; deny the execution or delivery by Ernest Lueger to August A. Lueger and Hedwig Voightlander of "a deed, or any instrument in writing, conveying to them" the title of said Ernest Lueger to said land. "Defendants allege that on the 18th day of July, 1913, and while the said Ernest Lueger was so the owner and in the possession of the said lands and premises described in said amended complaint, he made, executed, and delivered to defendant C. W. Woodworth and O. L. Murphy" a deed conveying all his interest in said land; "and thereupon the said O. L. Murphy and said defendant C. W. Woodworth entered into the possession of the same"; that on July 21, 1913, said Murphy conveyed his interest to defendant Woodworth, who has since been in possession of the premises. "That prior to October 21, 1913, the said C. W. Woodworth and O. L. Murphy had no actual knowledge or notice, and had no constructive notice, of any grant, deed, or conveyance by the said Ernest Lueger, or by any other person, to the said August Lueger and Hedwig Voightlander, or to either of them, of the said lands and premises, or of any part thereof, or that the said August Lueger or Hedwig Voightlander, or either of them, claimed any title thereto." It is alleged that the time for redemption of said premises expired July 18, 1914, and that no redemption has been made. The tender and demand alleged in the complaint are denied, and it is alleged that defendants, J. K. Smith, as sheriff, and J. K. Smith, make no claim to the premises.

The findings of the court practically follow the answer, and the judgment was in favor of defendant Woodworth, that, from the commencement of the action, he has been the owner in fee simple of said premises. From this judgment plaintiff appeals.

The general facts of the controversy, which are either admitted by the pleadings or established by uncontradicted evidence, are correctly stated as follows in the brief of the respondents:

> "In November, 1906, Peter Christensen was the owner of the lands involved, and his title is the common source. In November, 1906, said Christensen and wife executed a deed in due form to said Ernest Lueger and one Zinkernagel. In December, 1906, said Zinkernagel conveyed all of his one-half interest in said lands to said Ernest Lueger. On January 3, 1908, said Ernest Lueger and wife executed to said Mugge the mortgage mentioned in plaintiff's amended complaint to secure a promissory note for $2,000. This mortgage was later regularly foreclosed by action in the superior court of Sonoma county, in which the said August A. Lueger and Hedwig Voightlander were made parties defendant. They appeared in said action, pleading that certain moneys were owing by said Ernest Lueger to them under the instrument of June 27, 1911, and secured by the same, later withdrawing such pleadings and suffering default; and which foreclosure action went regularly to judgment and foreclosure sale, and resulted in a sale of the mortgaged premises to one Murphy and the defendant Woodworth, the latter later acquiring Murphy's interest in the certificate of sale. On July 18, 1913, being four days after the foreclosure sale, the said Ernest Lueger conveyed the said lands to the said purchasers at the said foreclosure sale, O. L. Murphy and C. W. Woodworth, by regular grant, bargain, and sale deed. On July 21, 1913, said O. L. Murphy duly conveyed his one-half interest in said lands to his cotenant, the defendant Woodworth."

The written instrument, which is the foundation of the plaintiff's case, as made by his amended complaint, and which, as seen, he characterizes in his said complaint as a "deed," reads as follows:

> "This indenture, made and entered into this 27th day of June, 1911, by and between Ernest Lueger, of Sebastopol, Sonoma county, California, party of the first part and A. Lueger and Hedwig Voightlander née Lueger, parties of the second part, witnesseth: That whereas said first party has heretofore acted as trustee for certain funds belonging to second parties the exact amount of which is unknown by second parties and they rely upon the statements of first party at this time that the same is and were a certain amount 2800 marks German money, and this agreement is made upon said basis as a settlement, of said amount coming into the hands of first party two-thirds of which belongs to second parties herein, and whereas said first party has an equity in and to 5½ acres of land in and near Sebastopol, California of the value of about $4000.00 on which first party has a mortgage of about $2000.00, now in consideration of the premises and money in the hands of first party, not counting money now in Germany but all being a part of the estate of Louise Ohel, deceased, in settlement of demands of money had and received by first party to which there has been no accounting to second parties, first party does hereby sell and convey unto said second parties The equitable interest in and to said hereinafter described land figured at a valuation of $2000.-00 if on the other hand said property shall sell for more than that amount it shall be and belong to first party, and first party shall have the right to sell said premises and pay to second parties $2000.00 cash money in lieu of their interest, first party agrees that he will proceed to sell said premises as soon as possible for a reasonable market price meanwhile he shall have possession thereof and the income therefrom without further consideration, and the said $2000.00 when procured to be paid to second parties shall be placed in the First National Bank of Sebastopol to the credit of second parties, but in case of a sale by first party it shall be by the consent of second parties, said money and property to be controlled by the provisions of the will of said Louise Ohel, and this settlement shall be in lieu of all demands that have been transferred to America in said estate upon the representation of said first party, the land herein conveyed is described as follows, being all of that lot piece or parcel of land situated being and lying in the township of Analy, county of Sonoma, and state of California, and bounded and described as follows to wit,: Bounded on the north and east by the lands of Robinson and Bodega avenue of the town of Sebastopol, on the east by the land of Jimmy McChristain and on the south by Calder avenue extended, and containing 5½ acres. That it is further agreed and understood that when said land shall have been sold that if the same can be loaned at interest that first party shall be entitled to the same interest that the same was drawing in Germany, and that second parties shall have the remainder of their interest payable to them as it may accrue.
> "Witness our hands and seals the 30th day of June 1911.
> "Ernest Lueger.
> "Hedwig Voightlander, née Lueger.
> "August E. Lueger."

Attached to said instrument is a certificate of acknowledgment by the parties thereto.

The alleged offer by August A. Lueger and Hedwig Voightlander to redeem from the foreclosure sale, dated February 14, 1914, together with the affidavit of the service of the same on the defendant, Woodworth, were put in evidence, and a deed executed by said

August A. Lueger and Hedwig Voightlander and delivered to the plaintiff, purporting to convey to the latter the premises described in the amended complaint, were also offered and received in evidence.

The position of the plaintiff is that, by virtue of the writing or "deed," which is the basis of this action, August A. Lueger and Hedwig Voightlander became the successors in interest to the title of Ernest Lueger, and that, therefore, they were entitled to redeem from the foreclosure sale, and that, furthermore, they did in fact redeem; that, by reason of said transaction and of the conveyance by them of March 6, 1914, to the plaintiff, the latter became the owner of the legal title, and is therefore entitled to a judgment quieting the same in this action.

On the other hand, the defendants contended at the trial, as they contend here (and the trial court held), that the said instrument is not a deed or other conveyance of real property, and that it was never intended to operate as a deed of conveyance. It is further contended that said instrument, whatever its legal character or the purpose for which it was intended, is void for the reason that it does not contain a description of the premises which constitute the subject-matter thereof. It is also contended that there was no redemption or even offer to redeem.

Before proceeding to a consideration of the several contentions above mentioned, it may be remarked that the elaborate discussion in the brief of the appellant of the rights of trustees and beneficiaries, fraudulent transfers and conspiracies, and other like questions, is wholly foreign to any issue made by the pleadings. The complaint nowhere alleges that either the mortgage by the elder Lueger to Mugge or the transfer of the legal title of the mortgaged premises to Murphy and Woodworth, the purchasers at the foreclosure sale, involved a fraudulent transaction, or that either of those transactions was the result of a fraudulent conspiracy upon the part of the parties thereto wrongfully to deprive August A. Lueger and Voightlander of any rights which they might have claimed in said premises.

The agreement upon which this action is founded, whatever may be its legal effect, is by no means in the form of a deed of conveyance, and does not appear, from its language or provisions, to have been intended as such.

In the first place, it is to be noticed that it is signed by the second parties as well as by the first party. A deed is required to be signed by the grantor only, and the fact that all the parties signed it, and that it was designated in the instrument as an "agreement" by the parties themselves, is clearly indicative of an intention in them that it should be something other than a deed. Moreover, the instrument was not recorded in the book containing the record of deeds in the recorder's office, but was inserted in a book kept in said office for the recordation of bonds and mortgages. This is another strong circumstance indicating that the parties did not intend that it should or understand that it could operate as a deed. Furthermore, the agreement sets forth that the first party is "trustee for certain funds belonging to the second parties," amounting to 2,800 marks, a mark, as a monetary unit used in Germany, being approximately $23^8/_{10}$ cents of our money, or approximately $700, and further declares that:

> "This agreement is made upon said basis as a settlement of said amount coming into the hands of said first party, two-thirds of which belong to said second parties herein."

Manifestly, two-thirds of $700 amounts to $466, which is the sum for which the first party agreed to transfer to the second parties an equity of the value, according to said agreement, of $2,000. That a person would part with an interest in property of the value of $2,000 for the small sum of $466 is hardly in consonance with reason or the probable intention of the owner or the understanding of the other contracting parties. But a circumstance indicating that the instrument was not intended to operate as a deed of conveyance stronger than any which has yet been suggested is to be found in the provisions of the instrument that said first party "shall have the right to sell said premises," and that if such sale be for more than the sum of $2,000, the excess may be retained by said first party; that said "first party agrees that he will proceed to sell said premises as soon as possible for a reasonable market price; meanwhile he shall have possession thereof and the income therefrom without further consideration," etc. As is well said by counsel for the respondents, the right to sell the property and to retain the proceeds of sale, or any part thereof, constitute acts which are entirely inconsistent with the parting of title or an intention to vest title to the property by the owner thereof in others. Obviously "an instrument which confers no right of either present or future possession possesses little of the character of a conveyance, and can hardly be deemed to pass any estate in the land." McMillan v. Richards, 9 Cal. 365, 410, 70 Am. Dec. 655; Fogarty v. Sawyer, 17 Cal. 589.

What the instrument or the effect thereof was intended by the parties to be, it is, indeed, difficult to conjecture from the provisions themselves of the writing. In fact, the author of the instrument, the plaintiff himself, seems to have been much puzzled as to how to classify it; for, as attorney for the parties of the second part, he prepared, verified, and filed in the action to foreclose the Mugge mortgage an answer in which he referred to the instrument as a writing whose purpose was to secure to his then clients, but present assignors, the payment of the money claimed to be due them from the first party to the agreement, and prayed the court so to construe the instrument and enter a decree accordingly, and thus safeguard the interests of August A. Lueger and Hedwig Voightlander, alleged to be so secured.

[1] But, whatever may be the legal effect of the instrument, or whether it purports or was intended to be either a deed or a mortgage, it is clear that it is without force as either, because the property which constitutes the subject-matter thereof is not so described as to facilitate an identification of the particular land or premises to which it relates. It will be noted that the land as it is described in the instrument is not given a westerly boundary, and, so far as the instrument shows to the contrary, there is no limit to the extension of the tract westerly. Again, as so described, the tract is bounded on the north and east by the lands of "Robinson and Bodega avenue," and "on the east by the land of McChristian." Thus, it will be observed, the description is indefinite and uncertain. While it is not inconceivable that the tract might be bounded on one side by two different and distinct parcels of land—that is, by lands owned by different parties—or bounded on the north and partly on the east by the lands of one individual, still in such case the description must necessarily be indefinite and uncertain where it does not show what particular lands or portions of the lands, respectively, of the two different owners constitute together the easterly boundary line of the tract sought thus to be described. But the omission to describe the westerly boundary line is itself sufficient to vitiate the deed or mortgage, if it be either, since, as is true here, the land is not designated by any particular name or described by reference to some particular object or thing which might itself lead to a ready identification of the particular tract which constitutes the subject-matter of the instrument. And, as showing to some extent the undependableness of the description of the land as given in said instrument, it may be pointed out that in the amended complaint the tract is described as being "bounded on the north and west by the lands of Robinson and Bodega avenue," which is obviously inconsistent with the description given in the instrument.

[2] To be valid on its face, a deed must contain such a description of the real property thereby intended to be conveyed as will enable the property to be readily located by reference to the description. It is true that the description by boundaries may be ambiguous or indefinite, and still the deed sufficient if it otherwise provides means whereby the description can be made certain and the land identified and located. Where, however, the description is so vague or uncertain that the property cannot be identified and located therefrom, and the writing itself does not furnish the means whereby the description may be made sufficiently definite and certain readily to locate the property, then the instrument must be held void, since the imperfections of the description cannot be supplied through evidence extrinsic to the writing itself without running up against the positive mandate of the rule that a conveyance of real property must be in writing.

The propositions above stated are quite elementary, and need the citation of no authorities to confirm them; still we cite the following authorities as embodying a clear elucidation of the principles involved therein: Brandon v. Leddy, 67 Cal. 43, 7 Pac. 33; Best v. Wohlford, 144 Cal. 737, 78 Pac. 293; Donnelly v. Tregaskis, 154 Cal. 261, 97 Pac. 421; People v. Klumpke, 41 Cal. 263; Moss v. Shearer, 30 Cal. 467, 468; Barker v. Southern R. W. Co., 125 N. C. 596, 34 S. E. 701, 74 Am. St. Rep. 658, 660; 2 Devlin on Deeds, § 1910; 13 Cyc. 543.

Referring now to the evidence relative to the description of the property, it is to be observed that thereby it is shown that the instrument relied upon here by the plaintiff is not only void upon its face because of the vagueness and uncertainty of the description, but that in point of fact the description of the property as it is set out therein is erroneous. From the official map of the town of Sebastopol, which was received in evidence, and the testimony of the city surveyor and engineer and the city attorney of said town, it appears as undisputed facts that there is a "Calder avenue" in the town of Sebastopol and a "Calder addition" to said town; that Calder avenue does not anywhere constitute a boundary line of the premises in question; but that the property is bounded on the east by Calder's addition to said town and west by the lands of McChristian; that it is bounded on the north by a part of Bodega avenue and by the lands of McChristian, and that the lands of Robinson bound it on the west and not on the north and east, as set forth in the agreement which constitutes the basis of this action.

Enough of the testimony as to the correct description of the property has now been adverted to to show and emphasize the proposition that the description of the property as given in the instrument or agreement by virtue of which plaintiff claims to have acquired an interest in the property in question is not only so ambiguous and uncertain as to make it impossible to locate therefrom the property it purports to refer to, but that the description so given is at variance in almost every essential particular with the true description of the premises.

[3] It results (assuming it to be or to have been intended as a deed) that the said instrument is wholly inoperative as a deed of conveyance of real property, and, since the plaintiff's asserted title is entirely founded on said writing, and, inasmuch as in an action to quiet title, the plaintiff is required to show title in himself before he will be entitled to the relief sought in such an action, the trial court was left to no other alternative but to enter judgment against him.

[4] It is not claimed in the complaint that the instrument is or was intended to operate as a mortgage, and we think it could not properly be given a construction imparting to it the characteristics and the effect of a mortgage. And if it were a mortgage, the remedy of the plaintiff would not be in an action to quiet title, but in one to foreclose it and sell the property thereunder (Code Civ. Proc. § 726), in which case only, if at all, could he obtain possession of the property (Code Civ. Proc., § 744). But, as stated, even as a mortgage, the instrument would still be inoperative because of the infirmities which impart invalidity to it as a deed.

The above considerations are decisive of the case as it is presented here; hence we need not consider the question raised by the defendants, whether the purported offer of the plaintiff's assignors to redeem the property constituted a legal offer; that is to say, whether the offer or tender as made was in compliance with the requisites essential to the extinguishment of an obligation by offer of performance.

PEOPLE v. MALJAN. (Cr. 681.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. July 31, 1917. Rehearing Denied Aug. 30, 1917. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 27, 1917.)

1. EMBEZZLEMENT 🔑47—QUESTION FOR JURY—STATEMENT BY DEFENDANT'S EMPLOYÉ.

Whether a broker accused of embezzling proceeds from a sale of fruit heard his employé's statement that the fruit was to be handled on consignment so as to be bound thereby was for the jury.

2. EMBEZZLEMENT 🔑44(5) — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—CHARACTER OF POSSESSION.

Evidence held sufficient to show that defendant, accused of embezzling proceeds from sale of fruit, received the fruit on consignment.

3. EMBEZZLEMENT 🔑10—BY PARTNER.

A partner feloniously converting another's funds coming into his control as a member of a partnership with which the prosecuting witness was doing business in the relation of principal and agent may be guilty of embezzlement.

4. PARTNERSHIP 🔑125—RELATION TO THIRD PERSONS—PRINCIPAL AND AGENT.

The relations of individual partners to persons who occupy toward the partnership the relation of principal by employing the partnership as their agent are those of principal and agent, in view of Civ. Code, § 2443, making the liability of general partners for each other's acts that of agents.

5. PARTNERSHIP 🔑175 — LIABILITY FOR EMBEZZLEMENT.

A partnership as an entity cannot be charged with embezzlement, and the party charged therewith must be the partner who converted the funds.

6. EMBEZZLEMENT 🔑47 — BY PARTNER — QUESTION FOR JURY.

The question whether managing partner was the person who embezzled money deposited to the partnership account of which he had control was for the jury.

7. PARTNERSHIP 🔑63—DISTINCT ENTITY.

A partnership is not a person separate from its component members in the sense that a corporation is a separate entity.

8. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑1167(1) — PREJUDICIAL ERROR—INDICTMENT—VARIANCE.

Variance between an indictment for embezzlement charging a direct agency and proof of indirect agency through the medium of a partnership was not prejudicial, the record disclosing that the defendant knew the charge he was called upon to answer, and since an acquittal thereon would have barred a similar prosecution for the same offense.

9. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION 🔑171 — VARIANCE—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

A material variance between proof and information arises when an acquittal thereunder would be no bar to a further prosecution for the same offense, but where the discrepancy does not affect the validity of the information, or the defendant's substantial rights in his defense, the variance is immaterial.

10. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑617—TIME OF TRIAL—WAIVER OF OBJECTION.

Defendant cannot complain that his trial was finished during a Saturday half holiday in violation of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 133, 134, providing that no court shall be held nor judicial business transacted on legal holidays, his counsel having in open court waived the right to object to the trial proceeding into the afternoon, such waiver being binding upon the defendant.

11. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑781(1) — INSTRUCTIONS —ORAL DECLARATIONS.

Refusal to instruct that evidence of defendant's oral declarations should be viewed with caution is not error; such instruction being a mere commonplace which all jurors ought to be expected to know.

12. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑1137(5)—REVIEW—ESTOPPEL TO ALLEGE ERROR—CROSS-EXAMINATION.

Defendant cannot object that cross-examination was improper where his counsel then admitted the truth of facts sought to be established thereby.

13. EMBEZZLEMENT 🔑42—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE—INSOLVENCY PETITION.

In a prosecution for embezzlement, an insolvency petition filed by defendant was relevant; it containing an admission in the list of creditors that the defendant was indebted to the complaining witness.

14. EMBEZZLEMENT 🔑42—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE—INCRIMINATING CIRCUMSTANCES.

In a prosecution for embezzlement, evidence that there was no money in the partnership account at the time the embezzling partner departed was material, the embezzled funds having been deposited in this account, and the defendant being the managing agent of the partnership, such evidence tending to show that defendant himself used the money.

15. EMBEZZLEMENT 🔑38—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE—BOOKS OF SERVANT COMPANY.

The books of the company which was in fact the defendant's servant were admissible in his prosecution; the fruit having been delivered to accused by such firm for the owner.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Peter Maljan was convicted of embezzlement, and appeals from judgment, and from order denying motion for new trial. Affirmed.

Hahn & Hahn, of Los Angeles, Everts & Ewing, of Fresno, and W. J. Ford, of Los Angeles, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

BEASLY, Judge pro tem. The defendant, Peter Maljan, was convicted of embezzlement in the superior court of Fresno county, and appeals from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial.

There was evidence from which the jury were justified in finding the following facts among others in this case: The defendant, Peter Maljan, was a member of a copartnership composed of himself, his brother, and another person, doing business in Fresno as packers, brokers, and shippers of fruit. The prosecuting witness, Homsy, delivered his crop of grapes to the Maljan firm for shipment to, and sale in, the Eastern market. The grapes were delivered to the firm and accepted by them upon consignment, to be shipped East, and the proceeds were to be paid to Homsy; the defendant's firm acting in the matter as commission brokers and agents for Homsy. The copartnership received the returns from these grapes, amounting to $900, over and above an advance of $200 made to Beach & Co., another copartnership, through whom the grapes were delivered to Maljan's firm. The returns from these grapes were never paid to Homsy.

As is usual in such cases as this, the testimony is complicated and difficult to compass, but the jury was authorized to find the foregoing facts from the evidence, as will be illustrated by stating some of the testimony.

[1, 2] Homsy's fruit was delivered to the copartnership of Maljan Bros. & Co. through one Beach. Beach told Thayer, an employé of Maljan Bros., in the defendant Peter Maljan's presence, that Homsy wanted his crop handled on consignment, and Beach asked if they wanted to handle the fruit in that manner. Either Peter Maljan or Thayer, who was an employé of Maljan Bros. & Co., answered that they did want to handle the grapes in that way. No witness testified categorically that Peter Maljan himself made this statement, but he was present at the time the statement was made, and the overwhelming weight of evidence is that defendant either made the statement himself, or that Thayer made it for his firm in his presence. Peter Maljan was the managing partner of his firm in Fresno at least, and Thayer was a salaried employé thereof, working under the immediate supervision of the defendant himself. The circumstances surrounding the above-recited conversation between Beach, on the one hand, and Thayer and Maljan, on the other, are such that the question whether Maljan heard this statement, so as to be bound by it in a criminal prosecution, was one for the jury to decide, and the above-stated evidence, answers the contention of the defendant that there was not sufficient evidence to show that the grapes were received by Maljan Bros. & Co. on consignment. In addition to this, however, Russell, Beach's bookkeeper, testified that Peter Maljan instructed him that Homsy's grapes were to be handled on consignment. The grapes were shipped East and handled the same as other crops. When Thayer received the bills of lading, he drew against them, attached the draft to the bill of lading, made out the deposit slip with the draft indorsed, and, attaching these papers together, handed them to the receiving teller of the bank with which defendant's firm did business, who, on receiving instructions by wire from the East that everything was regular, credited the amount of the draft to Maljan Bros. & Co. The amount of money coming due to Homsy from his crop was about $1,100, $200 of which was, as has been stated, advanced by Maljan to Beach for his services. Peter Maljan was almost constantly in Fresno until December 7th, when he departed from that city, leaving no money in the bank there to the credit of Maljan Bros. & Co. There is a mass of other evidence in the record, some direct, but much of it circumstantial in character, all tending to support the verdict on all points.

The principal ground upon which a retrial of this case is urged is one of criminal pleading. The indictment charges that the defendant, Peter Maljan, was the agent of Homsy, and that by reason of such agency there came into his care, custody, and control $900, the personal property of Homsy, and that the defendant thereupon, and on or about December 20, 1915, embezzled and appropriated these funds to his own use. Except in acting as a member of the partnership of Maljan Bros. & Co., the defendant never received into his possession or control any money of Homsy, and he never acted for Homsy except as a member of the partnership. Upon this record the defendant claims that the evidence does not sustain the verdict, in this, that, to use his language:

> "The information in this case does not attempt to charge the defendant with embezzlement by reason of the fact that he was the managing partner of the firm which was in receipt of consignment of these grapes, but, without charging these facts, charges him individually with being the agent; charges him individually with the receipt of the money; charges him individually with the appropriation of the money, when the evidence totally and absolutely fails to show any individual liability whatsoever which would support any such conclusion."

And defendant also contends that on these facts there arises a variance between the indictment charging that Maljan, the defendant, received this money as Homsy's agent and the proof that he received it as a member of the partnership of Maljan Bros. & Co., who were acting as agents for Homsy in this transaction.

[3] A partner who feloniously converts to his individual use funds of another person which have come into his custody or under his control as a member of the partnership with which the prosecuting witness was doing business in the relation of principal and agent may be guilty of embezzlement. State v. Crosswhite, 130 Mo. 359, 32 S. W. 991, 51 Am. St. Rep. 571.

[4] Perhaps it would have been better criminal pleading for the district attorney to have charged that Maljan embezzled this money as a member of a partnership which was the agent of Homsy. But the relations of individual partners to persons who occupy toward the partnership the relation of principal by employing the partnership as their agent are those of principal and agent. Indeed, the liability of general partners for each others' acts are those of agents. Civ. Code, § 2443.

[5-7] The district attorney could not have charged the partnership as an entity with having embezzled these funds. The party charged with embezzlement in such case must be the individual partner who converts the funds.

In this case Peter Maljan was in absolute control of the entire business of the partnership in Fresno. The money was deposited in the bank to the account of the partnership, which he thus controlled, and the question whether he was the person who had fraudulently converted this money was a question for the jury to determine from all the evidence in the case. The partnership is not a person separate from its component members in the sense that a corporation is a separate entity.

[8] The variance, if any, between the indictment charging a direct agency and the proof of the indirect agency through the medium of the partnership was not of such a nature as to prejudice the defendant for an examination of the record discloses that the defendant knew perfectly from the beginning of this prosecution what charge he was called upon to answer.

[9] "A material variance between the proof and the information arises when an acquittal of the defendant under the information would be no bar to a further prosecution for the same offense; but where the discrepancy does not affect the validity of the information, or prejudice or affect the substantial rights of the defendant in his defense, the variance is immaterial." People v. Arras, 89 Cal. 223, 26 Pac. 766. There can be no question but that an acquittal here would have barred a similar prosecution for this same offense, and the defendant was not and could not have been surprised by the evidence adduced against him in this case.

Therefore the contention that the evidence does not justify a finding by the jury that Peter Maljan was Homsy's agent, and also the contention that there was a variance between the indictment and the proof which really raises the same point, must both be decided against the defendant.

[10] The defendant asserts that he should be given a new trial because a portion of the trial, namely, the instructions of the court and argument of counsel, took place after 12 o'clock noon of a Saturday, a legal holiday. Defendant relies upon sections 10, 133, and 134 of the Code of Civil Procedure and cases construing those sections to support this contention. Conceding, but not deciding, that the court erred in proceeding with the trial into Saturday afternoon, still the defendant cannot be heard to complain of this, for his attorney, on his attention being called to the fact that the hour of noon had arrived, distinctly and in open court waived the right to object to the trial proceeding into the afternoon, and this is a matter in which the defendant's waiver is binding upon him. It falls within the same class of rights, upon the subject of waiver, as a right to be present at a view of the premises by the jury, the right to have the judge present at such view, and other similar rights, and in such cases it has been held that the right may be waived. People v. Mathews, 139 Cal. 527, 73 Pac. 416; People v. White, 5 Cal. App. 329, 90 Pac. 471; People v. Bird, 132 Cal. 261, 64 Pac. 259.

[11] Many instructions which were requested by the defendant were rejected by the trial court, and the rulings excepted to, but it would serve no purpose to review these instructions, because all instructions asked by the defendant and so refused, except one, were given by the court in substance and in language quite as favorable to the defendant as that of the instructions on the same subject submitted by him. The one such instruction not so given in substance was to the effect that evidence of the oral declarations of the defendant ought to be viewed with caution. The refusal to give this instruction has been held not to be error on the ground that it is a mere commonplace which all jurors ought to be expected to know. People v. Wardrip, 141 Cal. 229, 74 Pac. 744; People v. Ruiz, 144 Cal. 251, 77 Pac. 907.

[12] Exception is taken to the question asked of the witness Thayer as to whether he did not, at a meeting of the creditors of Maljan Bros., state that all he and the defendant ever heard that Homsy claimed about his grapes being consigned was in a letter received by Homsy a short time before. The objection to this question was on the ground that it was not cross-examination, and this was admitted to be the case by defendant's counsel. The defendant cannot now take advantage of this ruling in face of this admission.

[13-15] The petition in insolvency filed by Peter Maljan was offered and received in evidence. It was relevant for the reason that it contained an admission in the list of creditors that the defendant was indebted to Homsy in the sum of $900; that is to say, that there was $900 due Homsy for his grapes. Evidence that there was no money in the account of Maljan Bros. & Co. at the time the defendant left Fresno was material. The returns from the fruit delivered by Beach, including Homsy's grapes, were deposited in this account. The circumstance that the defendant left Fresno with no money in this account, taken in connection with the fact that he was the sole managing agent of the company at Fresno, tended at least to show that he had himself used this money. Nor was any error committed in receiving in evidence the books of Beach & Co. for the reason that the latter firm was in fact the servant of the defendant, as appears from the evidence. It was through Beach & Co. that the fruit was received and much of the business transacted. The details of the packing and shipping of the fruit were taken care of by Beach & Co., and the business of his company was practically a part of the defendant's business. These are the only matters which seem to us to require notice.

1. Brokers ⇨65(5)—Recovery of Compensation—Individual Interest.

The fact that a broker with a third person proposed to enter into a contract of lease covering his client's property, but did not complete the transaction, will not prohibit him from recovering commission for negotiating a later lease for his client with the same party and other persons; the principle that a broker cannot recover commissions for services when his position is inconsistent with his duty as agent owing to his individual interest not applying.

2. Brokers ⇨57(1)—Recovery of Compensation—Sufficiency of Services.

The fact that a lessee secured by a broker executed the lease with other persons as colessees whom the broker did not secure will not defeat the broker's right to commissions.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Lewis R. Works, Judge.

Action by F. L. Stineman against W. M. Gottschalk and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, and judgment directed for plaintiff.

Frank Stewart, Stewart & Weil, and J. W. Howell, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. Fredericks & Hanna, Byron C. Hanna, Joseph Musgrove, and Charles W. Lyon, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff, prosecuted upon the judgment roll alone, from a judgment in favor of defendants. The contention of appellant is that upon the findings he, and not defendants, is entitled to judgment.

The action is based upon an alleged contract made in January, 1914, whereby defendants, who were the owners of a building then in course of construction and designed for business and hotel purposes, employed plaintiff to secure a tenant therefor for a term of ten years at a term rental of $111,360, and promised to pay the reasonable value of his services under said employment, which facts are admitted or found by the court to be true. The court further found that subsequent to the date of said contract of employment plaintiff and one Charles J. Lick entered into a contract whereby they agreed to lease the property for which plaintiff had undertaken to secure a tenant, provided that they or defendants should be successful in securing a license for the sale of liquor on the premises; otherwise such agreement to have no force. The condition was not performed. Thereafter, about March 7, 1914, defendants leased said property for a period of ten years for the aggregate rental of $111,696.00 to said Charles J. Lick and Earl Gilman, Grant Gilman, and Forrest Gilman. As to this lease and the fact that plaintiff was instrumental in securing the execution thereof, the court found:

> "That the plaintiff under his said agency and employment from the defendants did introduce said Charles J. Lick to the defendants, and that thereafter the said Charles J. Lick did continuously negotiate with the defendants for said lease either in connection with the plaintiff or in connection with Earl Gilman, Grant Gilman, and Forrest Gilman, and that the act of said Charles J. Lick in executing the said lease as above stated in connection with the said parties last mentioned was the result of the efforts of the plaintiff; that the plaintiff did not procure for defendants tenants in the persons of Earl Gilman, Grant Gilman, and Forrest Gilman otherwise than as follows: That the plaintiff did, on or about the 10th day of January, 1914, propose to said Earl Gilman, Grant Gilman, and Forrest Gilman that they lease the said premises, but that said parties last mentioned informed the plaintiff that they could not lease the said premises, and at that time declined to enter into any negotiations for that purpose." That no further discussion or negotiation was had by plaintiff with the Gilmans in reference to the matter.

The court further found:

> "That the reasonable value of plaintiff's services under said employment was and is the sum of $1,728.96."

[1] The contention of respondents is that plaintiff's employment as agent was terminated by the contract subsequently made, whereby he and Lick proposed to lease the property subject to the condition named. Without so deciding, we may for the purposes of this case concede, as claimed by respondents, that where one employed as an agent to sell property or secure a tenant therefor buys the property himself or leases the same, he, upon grounds of public policy, due to the fact that as such purchaser or lessee his position is inconsistent with his duty as agent, cannot claim a commission for such service. Nevertheless plaintiff, as shown by the findings, did not lease the property from the defendants, but merely proposed to enter into a contract of lease subject to conditions which were not performed. In other words, the negotiations never ripened into a contract of lease; hence the principle suggested by respondents has no application to this case.

[2] As to the other point, the findings are silent as to whether or not plaintiff ever introduced the Gilmans to defendants or informed them that he had tried to interest them in the proposition. Omitting consideration of the Gilmans, it conclusively appears that the securing of Lick as a tenant for the property was "the result of the efforts of plaintiff" under his contract made with defendants, and that the act of Lick in leasing the property and assuming the obligation to pay defendants the term rental of $111,696.00 was due to the services rendered by plaintiff in the course of his employment. The fact that the Gilmans, at Lick's request or otherwise, joined with him in leasing the property, is a factor of no more importance than had they merely guaranteed performance on the part of Lick whose obligation, in case of inability of his colessees to perform the covenants of the lease, would as to defendants be that of sole lessee. That plaintiff did procure Lick as a tenant who, jointly with the Gilmans, executed the lease conclusively appears from the findings; that Lick, influenced perhaps by the fact that the Gilmans were willing to join with him in the undertaking, was ready and willing to assume the obligations imposed by the terms of the lease appears from the fact that he executed the same; that defendants agreed to pay plaintiff the reasonable value of the services rendered likewise appears from the findings, and this value was found by the court to be $1.728.96, which sum, upon the findings, plaintiff is entitled to recover.

The judgment is reversed, and the trial court directed to enter judgment upon the findings made in favor of plaintiff as of the date thereof for $1,728.96.

KELLER v. CLIVER et al. (Civ. 1895.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑867(4)—REVIEW—SCOPE—APPEAL FROM ORDER DENYING NEW TRIAL.

Objection to a lessor's judgment that an action at law could not be maintained for moneys due under the lease on account of the lessor's mortgage security, but that the remedy was by foreclosure, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 726, providing that there can be but one action for the recovery of any debt or the enforcement of any right secured by mortgage, which action must be in accordance with provisions of that chapter, was not available on appeal from denial of new trial, where the court made full findings of fact supported by the evidence; the only errors chargeable against such decision being those pertaining to its conclusions of law and judgment thereon.

Conclusions of law are always merged in and superseded by the judgment, and can be reviewed only on appeal from the judgment, or from an order made, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 663, 663½, authorizing the vacation of a judgment, which is inconsistent with the findings of fact.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leslie R. Hewitt, Judge.

Action by H. W. Keller against Roy M. Cliver and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants A. K. Grafton and another appeal from order denying motion for new trial. Affirmed.

Wm. T. Blakely, of Los Angeles, for appellants. Tanner, Odell & Taft, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. In this action judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff for certain amounts found due to the plaintiff as lessor under a certain instrument of lease executed by the plaintiff to the Black Diamond Supply Company, a corporation. This lease was, with plaintiff's consent, assigned to the defendants, who bound themselves to perform the covenants of the lease. The amount of the recovery includes rental for certain months of the lease term, together with specified sums levied as taxes against the leased property which the lessees were bound to pay, but which they allowed to become delinquent, and which were thereafter paid by the plaintiff. There is no appeal from the judgment. The defendants Grafton and Adams appeal from the order denying their motion for a new trial.

In their answer to the complaint defendants alleged that, when they accepted the assignment of the lease to them, they were not acting for themselves, but were acting as trustees for a corporation then being formed under the name of Los Angeles Coal & Supply Company, and that plaintiff had full knowledge thereof. The court found that said allegations of the answer were untrue. In their specifications of insufficiency of the evidence to justify the decision, appellants claim that the evidence is insufficient to support such findings. We have examined the evidence, and it fully justifies the findings in question. It is true that, a few days after they obtained their assignment of the lease, appellants and their codefendant Cliver did form a corporation under the name Los Angeles Coal & Supply Company, and placed it in possession of the leased premises. But it further appears that they transferred the lease to the corporation as a part of the consideration for stock in the corporation which was issued to them. This and other circumstances shown in evidence justified the court in determining that they had acquired the lease as their own property, and not as trustees for the proposed corporation.

[1, 2] The only other point argued in support of the appeal raises a question which might be considered on an appeal from the judgment, but which is not available to defendants on their motion for a new trial. The lease contained the following stipulation:

> "All buildings placed on this property by the tenant shall belong to it, and it is granted the privilege of removing the same at the expiration of this lease: Provided, however, that, should any default be made by party of the second part in any of the terms or covenants of this lease, all said buildings and improvements shall be forfeited to party of first part, to apply on damages by reason of such default; and all improvements placed upon said premises by second party are hereby pledged as security to first party for the rents accruing hereunder, and for the faithful performance by second party of all the covenants herein contained."

The court found that the lease was made in the terms pleaded, including the foregoing paragraph thereof; also that the lessee "erected certain buildings upon the said premises, and that the same rested upon sills set upon the ground, and that the posts and main supports and pillars thereof were set into the ground"; also that afterwards the defendants were in default for nonpayment of rent and for nonpayment of taxes, and that, defendants remaining further in default after three days' notice requiring them to pay the rent or deliver up possession of the described premises, the plaintiff took possession of the premises by reason of such default, and possession thereof and all rights under the said lease were surrendered to plaintiff. All of the foregoing facts found are supported by the evidence. Nevertheless appellants claim that the decision of the court is contrary to law in the following particular, among others: That under the above-quoted stipulation of the lease the lessor had mortgage security for the performance by defendant of the obligations of the lease, and therefore that an action at law could not be maintained for moneys due under the lease, but that the sole remedy was by foreclosure of the mortgage, as required by the provisions of section 726 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

As the court did make full findings of fact duly supported by the evidence, the only errors chargeable against the decision must be errors pertaining to its conclusions of law and its judgment thereon. Such errors are not reviewable on a motion for a new trial. "The conclusions of law are always merged in and superseded by the judgment, * * * and, even if necessary thereto, they can be reviewed only on appeal from the judgment, or from an order made under sections 663 and 663½ of the Code of Civil Procedure." Mentone Irrigation Co. v. Redlands, etc., Co., 155 Cal. 323, 100 Pac. 1082, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 382, 17 Ann. Cas. 1222, and cases there cited. On the merits of the question argued, as to whether or not the plaintiff was limited in his remedy to an action as for the foreclosure of a mortgage, we find it unnecessary to express an opinion.

The order is affirmed.

The jury should apply the same rules to expert testimony that are applicable to other testimony in determining its weight.

7. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑829(1)—REFUSAL OF REQUEST COVERED BY CHARGE—NECESSITY OF PROVING SEPARATE COUNTS.

Given instructions fully covering a request on the necessity of proving material allegations of different counts, the accused could not complain of the refusal of the request.

8. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑1119(4)—APPEAL—MATTER TO BE SHOWN BY RECORD—IMPROPER ARGUMENT.

Assignments of error relating to district attorney's improper statements will not be considered, where the record does not disclose such argument.

9. Criminal Law ⟹1152(1) — Appeal—Discretion of Court—View by Jury.

An order permitting the jury to view the premises where the offense was committed will not be disturbed, where the record shows no abuse of discretion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

B. C. Lytle was convicted of assault with caustic chemical under Pen. Code, § 244, and appeals. Affirmed.

J. F. Seymour, Jr., of El Centro, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert M. Clarke, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHAW, J. The information contained two counts. The first charged the defendant with the crime of assault with caustic chemical, as defined in section 244, Penal Code, in that he did, on or about December 8, 1915, throw upon the person of Thomas C. Potts a certain vitriol, corrosive acid, nitric acid and caustic chemical, with intent to injure and disfigure the body and person of said Potts. The second count charges defendant with a like offense committed upon the same person, to wit, Thomas C. Potts, on June 12, 1916. Defendant was found guilty as charged in each of said counts so contained in the information, and prosecutes this appeal from the judgment pronounced upon him following his conviction.

[1] One of the chief errors assigned by counsel for appellant, and to which he devotes a large part of a voluminous brief, is that the court erred in denying his challenge for cause to certain jurors called to try the case. The condition of the record, however, is such that this court cannot review the alleged error. Under the law defendant was entitled to ten peremptory challenges, by the use of which, unless his right was exhausted by the exercise thereof, he might have excluded the objectionable persons from the jury. There is absolutely nothing in the record showing that defendant exercised any of the peremptory challenges to which he was entitled. This being true, and conceding the court erred, it cannot be said that he was prejudiced by the erroneous rulings. People v. Durrant, 116 Cal. 179, 48 Pac. 75; People v. Winthrop, 118 Cal. 85, 50 Pac. 390.

[2] In justice to counsel it should be said that he claims to have exercised all of his peremptory challenges by writing the names of jurors made the subject of such challenges upon slips of paper and passed them to the trial judge, in accordance with an alleged rule of court. No record of such action was made, as shown either by the minutes of the court or in the stenographic notes of the reporter. No protest or objection appears to have been made by counsel for appellant to compliance with this novel procedure which deprives his client of the right to have the alleged erroneous rulings of the court in denying challenges of jurors for cause reviewed on appeal. In our opinion, no warrant exists in law for a rule or procedure which deprives an accused of a record upon which he is entitled to have alleged erroneous rulings made in the course of his trial reviewed.

[3] While the Constitution accords to an accused the right to a public trial, nevertheless, if denied him, he must, on appeal, present a record authenticated as the law directs, affirmatively showing the fact. Since the record fails to show that appellant had exhausted his peremptory challenges, he could not have been prejudiced by the ruling of the court in denying his challenges for cause, for the reason that by the exercise of such unused peremptory challenges he could have prevented the obnoxious jurors from serving.

At the close of the oral argument made by counsel for appellant at the hearing of the cause, this court directed his attention to the fact that in his brief, covering several hundred pages, he specified 60 separate alleged erroneous rulings of the court as grounds for reversal of the judgment; that a cursory examination of the record disclosed that many of the points so made were utterly groundless, in response to which counsel stated that the material points upon which he relied were those which he had presented in his oral argument. Hence, in examining the voluminous record and lengthy brief, we have given consideration only to those points to which our attention was thus directed by counsel in the oral presentation of the case.

Thomas Potts, the victim of the alleged unlawful assault, conducted a drug store in Holtville, Imperial county, employing defendant as his chief clerk. At about 1 or 2 o'clock a. m. on December 8, 1915, while Potts was asleep on a screened porch of his house, nitric acid was thrown upon his face and head, inflicting severe burns. A second and like offense was committed at about 1 o'clock a. m. on June 12, 1916, while Potts was sleeping in an inside room of a house which he occupied. The theory of the prosecution was that both offenses were committed by defendant, and in support of such theory much circumstantial evidence tending to prove that he had committed both offenses as charged was introduced. Indeed, it may be said that his conviction rests solely upon circumstantial evidence; there being no direct testimony tending to show that he committed either offense. Nevertheless there was ample evidence which, if believed by the jury, was sufficient to establish circumstances from which they were justified in drawing the inference that defendant had committed the offenses.

[4, 5] There was introduced in evidence certain notes and writings which, if written by defendant as claimed by the prosecution, tended to connect him with the commission of the crimes. For the purpose of proving they were so written, experts in handwriting were called, one of whom on behalf of the prosecution testified that in comparing the notes and writings with the admitted genuine chirography of defendant, he found them to be in the same handwriting, which testimony was contradicted by an expert called on behalf of defendant. In connection with this evidence the court instructed the jury to the effect that individuals as a general rule acquire a system of forming letters which gives to their handwriting a fixed character and distinguishes it from the handwriting of every other person, and that handwriting is an art concerning which correctness of opinion is susceptible of demonstration. The right of either party, in a proper case, to introduce opinion evidence of experts as to the identity of disputed handwriting, which right in this case was exercised by both, cannot be questioned; hence there was no occasion for the statements made in the instruction. Nevertheless they are not subject to appellant's objection that the court thereby instructed the jury as to the weight which they should give such evidence. However read, since there were two such witnesses whose testimony was conflicting, it could not be understood by the jury as an expression on the part of the court as to the credibility of either.

[6] Moreover, the court properly told the jury that while such witnesses might give their reasons for the opinions expressed, the jury should "apply the same general rules to the testimony of experts that are applicable to the testimony of other witnesses in determining its weight."

[7] The court instructed the jury that:

> "It is the duty of the prosecution to prove each and every material allegation in each of the two counts of the information, and that if the prosecution fails to prove each and every material allegation in the first count, you must acquit the defendant on the first count, and if the prosecution fails to prove each and every material allegation of the second count of the information, you must acquit the defendant on the second count."

Notwithstanding the fact that the court so instructed the jury, appellant assigns as error the fact that the court, at his request, refused to give to the jury the following instruction:

> "You, the jury, are instructed that in determining the guilt or innocence of this defendant, on the two counts set forth in the information, you shall confine the testimony offered as to the first count to that count, and the testimony offered as to the second count to that count. In other words, you are instructed that each count in the information must be separately proved to your satisfaction beyond a reasonable doubt before you can convict the defendant of either or both of the counts of the information."

That the rights of defendant in this regard were fully covered by the first instruction above quoted must be apparent; hence, conceding the requested instruction correct, it was, in view of the one given, properly refused.

The contention that a sufficient foundation was not laid for introducing in evidence certain articles, consisting of a note found under a glass in the house occupied by Potts, and also an acid bottle, jelly glass, piece of screen, and notes and parts of envelopes containing the same, concerning which much testimony was offered, is without merit. The identity of the articles so found was clearly established. Were it otherwise, and conceding the claim of appellant, it is apparent upon the record that he could not possibly have been prejudiced by reason of the introduction of such evidence marked as exhibits in the case.

[8] The record does not disclose what was said by the district attorney in the course of his argument to the jury, and hence there is nothing upon which to base appellant's assignment of error on account of misconduct of the district attorney in making improper statements to the jury.

[9] Neither is there anything in the record showing an abuse of discretion on the part of the court in refusing, at defendant's request, to make an order permitting the jury to view the premises where the offense charged was alleged to have been committed. Indeed, as said in People v. Howard, 28 Cal. App. 181, 151 Pac. 754:

> "It is difficult to conceive of a case in which the facts would justify a reversal for an abuse of such discretion."

Our attention has not been directed to any prejudicial error disclosed by the record.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; JAMES, J.

34 Cal. App. 365

SHERWOOD v. LOWELL. (Civ. 1649.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 27, 1917.)

1. MORTGAGES 🔑280(5)—ASSUMPTION OF SECURED DEBT—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action on a note, made by defendant's brother and secured by a mortgage on land conveyed to a corporation in which defendant was the principal, but not the sole, stockholder, evidence held insufficient to support a finding that defendant and his brother represented that the brother would transfer all the property to defendant, and that defendant agreed with plaintiff to pay the note.

2. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS 🔑197(3)—EVIDENCE—ACKNOWLEDGMENT OR NEW PROMISE.

Where a memorandum on the billhead of a corporation of which defendant was the principal stockholder, containing a credit for the interest on a note, was relied on as an acknowledgment or new promise by defendant, taking the note out of the statute of limitations, plaintiff's testimony regarding the corporation that, as he understood it, defendant was the whole thing, manager, owner, and everything else, did not support a finding that defendant represented to plaintiff that he was the corporation.

3. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF 🔑23(1)—GUARANTY 🔑16(3)—PROMISE TO PAY ANOTHER'S DEBT—CONSIDERATION.

Under Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 2, making special promises to answer for the debt of another invalid, unless some memorandum thereof is in writing and subscribed by the party to be charged, except in the cases provided for in section 2794, and section 2794, providing that a promise to answer for another's obligation is deemed an original obligation of the promisor, and need not be in writing when the promise is made by one who has received property of another upon an undertaking to apply it pursuant to such promise, etc., where mortgaged property was conveyed to a corporation, an oral agreement by the principal stockholder, several months later, with the holder of the mortgage note, that he would pay the note, was void, because not in writing and wholly without consideration.

4. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF 🔑115(2)—SUFFICIENCY OF WRITING—PROMISE TO PAY ANOTHER'S DEBT.

Where mortgaged property was conveyed to a corporation, and the principal stockholder subsequently made a payment of interest on the mortgage note, which payment was evidenced by a credit for the amount of the interest in a memorandum in defendant's handwriting, on the corporation's billhead, containing charges against the holder of the note for merchandise purchased from the corporation, this was not a sufficient memorandum to satisfy the statute of frauds (Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 2), on the theory that defendant treated the name of the corporation printed on the billhead as his own, or adopted it as his signature, since the writing must not only contain an unequivocal assumption of the obligation, but must be subscribed by the party to be charged, and a mere inference arising from circumstances reasonably amenable to different meanings, or leading to either one of two opposite or inconsistent conclusions, does not measure up to the requirements of the statute.

5. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS 🔑146(3) — ACKNOWLEDGMENT OR NEW PROMISE—SUFFICIENCY OF WRITING.

The writing was not sufficient to take the note out of the operation of the statute of limitations, under Code Civ. Proc. § 360, providing that no acknowledgment or new promise is sufficient evidence of a new or continuing contract to take the case out of the operation of such statute, unless contained in some writing signed by the party to be charged, especially where the memorandum was made after the debt was barred, since an acknowledgment of a debt, from which a promise to pay may be implied, must be a direct, distinct, unqualified, and unconditional admission of a previous subsisting debt, which the party is liable and willing to pay.

6. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS 🔑163(4) — PART PAYMENT—NECESSITY OF WRITING.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 360, a part payment is not sufficient in itself to take a debt out of the statute of limitations, unless there is a writing, signed by the party to be charged, showing an acknowledgment of, or an express promise to pay, the debt.

7. MORTGAGES 🔑280(4) — ASSUMPTION OF DEBT BY PURCHASER — NATURE OF LIABILITY.

If a corporation to which mortgaged property was conveyed, or its principal stockholder, assumed and agreed to pay the mortgage, the corporation or the stockholder became nothing more than a guarantor of or indemnifier against any deficiency that might arise upon a sale of the mortgaged premises, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 726, providing, relative to the foreclosure of mortgages, that there can be but one action for the recovery of any debt, or the enforcement of any right secured by mortgage, which action must be in accordance with the provisions of that chapter.

8. MORTGAGES 🔑280(1) — ASSUMPTION OF DEBT BY PURCHASER—LIABILITY.

Where mortgaged property was conveyed by a mortgagor to his wife, without any assumption of the mortgage or agreement by her to pay it, and was then conveyed by her to a corporation, any agreement by the corporation or its principal stockholder to pay the mortgage debt was not binding, as, the corporation's grantor not being liable, there was no privity of contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; J. Q. White, Judge.

Action by O. W. Sherwood against A. J. Lowell. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a motion to set it aside and enter a judgment for defendant, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Robert Duncan, of Ukiah, for appellant. Preston & Preston, of Ukiah, and C. H. McConaughy, of Ft. Bragg, for respondent.

HART, J. The action is on a promissory note executed March 30, 1908, to plaintiff, by J. W. Lowell, brother of defendant, and payable one year after date. It is alleged in the complaint that, in consideration of the maker of the note transferring to defendant "certain property and business," defendant agreed to pay said note; that "on March 30, 1909, the 30th day of March, 1912, and the 30th day of March, 1913, pursuant to said agreement, defendant did on said dates pay to plaintiff the interest due on said promissory note"; that "thereafter, on May 5, 1913, at the said town of Westport, defendant agreed in writing to and with plaintiff to pay said promissory note, and did then and there, in writing, make a payment on said promissory note to said plaintiff in the sum of $80." Judgment is prayed for the sum of $1,000 and interest from March 30, 1913.

Defendant, in his answer, denied entering into the alleged agreement, and denied that any such agreement was made; denied the alleged transfer of property by J. W. Lowell to defendant, and denied the alleged payment of money as interest or otherwise; denied the alleged agreement of May 5, 1913; and denied, on information and belief, that the said sum of $1,000 or any other sum is due or unpaid on said note. For further answer, defendant pleaded sections 337, 339, and 343 of the Code of Civil Procedure in bar of the action.

The cause was tried by the court without a jury, and plaintiff had judgment as prayed for in the complaint. Defendant moved the court to set aside the judgment, and enter a new and different judgment in favor of defendant and against plaintiff. The case is here on appeal from the judgment and order denying said motion.

The execution of the note by J. W. Lowell is not denied. The court made the following findings:

"II. That it is true that thereafter, and on the 30th day of March, 1911, at the town of Westport, county of Mendocino, state of California, the said J. W. Lowell and said defendant, A. J. Lowell, with the consent of the said plaintiff, [did] represent to said plaintiff that he, the said J. W. Lowell, would transfer all of his property and said business to the defendant, and the defendant, A. J. Lowell, then and there did agree to and with the said plaintiff to pay and discharge the payment of said promissory note and interest due thereon, and that may become due thereon; but that the said J. W. Lowell, instead of transferring said property and business to the said defendant, A. J. Lowell, transferred the same to the Westport Mercantile Company, of which the defendant, A. J. Lowell, is the largest stockholder, and that the said J. W. Lowell and the defendant, A. J. Lowell, did represent to the said plaintiff that he, the said A. J. Lowell, was and is the owner of said property and business, but that said agreement by said A. J. Lowell to pay said note was not in writing, but was oral.

"III. That it is true that, pursuant to said agreement, the said A. J. Lowell did assume and agree to pay said promissory note and interest thereon, and that on the 30th day of March, 1911, the said A. J. Lowell did pay the interest on said promissory note, which payment is evidenced by a memorandum in writing on the back of said promissory note in the handwriting of said defendant, A. J. Lowell, which said memoranda is as follows: 'Recd to Mar. 30th, 1911.' But that the name of A. J. Lowell does not appear on said memorandum or in connection with it.

"IV. That it is true that on the 5th day of May, 1913, at the town of Westport, county of Mendocino, state of California, the said defendant, A. J. Lowell, did pay to plaintiff on account of interest on said promissory note the sum of $80, which payment is evidenced by a written memorandum in the handwriting of said defendant, A. J. Lowell, on the billhead of the Westport Mercantile Company, and that the said defendant, A. J. Lowell, represented to the said plaintiff that he, the said A. J. Lowell, was the Westport Mercantile Company, and that the payment so made was made by the said defendant, A. J. Lowell, personally; that the said written memorandum of said payment is as follows: 'By interest, $140;' that the said written memorandum is not, nor is the said statement on the billhead of the Westport Mercantile Company, signed or subscribed by the said A. J. Lowell; that the name of the Westport Mercantile Company does not appear thereon, except in printing."

The uncontradicted evidence shows: That the Westport Mercantile Company is, and has been since its organization on June 29, 1907, a corporation, duly established as such under the laws of the state of California; that its principal place of business was and is at the town of Westport, in Mendocino county, and that at said town it has carried on during the whole of the period of its existence a general merchandise business and the business of purchasing and selling timber, for which specific purposes, among others, as declared in its articles of incorporation, it was organized; that the stockholders of said corporation were and are the defendant, A. J. Lowell, F. C. Hunter, and C. E. Gordon, the defendant being the owner of three-fifths of the stock therein; that the plaintiff did business with said corporation. It is likewise further shown that the corporation had, prior to the particular transaction giving rise to this action, borrowed the sum of $1,000 from the plaintiff. and that the latter held its promissory note therefor, which note had been paid at the time of the trial of this action; that, on March 30, 1908, one J. W. Lowell borrowed the sum of $1,000 from the plaintiff, and executed and delivered to the latter his promissory note for said sum, made payable one year after date, and, as security for the payment of said note, executed and delivered to the plaintiff a mortgage on a certain piece of land situated in Mendocino county and upon which there was then standing a two-story building.

The parties to the action stipulated that these facts were true: That J. W. Lowell, at the time of the making of the note last referred to and the execution of the mortgage to secure the payment of said note, was the owner of the land so mortgaged; that after the said land was so mortgaged J. W. Lowell conveyed the same to his wife, Mrs. E. J. Lowell; that on the 8th day of August, 1910, Mrs. Lowell conveyed the land, by a grant, bargain, and sale deed, to the Westport Mercantile Company. While this deed was, as was, of course, the deed to Mrs. Lowell, subject to the mortgage, it, like the latter deed, contained no agreement that the grantee would assume the mortgage debt; and at the time of the conveyance by Mrs. Lowell to the corporation the note and mortgage were still subsisting obligations—that is, the statute of limitations had not run against them. In the connection it may parenthetically be stated, although a matter of no special consequence, so far as the decision here is concerned, further than that it tends to show that the conveyance to Mrs. Lowell involved a bona fide transaction, the record shows that Mrs. Lowell obtained the mortgaged premises from her husband as the result of an award made by certain arbitrators "in the matter of settlement of community property of J. W. Lowell and E. J. Lowell." It is not made to appear what occasioned the arbitration, or the reason for the settlement and the division between them of the community property rights of said parties. However, after the mortgaged land had been conveyed to the corporation, and after action on the note and mortgage given to the plaintiff by J. W. Lowell had become barred by the statute of limitations, the defendant, A. J. Lowell, paid the plaintiff the sum of $140, of which $60 was in payment of interest then due on the note from the corporation to the plaintiff and $80 in payment on the J. W. Lowell note. These payments were noted as a credit on a written statement of an account due from the plaintiff to the corporation, which statement is referred to by the court in finding 4 of its findings as a "written memorandum of the payment" of the interest due on the note in suit. As stated, said "memorandum" was an ordinary statement or bill rendered against the plaintiff for merchandise purchased by him of the corporation, and the printed part thereof read as follows:

> "Statement Westport Mercantile Co. Westport, Cal. ......, 191.. Sold to ......"

The date, "May 5," and the figure "3" after the figures "191," and all items after the words "Sold to," were in the defendant's handwriting; but his own name nowhere appears therein. It is upon this writing that the plaintiff relies for a recovery against the defendant; his claim being that said "memorandum" created a new promise, within the intent of section 360 of the Code of Civil Procedure, against which the statute has not run, since the action founded upon the promise so created was brought within four years after the date of the "memorandum." It is argued, in purported support of this position, that, although the defendant's name is nowhere attached to said "memorandum," the document is, nevertheless, within the meaning of said section 360, an "acknowledgment" from which a new promise is implied and created, and that "a printed name is sufficient to satisfy the statute where the paper is delivered under circumstances showing an intention to regard the printed name as a person's own, and so in effect to adopt it as his signature." Thus it will be observed that since, concededly, the note was barred by the statute of limitations after March 30, 1913, the right to maintain this action must depend upon whether the finding of a new promise to assume and pay the indebtedness evidenced by the note in question is supported by the evidence.

Section 360 of the Code of Civil Procedure, supra, provides:

> "No acknowledgment or promise is sufficient evidence of a new or continuing contract, by which to take the case out of the operation of this title, unless the same is contained in some writing, signed by the party to be charged."

The defendant contends that the "written memorandum" referred to is not such a writing as will take the case out of the operation of the above section; that it is insufficient under the terms of the statute of frauds to charge either the defendant or the corporation with liability for payment of the debt; that in no event can either the defendant or the corporation be held liable to the plaintiff, since the uncontroverted evidence shows that there was no privity of contract between either and the plaintiff.

[1] In the first place, we express the opinion that the evidence, as it is presented by the record here, is wholly insufficient to sustain that part of finding No. 2 which reads as follows:

> "That it is true that thereafter, and on the 30th day of March, 1911, at the town of Westport, * * * the said J. W. Lowell and said defendant, A. J. Lowell, with the consent of the said plaintiff, [did] represent to said plaintiff that he, the said J. W. Lowell, would transfer all of his property and said business to the defendant, and the defendant, A. J. Lowell, then and there did agree to and with the said plaintiff to pay and discharge the payment of said promissory note and interest due thereon, and that may become due thereon."

The only testimony that we have been able to find in the record from which a possible inference might arise that the agreement referred to in said finding was made, other than the written statement of account rendered to the plaintiff by the corporation and above described, is the following given by the plaintiff:

> That when A. J. Lowell paid the interest on the note on the 30th day of March, 1911, a conversation took place between him and A. J. Lowell concerning said payment. "Q. State what was said and where, and who was present at the time the payment was made? A. I can't give the exact words. Q. Well, in substance, what you understood what was said? A. We were talking about the note, and Mr. A. J. Lowell was to pay the note, and he paid me that interest the first year. Q. You mean in 1911? A. Yes, sir. Q. That was the first interest paid by A. J. Lowell? A. Yes, sir. Q. At that time was there anything said about releasing J. W. Lowell? A. Yes, sir. Q. Since that time, who have you looked to for the payment of this note? A. Mr. A. J. Lowell. Q. Now, since 1911, were any other payments made by Mr. A. J. Lowell? A. Yes, sir. Q. When was the next payment made? A. Some time in 1912."

He testified that a further payment was made in 1913, and said he had a writing to show said payment, referring to the statement (above referred to) showing the account between plaintiff and the corporation for merchandise furnished the former by the latter, and which contained the credit item of $140 for interest then due on the two notes—the note in suit and the note of the corporation to the plaintiff. On redirect examination, the plaintiff testified that, near the time at which J. W. Lowell and his wife accepted the award made by the arbitrators who had been selected to adjust and settle their respective rights in their community property, A. J. Lowell told him that J. W. Lowell had assigned the mortgaged premises to him, and that he (A. J.) had received said property.

It will be observed that in the above testimony the plaintiff does not say that A. J. and J. W. Lowell entered into the agreement referred to in finding No. 2. Nor is there to be found anywhere in the record any testimony that A. J. and J. W. Lowell entered into any such agreement. The most that can be said of the above testimony of the plaintiff, or the effect thereof, is that A. J. Lowell, whether for himself, or for J. W. Lowell, or for the corporation, is not made to appear therefrom, paid, as it accrued, the interest on the note on three several occasions, and that the plaintiff had looked to A. J. Lowell for the payment of the note. The testimony obviously falls far short of upholding the part of finding 2 above quoted herein.

Nor is there any proof to sustain the remaining vital portion of said finding, viz.:

> "That the said J. W. Lowell, instead of transferring said property and business to the said defendant, A. J. Lowell, transferred the same to the Westport Mercantile Company, of which the defendant, A. J. Lowell, is the largest stockholder, and that the said J. W. Lowell and the defendant, A. J. Lowell, did represent to the said plaintiff that he, the said A. J. Lowell, was and is the owner of said property and business," etc.

The uncontradicted evidence is, as has heretofore been shown, that it was not J. W. Lowell, but his wife, E. J. Lowell, who, having previously been awarded the mortgaged premises as her share of the community property in the settlement by the arbitrators of the community rights of herself and husband, transferred and conveyed the said premises to the Westport Company.

[2] The only other finding which is of a fact material or vital to the judgment is the finding that the payment of the interest on the note in the sum of $80, on May 5, 1913, is "evidenced by a written memorandum, in the handwriting of the defendant * * * on the billhead of the Westport Mercantile Company," and that the "said written memorandum of said payment is as follows: 'By interest, $140;' that the said written memorandum is not, nor is the said statement on the billhead of the Westport Mercantile Company, signed or subscribed by the said A. J. Lowell; that the name of the Westport Mercantile Company does not appear thereon except in printing"; and that "the said defendant represented to the said plaintiff that he, the said A. J. Lowell, was the Westport Mercantile Company, and that the payment so made was made by the said defendant, A. J. Lowell, personally."

There is no evidence in the record which sustains or warrants the finding that A. J. Lowell represented to the plaintiff that he (the said Lowell) "was the Westport Mercantile Company." As to the fact so found, the only testimony disclosed by the record which might be said to have any bearing whatever thereon is that of the plaintiff, who merely stated, referring to the corporation, that, as he understood it, A. J. Lowell was "the whole thing—manager, owner, and everything else." Obviously, that statement involves only the conclusion of the witness, and is wholly insufficient to support the finding referred to. In this connection it may be observed that the articles of incorporation of the corporation and the uncontradicted testimony of A. J. Lowell show or tend to show that, while the said Lowell was the principal stockholder therein, there were others who owned considerable stock in the concern.

[3, 4] Even conceding that the evidence shows that the defendant, on the 30th day of March, 1911, promised to pay the note, which we hold is not so, the promise so found to have been made, not having been made under or upon any of the conditions specified in subdivisions 1, 2, and 3 of section 2794 of the Civil Code, is wholly void because not in writing. Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 2. The uncontradicted evidence shows, and the court finds, as has been already pointed out, that the mortgaged premises were conveyed to the corporation, and not to the defendant, and that such conveyance was made some seven months prior to the making of the alleged promise. Nor is there any evidence, or even pretense, that the defendant received any other property of J. W. Lowell to be devoted to any of the purposes mentioned in section 2794 of the Civil Code. Hence, furthermore, there was no consideration moving to the defendant for the agreement. If made at all, it was a mere nudum pactum. It follows, of course, that the finding that such a promise was made by the defendant, at the time mentioned in the findings, is without any force in the determination of this appeal, and there is, therefore, no necessity for further consideration of it. But the basis of the present action is not the alleged agreement of March 30, 1911, which was made, if at all, before the plaintiff's right of action on the note or original obligation had been lost by lapse of the time limited by the statute within which he might have sued on said note. His action is, as seen, founded entirely on the alleged written memorandum mentioned in finding 4, which was made after the statute had barred his right to sue on the note. It is upon this alleged new promise that the plaintiff relies for a recovery.

But it is clear to us that the alleged memorandum is wholly insufficient, under the terms of the second subdivision of section 1624 of the Civil Code and those of section 360 of the Code of Civil Procedure, either to charge the defendant with liability for the payment of the debt or to take the case out of the operation of the statute of limitations. Indeed, the first proposition is clearly settled by the finding that the memorandum was not signed by the defendant. Section 1624, subd. 2, supra, provides that a special promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another, to be valid, must be in writing and subscribed by the party to be charged, or by his agent. As has been shown, there is no evidence to support the finding that the defendant was himself the corporation, and there is no evidence or direct finding that the defendant treated the name, "Westport Mercantile Company," as printed on the statement or memorandum, as his own, or in effect adopted it as his signature. If, as has been suggested, said memorandum was delivered by the defendant under circumstances justifying the inference that the defendant's intention was to treat the printed name as his own and to adopt it as his signature, then we reply that a mere inference arising from circumstances reasonably amenable to different meanings, or which will, with equal force, lead to either one of two opposite or inconsistent conclusions, does not measure up to the requirements of the statute. The circumstance that the written part of the statement was in the handwriting of the defendant, together with the circumstance that the latter had at a previous time orally said to the plaintiff that he would pay the debt, may well be said to justify the inference that the defendant intended to adopt the printed name of the corporation as his own. On the other hand, the circumstances that the memorandum was on a billhead of the corporation, that all the debit items in the statement were for merchandise purchased from the corporation by the plaintiff, that the name of the defendant was neither printed nor written on the statement, and that the mortgaged property was not conveyed to the defendant but to the corporation, certainly justify the inference that the transaction was intended and understood to be that of the corporation, and not the personal transaction of the defendant.

The statute plainly contemplates that, to charge a third party with liability for the debt of another, the writing so relied upon must not only contain a direct and unequivocal assumption of the obligation, but it must be subscribed by the party to be charged. As seen, the only feature of the memorandum here which relates in any way to the note in suit or the indebtedness evidenced thereby is the item of credit for interest in the words: "By interest, $140." There is not another word or line contained therein which tends to show any contract by which the defendant or any other person agreed to stand for the debt which is primarily responsible for this action. The writing is not a memorandum of a promise or agreement to do anything, much less one to assume the debt which is the foundation of this suit. The object of the statute of frauds is to preserve, in the most certain, definite, and enduring form, evidence of the terms to which persons who have entered into contractual relations as to certain specified kinds of transactions have mutually agreed, and thus to prevent the imposition of fraud and the practicing of perjury in such transactions, and certainly it cannot be said that the object of the statute may be accomplished, or fraud or perjury prevented, or the practice of either minimized, where, as here, no promise or agreement can be shown, or the purpose or significance of the writing relied on even understood, in the absence of parol evidence explanatory thereof.

[5, 6] Nor is the writing sufficient to take the case out of the operation of the statute of limitations. While it is true that in an early case, Barron v. Kennedy, 17 Cal. 577, it was held that "part payment has always been held sufficient to take the debt, on which it is made, out of the statute," the language so used must be considered in the light of the situation presented to the court —that is to say, the language quoted states the rule correctly where it is considered in connection with the fact, if it be a fact, that there is a writing, signed by the party to be charged, showing an acknowledgment of or an express promise to pay the debt. If there be no such writing of any kind or character, then part payment is insufficient to take the debt out of the statute. If the rule were otherwise, then to section 360 of the Code of Civil Procedure would be added a qualification which it does not contain, and which is not within the fair and reasonable import of its language.

As we have shown and as is obvious, there is no direct and distinct promise to pay the debt contained in the memorandum, and an acknowledgment of a debt from which a promise to pay may be implied must be a direct, distinct, unqualified, and unconditional admission of a previous subsisting debt which the party is liable and willing to pay. "If there be accompanying circumstances, which repel the promise or intention to pay; if the expressions be equivocal, vague, and indeterminate, leading to no certain conclusion, but at best to probable inferences, which may affect different minds in different ways—we think they ought not to go to the jury as evidence of a new promise to revive the cause of action." Mr. Justice Story, in Bell v. Morrison, 1 Pet. (U. S.) 362, 7 L. Ed. 174. See, also, Biddel v. Brizzolara, 56 Cal. 382; McCormick v. Brown, 36 Cal. 180, 185, 95 Am. Dec. 170; Pierce v. Merrill, 128 Cal. 476, 61 Pac. 67, 79 Am. St. Rep. 63; Rodgers v. Byers, 127 Cal. 528, 60 Pac. 42; Visher v. Wilbur, 5 Cal. App. 562, 570, 571, 90 Pac. 1065, 91 Pac. 412. The rule as thus stated involves the test determinative of whether an acknowledgment by the debtor himself is such as to justify the implication of a promise to pay, and in this state it has been repeatedly held that the rule will be the more rigidly applied where the acknowledgment, even by the debtor himself, is after the statute has run, and thus a new promise sought to be established, than where the acknowledgment sufficient to continue the life of the obligation is made before the statute has run. This being the rule as to the debtor himself, it seems to us that an acknowledgment by a third party, particularly after the debt has been barred, should be so clear, distinct, direct, and unequivocal as necessarily to raise the implication of a promise by him to pay the debt. Indeed, it seems to us that in such a case, where, of course, none of the conditions specified in section 2794 of the Civil Code exists, to bind a third party, a distinct, direct, and unconditional express promise in writing should be required. In this case, however, the circumstances accompanying the making of the alleged "memorandum in writing" furnish the only ground upon which the claim may rest that the defendant either promised to pay or made an acknowledgment of the debt, and as we have shown, and as must readily be apparent upon an examination of those circumstances, they "lead to no certain conclusion, but at best to probable inferences which may affect different minds in different ways."

sion necessarily following therefrom are decisive of this case; but, while not necessary to do so, we will, nevertheless, consider briefly another proposition advanced by the appellant in impeachment of the judgment, viz.:

> "That if the appellant here, or even the Westport Mercantile Company, had assumed and agreed to pay the mortgage of this plaintiff, neither would become anything more than a guarantor of or indemnifier against any deficiency that might arise upon a sale of the mortgaged premises."

This proposition follows from the fact that the sole remedy of the mortgagee is in an action to foreclose the mortgage (Code Civ. Proc. § 726), and therefore the liability of the mortgagor wholly contingent on the fact that a sale of the mortgaged premises shall fail to satisfy the debts and costs. It is, so it is contended, against this contingency that the purchaser indemnifies him. "True, the statute authorizes a single decree which provides for a sale of the mortgaged premises, and a subsequent judgment over against the mortgagor, to which, upon the equitable principle of subrogation, may be added a judgment over against the purchaser (where the latter has indemnified his vendor) for any deficiency which may appear from the sheriff's return." Biddell v. Brizzolara, 64 Cal. 354, 30 Pac. 609. See, also, Roberts v. Fitzallen, 120 Cal. 482, 52 Pac. 818; Ward v. De Oca, 120 Cal. 102, 52 Pac. 130; Andrews v. Robertson, 169 Pac. ——. We think, assuming that an agreement either by the defendant or the corporation to assume the mortgage debt was made, this case comes clearly within the doctrine of those cases.

[8] But a further proposition, which is supported by the record and must be sustained, may briefly be considered, viz.: That, since the conveyance of the property to Mrs. Lowell by her husband occurred after the premises had been mortgaged to the plaintiff without an agreement by her, contained in the deed or otherwise, that she would assume or pay the mortgage debt, and she under these circumstances later transferred the property to the corporation, the appellant, conceding that he is or then was the Westport Mercantile Company, and personally bound by its acts, is not bound or liable at all to the respondent, for the reason that there is no privity of contract between them. Nor (for the same reason) would the corporation be so bound. In other words, if it be true that a purchaser of an equity of redemption or the mortgaged premises may bind himself to pay the mortgage debt as a part of the consideration of the transfer, still in this case neither the defendant nor the corporation would be liable to the plaintiff, even as a guarantor of or indemnifier against any deficiency judgment against the mortgagor, for the reason that his or its grantor was not personally liable for the debt or deficiency arising upon a sale of the property under foreclosure. This proposition is plainly sustainable upon reason and principle, but it has been declared by numerous cases to be the correct doctrine. In Biddell v. Brizzolara, 64 Cal. 361, 30 Pac. 609, 612, supra, it is said:

> "Even where the rule has been established that the purchaser is bound by his promise as a promise made for the benefit of the mortgagee, it is still necessary that the grantor should be personally liable upon the mortgage in order to render the grantee liable upon his covenant to the holder of the mortgage assumed."

See, also, Ward v. De Oca, 120 Cal. 102, 52 Pac. 130; Andrews v. Robertson et al., 169 Pac. ——.

In King v. Whitely, 10 Paige (N. Y.) 465, the grantor of an equity of redemption in mortgaged premises, neither legally nor equitably interested in the payment of the bond or mortgage, except so far as the same were a charge upon his lands, conveyed the mortgaged property subject to the mortgage, and the conveyance recited that the grantees therein assumed the mortgage and agreed to pay the same as a part of the consideration for the conveyance. It was held that:

> "As the grantor in that conveyance was not personally liable to the holder of the mortgage to pay the same, the grantees were not liable to the holder of such mortgage for the deficiency."

That case was approved in the year 1877 in Vrooman v. Turner, 69 N. Y. 280, 25 Am. Rep. 195, and later in the case of Biddell v. Brizzolara, supra, Ward v. De Oca, supra, and Andrews v. Robertson et al., supra.

At all events, since the case for the plaintiff derives its only support from the writing or statement in writing of May 5, 1913, and as we hold it insufficient to bind the defendant or legally charge him with the debt sued for, and is, furthermore, insufficient to take the debt out of the operation of the statute of limitations, the judgment and the order appealed from must be reversed; and it is so ordered.

PEOPLE v. NOLAN. (Cr. 398.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 5, 1917.)

1. Criminal Law 🔑130—Change of Venue—Oral Motion—Statute.

Under Pen. Code, § 1034, requiring that application for change of venue be in writing, defendant's oral motion for such change was properly denied.

2. Criminal Law 🔑134(2) — Change of Venue — Affidavit Supporting Motion — Insufficiency.

Defendant's affidavit, supporting his motion for change of venue, merely stating that he firmly believed, and in fact knew, that it was impossible for him to secure a fair and impartial trial at the hands of a jury drawn from the particular community, was insufficient, since affidavits for such a motion must state the facts and circumstances from which the conclusion is deduced that a fair and impartial trial cannot be had.

3. Criminal Law 🔑656(9)—Trial—Remark of Court to Counsel.

In a prosecution for keeping in no-license territory a place where alcoholic liquor was sold, etc., where a witness testified on cross-examination that a peddler had warned defendant that the sheriff was in town, and the witness was asked whether he knew what the peddler meant when he said to defendant: "Look out; the sheriff is in town"—and counsel for the people objected to the testimony as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, the thing speaking for itself, and the court remarked that he thought it spoke for itself, and carried its own meaning with it pretty conclusively, such remark of the court, addressed to the attorneys, and not to the jury, was not improper as influencing the jury's verdict, particularly where any possible prejudice must have been dispelled by the peddler and defendant himself, who both testified that the warning was made in a jocular manner and as a joke.

4. Criminal Law 🔑372(2) — Violation of Liquor Law—Evidence of Prior Sales.

In a prosecution under an indictment charging that defendant willfully and unlawfully kept and conducted a place where alcoholic liquor was sold, served, and distributed on April 18th, evidence of sales of liquor made April 15th, 16th, and 17th was competent; such evidence of prior sales not being too remote.

5. Intoxicating Liquors 🔑236(9)—Illegal Sale—Sufficiency of Evidence.

In such prosecution evidence held sufficient to support verdict of guilty.

6. Stipulations 🔑14(4)—As to City Being No-License Territory—Construction.

In a prosecution under indictment charging that defendant willfully and unlawfully kept and conducted a place where alcoholic liquor was sold, etc., on April 18th, where, at the close of the case, counsel for the people asked defendant's counsel, receiving an affirmative answer, whether he would stipulate the required proof as to the territory and the liquor, and stated it was stipulated that Mendocino City was in the Fourth supervisor district of Mendocino county, that the Fourth supervisor district was no-license territory, that Mendocino was not an incorporated town, and that the liquor introduced in evidence was alcoholic liquor as defined by the Wylie Local Option Law, the stipulation referred to the date charged in the indictment, and was offered in support of the allegation that Mendocino City was "then and there" (April 18th) no-license territory, and proof that Mendocino City was no-license territory on the date charged was unnecessary.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; J. Q. White, Judge.

M. D. Nolan was convicted of keeping and conducting in no-license territory a place where alcoholic liquor was sold and distributed, etc., and from the judgment and an order denying his motion for new trial he appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

See, also, 165 Pac. 715.

J. C. Hurley and Lilburn I. Gibson, both of Ukiah, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

BURNETT, J. It being suspected that defendant, Nolan, was "blind-pigging," one Baroni was employed by the sheriff of Mendocino county to purchase liquor from defendant, and succeeded in doing so. Defendant was thereupon charged, by indictment of the grand jury of the county of Mendocino, with the offense of keeping and conducting, in no-license territory, a place where alcoholic liquor was sold and distributed, and keeping and conducting, in no-license territory, a place where alcoholic liquors were kept for the purpose of sale and distribution. He was thereupon duly tried and convicted of the offense charged in the indictment. Defendant moved for a new trial, which motion was denied, and he was thereupon sentenced to pay a fine of $500, and to six months' imprisonment in the county jail. Defendant prosecutes this appeal from the order and the judgment.

The several points urged by appellant for reversal are as follows: (1) That the court erred in refusing to grant defendant's motion for a change of venue; (2) that the court committed prejudicial error, in that it made certain statements which improperly affected the verdict of the jury; (3) that it was error to admit evidence of sales of liquor on dates immediately prior to that charged in the indictment; and (4) that the verdict was not supported by the evidence.

[1] As to the point that the court erred in refusing to grant defendant's motion for a change of venue made on the ground that a fair and impartial trial could not be had in the county, it need only be said that defendant failed to properly raise that point. Section 1034 of the Penal Code requires that the application for change of venue be in writing. See, also, People v. McGarvey, 56 Cal. 327. The motion of the defendant here was made orally.

[2] In addition, the affidavit of defendant in support of his motion is insufficient. It merely states:

> "That said affiant firmly believes and in fact knows that it is impossible for him to secure a fair and impartial trial at the hands of a jury drawn from this particular community."

But it is settled that:

> "Affidavits for such a motion must state the facts and circumstances from which the conclusion is deduced that a fair and impartial trial cannot be had. The conclusion is to be drawn by the court and not by the defendant and his witnesses, and the court must be satisfied from the facts and circumstances positively sworn to in the affidavits, and not from the general conclusions to which the defendant may swear, or which his witnesses may depose that they firmly believe to be true." People v. McCauley, 1 Cal. 379.

[3] Upon witness Baroni testifying on cross-examination that a peddler had warned defendant that the sheriff was in town, the following took place:

> "Q. Do you know what the object was? Do you know what the peddler meant when he said to Nolan, 'Look out; the sheriff is in town'?
> "Mr. McCowen: Object to that as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and the thing speaks for itself.
> "Court: Well, I think it speaks for itself. I think it carries its own meaning with it pretty conclusively."

It is claimed that the utterance of the court improperly influenced the verdict of the jury. While we cannot too forcefully urge trial courts to exercise great care in making such statements in the jury's presence, we are not satisfied that defendant was prejudiced here. It is apparent that the court was addressing its remarks to the attorneys and not to the jury. And any possible prejudice that might have resulted must have been dispelled by the peddler and defendant himself, who both testified that the words of warning were made merely in a jocular manner and as a joke on Nolan. We cannot say that there is anything in the words which would impress the jury that the court was of the opinion that they ought to convict upon the evidence.

[4] The objections that the court erred in admitting evidence of sales of liquor made April 15th, 16th and 17th, and that the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict, may be briefly disposed of. The indictment charges that the defendant did "willfully and unlawfully keep and conduct" a place where alcoholic liquor was sold, served, and distributed on April 18, 1916. As bearing upon this issue the evidence of prior sales, not too remote, was competent. People v. Cavallini, 29 Cal. App. 526, 156 Pac. 73.

[5] And there is sufficient evidence in the record to support the verdict. Witness Baroni testified positively to having purchased beer from the defendant on several different occasions. The foregoing shows the inconsequence of appellant's contention that crtain gifts of liquor were made to guests, and, therefore, not to be considered as evidence of guilt. As before stated, there was a sufficient showing of sales to make out the case charged in the indictment. The circumstance as to said donations might therefore be eliminated from consideration. However, as to this there was room for a rational conclusion that the parties were not guests, and hence within the inhibition of the Wylie law, and if the verdict was in any manner based upon such theory it finds support in the record. Nor is there any weight in the contention that it was not proved that Mendocino City was in no-license territory on April 18, 1916, the date of the offense charged. At the close of the case the following proceedings took place:

> "Mr. McCowen: Will you stipulate the required proof as to the territory and as to the liquor?
> "Mr. Hurley: We will stipulate that.
> "Mr. McCowen: It is stipulated that Mendocino City is in the Fourth supervisor district of Mendocino county, that the Fourth supervisor district is no-license territory, and that Mendocino is not an incorporated town, and it is also stipulated that the liquor introduced in evidence here is alcoholic liquor as defined by the Wylie Local Option Law."

[6] There can be no doubt that the above referred to the date charged in the indictment, and was offered in support of the allegation in the indictment that Mendocino City was "then and there" (April 18, 1916) no-license territory. It cannot reasonably be supposed that the prosecuting attorney would offer proof as to no-license territory as of the date of the trial in support of an allegation referring to a date six months previous. People v. Nolan, 165 Pac. 715.

PEOPLE v. MOONEY. (Cr. 2079.)

1. Criminal Law 🔑1139—Appeal—Matter not Shown by the Record.

Under Const. art. 6, § 4, limiting the Supreme Court's jurisdiction on appeal from the superior courts to questions of law alone, where judgment of death has been rendered, evidence discovered after appeal by the defendant from a conviction of murder cannot be considered by the Supreme Court.

2. Criminal Law 🔑1139 — Reversal — Effect of Error—"Entire Cause."

Const. art. 6, § 4½, providing that the Supreme Court may not set aside a judgment or grant a new trial for any error of law, "unless, after an examination of the entire cause, * * * the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice," further limits the power of the Supreme Court; the words "entire cause" meaning only the cause as presented by the record.

3. Criminal Law 🔑1139—Appeal—Review—Scope—Stipulations.

Stipulations of the Attorney General with one appealing from a conviction of murder do not give this court authority to consider evidence discovered after the appeal, or any matter outside the record.

In Bank. Thomas J. Mooney was convicted of murder, and he appeals. Pending appeal, defendant moves that the judgment and order be reversed on stipulation of the Attorney General. Motion denied.

See, also, 166 Pac. 999.

Maxwell McNutt and John G. Lawlor, both of San Francisco, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and C. M. Fickert, Dist. Atty., of San Francisco, for the People.

PER CURIAM. The defendant was convicted in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco of the crime of murder, and the superior court, having denied his motion for a new trial, pronounced judgment. An appeal from such judgment and order denying a new trial was regularly taken to this court, and is now pending herein; the record on appeal having been duly made up in the superior court and filed in this court. In advance of the hearing of the appeal on the merits, the defendant has made a motion that the judgment and order be reversed, solely on the ground that the Attorney General of the state has filed in this court a stipulation and consent that, for reasons stated therein, such action should be had by this court, and that defendant joins in said stipulation.

The sole reason for this action on the part of the Attorney General, as is shown by the writing filed herein by him, is that, since the motion for new trial was denied, the judgment pronounced, and the appeal taken, certain evidence has been discovered which leads him and the judge of the trial court to believe that, in the interests of justice, a new trial should be had. None of this evidence is shown by the record on appeal, and could not be shown thereby. The Attorney General does not suggest that there was any substantial error in the proceedings of the trial court. In fact, he states that, in so far as he has examined the record, he finds no substantial error, and therefore cannot confess error. The motion must be determined on the theory that there is no error shown by the record. The motion necessarily assumes that this court has the lawful right to reverse a judgment pronounced upon the conviction in a criminal case, on account of matters not shown by the record on appeal, and in the absence of any error in law in the proceedings of the trial court, especially when the attorney general of the state consents that such action be had. The motion is opposed by the district attorney of the city and county of San Francisco.

[1] We are satisfied that the application and consent mistake the lawful power and functions of appellate courts of this state in criminal cases. By express provision of our Constitution, the jurisdiction of both the Supreme Court and the District Courts of Appeal in criminal cases is specially limited. As to the Supreme Court, "appellate jurisdiction on appeal from the superior courts" is given "on questions of law alone, in all criminal cases where judgment of death has been rendered." Const. § 4, art. 6. This is our only jurisdiction. The provision means that an appeal in such cases is allowed solely for the purpose of obtaining the determination of this court as to whether there has been any error of law in the proceedings of the trial court. We have no other questions to determine, and may lawfully determine no other question. If we find no substantial error of law, we must affirm the judgment of the lower court. It is clear, too, that in the consideration of such an appeal, for this limited purpose, we are confined to the record sent to us from the court below. This was very clearly stated by this court in the first decision of the case of People v. Bowers, 18 Pac. 660, where it was sought to have this court take into consideration what purported to be the written confession of another that he was the guilty party, made after the taking of the appeal. The court said that, if the events occurred as stated in the brief of the appellant's counsel, the facts would entitle the defendant to a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence, if presented in time to the court below, but that they were not so presented, and could not be so presented, because they occurred pending appeal. Because it so clearly states what is obviously the law on this subject, we quote from the opinion:

> "While it is admitted by counsel for appellant that ordinarily no argument could be made here upon facts occurring after appeal taken, it is urged that the evidence which has been discovered in this case 'is of so grave a character, and points so strongly to the innocence of this defendant, that, however informally it may have come to the attention of the court, this or any other court of competent jurisdiction should say that he shall not be executed until it shall have been submitted, in common with other evidence in the case, to a jury of his country." But, manifestly, the court has no authority to consider these matters as thus presented. There are no part of the record sent to us from the court below, and there is no provision of law by which newly discovered evidence may be presented to this court in the first instance. The remedy in such cases rests with the executive. He alone can afford relief."

The judgment was affirmed on a consideration of the matters presented by the record on appeal. While a rehearing was granted and the judgment was subsequently reversed, the reversal was solely on account of matters shown by the record on appeal (People v. Bowers, 79 Cal. 415, 21 Pac. 752), and clearly the correctness of the views expressed in the portion of the first opinion that we have quoted above was never doubted, and could not reasonably be doubted.

[2] It is to be noted that, by the enactment of section 4½ of article 6 of our Constitution in the year 1911, our power to interfere with the judgment of a superior court in a criminal case was still further limited; the provision being substantially that we may not set aside such a judgment or grant a new trial for any error of law, "unless, after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice." The words "an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence," contained in said provision, mean of course an examination of the cause as the same is presented by the record on appeal made up in the lower court.

[3] As we understand the claim of counsel for defendant, special reliance is placed on the fact that the Attorney General of the state has stipulated and consented that the desired action be had by this court. As to this it is necessary only to say that the Attorney General cannot, by stipulation or consent, confer upon this court a power denied to it by the Constitution of the state. The power to set aside or modify a judgment in a criminal case, except for legal grounds appearing on a record duly presented, is not judicial. It is a branch of the pardoning power, committed to the Governor of the state by article 7 of the Constitution, and cannot be exercised by the Attorney General, either directly or through the medium of this court.

We have not considered the reasons stated by the Attorney General for his conclusion that a new trial should be had, and are not to be understood as expressing any opinion as to their sufficiency. That, as we have endeavored to show, is a matter not within our province.

The motion is denied.

SILVER LAKE POWER & IRRIGATION CO. v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES et al. (Sac. 2332.)

WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⟹18—WATER RIGHTS — ACQUISITION — WITHDRAWAL — GRANTS DURING WITHDRAWAL.

Under Rev. St. U. S. § 2339 (U. S. Comp. St. 1916, § 4647), providing that whenever, by priority of possession, rights to use of water have vested and accrued and are recognized by the local customs, laws, and decisions of courts, the possessors and owners of such vested rights shall be maintained and protected in the same, and the right of way for the construction of ditches and canals for the purposes herein specified is acknowledged and confirmed, a locator for water rights acquires no title against the United States till the work is completed; so that before that time, the lands affected being temporarily withdrawn by executive order of the Secretary of the Interior, and Congress having before the vacation of the orders of withdrawal granted the lands and rights to a city, all rights thereto of the appropriator were lost.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Mono County; J. D. Murphy, Judge.

Action by the Silver Lake Power & Irrigation Company against the City of Los Angeles and others. From an adverse judgment and order, defendants appeal. Reversed.

See, also, 32 Cal. App. 123, 162 Pac. 432.

Albert Lee Stephens, City Atty., and W. B. Mathews, both of Los Angeles, Richard S. Miner, and S. B. Robinson, of Los Angeles, for appellants. John R. Dixon, of Denver, Colo., and Newman Jones, of Riverside, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Respondent's predecessors in interest first conceived the plan of utilizing the waters of Owens river and of Rock creek, one of its tributaries, for irrigation and for the development of hydroelectric energy. They made locations upon the river and creek for these purposes. They began their work under these locations, and they prosecuted this work until it was interrupted and suspended by withdrawal orders of the government of the United States. Under the compulsion of these withdrawal orders the predecessors in interest of respondent ceased work. These withdrawal orders were temporary in character and made in conformity with the law, in contemplation that the United States government might itself impound these waters and devote them to purposes of irrigation for the benefit of the valley lands lying under them. This contemplated reclamation scheme of the federal government was abandoned. Before the formal order of abandonment was actually made it became apparent that the government would not proceed with its plan, and respondent's predecessors in interest resumed work. The work which they did before the withdrawal of these lands by the government was performed at least two years before the city of Los Angeles ever contemplated using the water of Owens river or of its tributary, Rock creek, for any purpose whatsoever. During the period of time when the lands lay under the orders of withdrawal, Congress passed a certain act, giving the city of Los Angeles, upon conditions, a preferential right to purchase some of the withdrawn lands. The orders of withdrawal, to which reference has been made, were, first, the order of July 24 and 27, 1903, under which all of the lands on which the notices of appropriation by respondent's predecessors in interest had been posted were temporarily withdrawn, together with large tracts of land for use as a reservoir site in connection with the contemplated government project. On August 24 and 25, 1903, all the lands upon which it was proposed by respondent's predecessors in interest to put the water for agricultural purposes were temporarily withdrawn from all forms of entry except homesteads. On January 1, 1905, all lands in the Owens river gorge, which lands lie below the proposed reservoir site, were likewise withdrawn for use in connection with the government project. These orders of withdrawal were formally vacated on July 12, 1907.

Before June 30, 1906, but long after the initiation by posting and recording of the rights of plaintiff's predecessors in interest, and long after their first work under those rights had actually been prosecuted, the city of Los Angeles conceived the idea of devoting to its own uses for municipal purposes the waters of Owens river. On the last-mentioned date, and during the period of the operation of the orders of withdrawal above referred to, Congress passed an act (Act Cong. June 30, 1906, c. 3926, 34 U. S. Stats. at Large, p. 801), granting to the city of Los Angeles necessary rights of way over the public lands in certain named counties "for the purpose of constructing, operating and maintaining canals," etc.; in short, for all legitimate purposes in connection with the proposed conduct of the water of Owens river to the city of Los Angeles, and for the additional purpose of maintaining power and electric plants. This grant was to take effect "whenever said city shall have filed, as hereinafter provided, and the same shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Interior, a map or maps showing the boundaries, locations, and extent of said proposed rights of way." Section 1. It was required that the city should file such maps within one year after the passage of the act, and should do no work until the maps had been filed and approved. The rights of way thus tendered by grant were declared not to be effective "over any land upon which homestead, mining, or other existing valid claims shall have been filed, or made until the city of Los Angeles shall have * * * acquired title" thereto and made just compensation therefor. Still further and with particularity it was declared that the act should not "affect the adjudication of any pending applications for rights of way by the owner or owners of existing water rights, and that no private right, title, interest, or claim of any person, persons, or corporation, in or to any of the lands traversed by or embraced in said right of way shall be interfered with or abridged." Section 3. Also the act declared:

> "That in the event that the Secretary of the Interior shall abandon the project known as the Owens river project for the irrigation of lands in Inyo county, California, under the act of June seventeenth, nineteen hundred and two, the city of Los Angeles, in said state, is to pay to the Secretary of the Interior, for the account of the reclamation fund established by said act, the amount expended for preliminary surveys, examinations, and river measurements, not exceeding fourteen thousand dollars, and in consideration of said payment the said city of Los Angeles is to have the benefit of the use of the maps and field notes resulting from said surveys, examinations, and river measurements, and the preference right to acquire at any time within three years from the approval of this act any lands now reserved by the United States under the terms of said reclamation act in connection with said project, necessary for storage or right of way purposes, upon filing with the register and receiver of the land office in the land district where any such lands sought to be acquired are situated a map showing the lands desired to be acquired, and upon the approval of said map or maps by the Secretary of the Interior and upon the payment of one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre to the receiver of said land office title to said land so reserved and filed on shall vest in said city of Los Angeles." Section 4.

It was the language of this act, with other circumstances not necessary to particularize, which conveyed the knowledge that the government would abandon its proposed reclamation project. Thereupon respondent's predecessors in interest in June, 1906, resumed work under their notices and continued this work (interrupted only by the snows of winter) until shortly after the commencement of this action on July 15, 1907. At that time there was in the Codes of this state a section (Civ. Code, § 1416) providing in effect that where litigation becomes necessary under such enterprises as this to acquire land or rights "then the party so appropriating, or his assigns, shall have sixty days after the determination of legal proceedings by final judgment in which to commence to excavate or construct the works in which he intends to divert the water." Respondent and its representatives ceased work under the guaranty of protection extended by this law. Its provisions in this regard, however, were repealed, at least by implication, by section 4 of the Water Power Act of April 8, 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 813). Following the passage of this act, on or about August 1, 1911, respondent resumed work and continued this work until the date of the trial of this action. This latter work was in part actual construction work and in part was surveying.

In the action which it brought, this respondent set up its asserted rights to the waters of these streams for the purpose of irrigation as well as for the purpose of developing hydroelectric energy. In this another corporation was interested. There resulted a tripartite agreement between these appellants and respondent and the third corporation, under which the asserted right to the use of the water for purposes of irrigation was abandoned and those rights conveyed to the city of Los Angeles, leaving in issue the question whose was the right to use these waters for the generation of electricity. With the litigation thus restricted trial was had before a jury, to which 12 special questions were submitted. One and all the jury's answers favored plaintiff's contentions. The court adopted them and incorporated them into the findings which it made. Upon these findings and the legal conclusions drawn therefrom it gave judgment for plaintiff, and the defendants have appealed from that judgment and from the order denying their motion for a new trial.

This statement, incomplete in itself, is designed only as an aid to an understanding of the single question necessary to be considered on this appeal. That question may be thus stated: What effect upon the original appropriators' rights was worked by the executive orders of withdrawal and the act of Congress operating with the laws of this state?

As its answer necessitates the construction of federal laws, the interpretation which the United States has put upon those laws is of all-controlling force. The federal law under which the original locators were admittedly acting is that found in section 2339 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, approved July 26, 1866 (U. S. Comp. St. 1916, § 4647). Notwithstanding its familiarity, it may be well to quote it in part:

> "Whenever, by priority of possession, rights to the use of water for mining, agricultural, manufacturing or other purposes have vested and accrued and the same are recognized and acknowledged by the local customs, laws and the decisions of courts, the possessors and owners of such vested rights shall be maintained and protected in the same; and the right of way for the construction of ditches and canals for the purposes herein specified is acknowledged and confirmed."

It is to be noted that the "rights" which are dealt with are, first, rights which have "vested and accrued," and, second, rights which are recognized as such "by the local customs, laws, and the decisions of courts." Conceding that the work done up to the time of the suspension of it under the withdrawal orders was sufficient to fulfill the requirements of our state law (Civ. Code, §§ 1415, 1416), it is undisputed that this work was not completed. The first legal question, then, is what is the nature of the rights which the original locators had acquired up to and at the time of the enforced suspension of work under the withdrawal orders? Our cases fully answer this question. As against all the world but the United States there was acquired a possessory right to continue with diligence the prosecution of the work until completion. "Such visible act (of possession accompanied by work) and avowed intent (to prosecute the work adequately and diligently) gave him a conditional right to the future use of the water, prior to its actual use, the condition being that he should thereafter diligently continue the work to completion and then divert the water and apply it to a useful purpose, failing which his right would cease. Upon the performance of this condition, his title to such use would become complete and perfect. In the meantime, however, he had an existing conditional right, manifested by actual visible possession of the works. It would be clearly a property right, and it being incidental and appurtenant to land, it was real property. Civ. Code, § 658." Inyo Cons. Water Co. v. Jess, 161 Cal. 516, 119 Pac. 934. To precisely the same import is the later case of Merritt v. City of Los Angeles, 162 Cal. 47, 120 Pac. 1064. In both of these cases this court was discussing the attempted interference with one who was or claimed to be in possession of the public domain under notices of appropriation, and who was or claimed to be in diligent prosecution of the work as against the hostile claim and interference of a private third person. That the law thus declared by these decisions is unimpeachable in point of soundness may not, we think, be successfully questioned. The property right is not dissimilar to that which this court declares belongs to the locator of oil lands, in peaceable and in diligent prosecution of work seeking a discovery of oil, before the discovery is actually made. Such a locator, we have held, has a possessory right which is property, and which he can maintain in the courts against trespassers or hostile private claimants. Miller v. Chrisman, 140 Cal. 440, 73 Pac. 1083, 74 Pac. 444, 98 Am. St. Rep. 63; Weed v. Snook, 144 Cal. 439, 77 Pac. 1023. But none of these cases considered, for their exigencies did not call upon them to consider, the character of the rights thus obtained as against the paramount authority, the government of the United States. But we are not without positive pronouncement from the Supreme Court of the United States upon this precise question. In Bear Lake Irrigation Co. v. Garland, 164 U. S. 1, 17 Sup. Ct. 7, 41 L. Ed. 327, the section from which we have quoted came before the court and received careful analysis. From the opinion of that case we quote at length, as follows:

> "So far as the public land is concerned, over or through which these ditches for the canal were dug, the statutes above cited create no title, legal or equitable, in the individual or company that simply takes possession of such land. The government enacts that any one may go upon its public lands for the purpose of procuring water, digging ditches for canals, etc., and when rights have become vested and accrued which are recognized and acknowledged by the local customs, laws, and decisions of courts, such rights are acknowledged and confirmed. Under this statute no right or title to the land, or to a right of way over or through it, or to the use of water from a well thereafter to be dug, vests, as against the government, in the party entering upon possession from the mere fact of such possession, unaccompanied by the performance of any labor thereon. Undoubtedly rights as against third persons are acquired by priority of possession, and the government will and does recognize such rights as between those parties. This is the principle running through the cases cited by the counsel for appellants. In Sullivan v. Northern Spy Mining Co., 11 Utah, 438, 40 Pac. 709, 30 L. R. A. 186, which is one of those cases, the priority of possession of the person who entered upon the public land and dug the well was recognized as thereby making a superior title to the use of the water from the well over that acquired by a person who was the subsequent purchaser of the land from the government. In that case the well had been dug and the condition fulfilled. If no well had ever been dug, and a reasonable time for digging it had passed, the mere priority of possession would have given no superior title to the land over that acquired by the grantee from the government. It is the doing of the work, the completion of the well, or the digging of the ditch, within a reasonable time from the taking possession, that gives the right to use the water in the well or the right of way for the ditches of the canal upon or through the public land. Until the completion of this work, or, in other words, until the performance of the condition upon which the right to forever maintain possession is based, the person taking possession has no title, legal or equitable, as against the government. What, if any, equitable claims a party might have upon the government who did a large amount of work, but finally failed to complete the necessary amount to secure the water or right of way, it is not necessary to determine or discuss. Those equities would not, in any event, amount to an equitable title to the right of way or to the use of the water, and so need not be here considered."

In United States v. Rickey Land & Cattle Co. (C. C.) 164 Fed. 496, Rickey had taken appropriate steps to secure a reservoir site on the public domain, had purchased works of considerable value for the purpose of diverting waters into the reservoir site and was actually engaged in the construction of a tunnel to lead the waters from the reservoir for useful distribution, when the lands affected by his work were temporarily withdrawn, as here, by the Secretary of the Interior for reservoir purposes. Rickey proceeded with the work under the contention that against the United States government he had acquired the vested right so to do. The government sought injunction under its bill, setting forth the facts, and the defendant, successor in interest to Rickey, demurred. The demurrer was overruled, the Circuit Court in so doing and in discussing the question saying:

> "It is very clear that no one can under these sections acquire as against the government a vested easement in and to public lands for a reservoir site until the actual completion of the reservoir, so that the waters to be impounded therein could be applied to the beneficial uses contemplated by the irrigation system of which it forms a part. This was the construction placed upon these sections by the Supreme Court in Bear Lake Irrigation Co. v. Garland, 164 U. S. 1, 18, 19, 17 Sup. Ct. 7, 12, 41 L. Ed. 327."

There can be no argument so sharp as to whittle down the obvious and controlling meaning of the language of these decisions which we have quoted. That language imports this, and nothing but this, that until the completion of the work no title, legal or equitable, vests in the appropriator, no right vests which the government of the United States is compelled to recognize. The property rights which do accrue are such as to protect the appropriator from the acts of all persons saving the paramount authority. So far as the United States itself is concerned, it is under no justiciable duty in law or equity to such an appropriator until his work shall have been completed. Before completion what may the United States do? It may do as in the case of oil lands it has done, by withdrawals arrest all work before discovery, without compensation to the locator for his expenditures. U. S. v. Mid West Oil Co., 236 U. S. 459, 35 Sup. Ct. 309, 59 L. Ed. 673. Congress, it is to be remembered, under the Constitution of the United States, has the sole power of disposition and control of the public lands. Const. U. S. art. 4, § 3, subd. 2. In contemplation of this power, the respondent's argument that the orders of withdrawal in this case were temporary orders, that they operated only to suspend and not to destroy the rights of the original locators, and that those rights were revived in all their fullness upon the formal vacation of the orders of withdrawal loses all force in view of the congressional exercise of the power to which we have adverted. Congress, had it chosen to do so, without any order of withdrawal having been made by the executive department, could have granted the lands and rights to the city of Los Angeles, as in fact it did, during the existence of the orders of withdrawal. It may be conceded that to have done so would have been a harsh exercise of the power, but this concession can have no effect upon the legality of the exercise. So here the legal situation presented is, and this statement of it is made in the light most favorable to respondent, that before respondent's predecessors in interest had acquired any vested right in the matter against the United States, Congress, in the exercise of its supreme authority, made conveyance to the city of Los Angeles of the lands and of the waters in connection therewith for all the purposes for which they were designed to be used by the original appropriators. It must be held that these appropriators and all others upon the public domain act with the knowledge and under the peril to their ventures that this may be done. The property rights which they acquire while working and before those rights have become vested as against the government of the United States, are held, as it were, upon condition subsequent, in that they are liable to extinguishment at any time by an act of Congress directed to that end.

This conclusion, without regard to any other questions presented, is determinative of this case, and the judgment and order appealed from are therefore reversed.

BARCLAY et al. v. SUPREME LODGE OF FRATERNAL BROTHERHOOD.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Aug. 14, 1917. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court, Oct. 11, 1917.)

1. Venue 🔑61—Motion for Change—Time—Affidavit of Merits—Statute.

Where defendant's motion for change of venue was made and granted pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. § 397, subd. 3, providing that a change of venue may be had when the convenience of witnesses and the cause of justice will be promoted thereby, the motion, accompanied by an affidavit of merits, was not required to be filed when defendant filed its answer, though section 396 requires that a demand for change of venue, based on the ground that the action was not commenced in the proper county, must be made, accompanied with an affidavit of merits, when defendant demurs or answers; the motion could be rightfully made within a reasonable time after the case was at issue upon the facts.

2. Venue 🔑65—Motion for Change—Affidavit of Merits—Statute.

An affidavit of merits is not essential to an application for change of venue grounded upon the convenience of witnesses pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. § 397, subd. 3.

3. Venue 🔑61—Application for Change—Delay.

Though applications for change of venue are generally classed as dilatory moves which should be presented and prosecuted with diligence to secure favorable consideration, the mere fact that motion for change was not made until nearly a year after issue was joined on the facts did not of itself deprive the court of power to grant the motion; despite the delay, it was the court's duty to determine the good faith of the motion, and then to ascertain whether or not the delay complained of was oppressive, and likely to result in detriment to the adverse party.

4. Venue 🔑52(1)—Change—Discretion of Court.

In an action wherein plaintiffs, as beneficiaries of a fraternal insurance order, sought to enjoin the collection of assessments levied under an alleged illegal by-law, defendant moved, for convenience of witnesses, to change place of trial from the county of San Francisco to the county of Los Angeles, and offered an affidavit that the home office of defendant was in Los Angeles; that all defendant's records were kept in the office in Los Angeles; that many of the records contained matters necessary as evidence in establishing defendant's defense; and that it was impossible to ascertain in advance of trial just what particular books, etc., might be needed. The counter affidavits relied on by plaintiff to show that the convenience of witnesses would be promoted by trial in San Francisco related only to the production of evidence on matters admitted by defendant. Held, that the order granting defendant's motion for change of venue was a proper exercise of the court's discretion.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by R. S. Barclay and others against the Supreme Lodge of the Fraternal Brotherhood, a corporation. From an order changing the place of trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

W. C. Cavitt, of San Francisco, for appellants. Davis, Kemp & Post and Carlos S. Hardy, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LENNON, P. J. This is an appeal from an order changing the place of trial from the city and county of San Francisco to the county of Los Angeles, grounded solely upon the convenience of the witnesses in an action wherein the plaintiffs, as beneficiary members of the corporation defendant, sought a decree enjoining the collection of certain assessments, which were levied against the plaintiffs and other members of the defendant, pursuant to an amended by-law revising and raising the rate of assessment which the plaintiffs and other members were originally subjected to, and which the plaintiffs alleged was illegally adopted by the defendant and without the consent of the plaintiffs.

The defendant by its answer admitted the adoption of the by-law in question and the attempted enforcement of the new rate of assessment, but defended the action by averring that the contracts of insurance issued to and held by the plaintiffs expressly provided that they were made and held subject, not only to the by-law in force at the time of their execution, but also to any amendments thereto, which from time to time might be adopted by the defendant; that the plaintiffs, through their authorized representatives elected to the Supreme Lodge of the defendant, consented to the adoption of the by-law in question; that an actuarial examination of the defendant society revealed the fact that the rate of assessment originally fixed by the by-laws did not provide a fund sufficient to pay the benefits promised plaintiffs; that the new rate fixed by the amended by-law was necessary to cover a deficiency existing in the insurance fund of the defendant, which resulted because of the insufficiency of the original rate of assessment; that the statutes of the state relating to the regulation and control of fraternal societies (Stats. 1911, p. 1320) provided and required that every fraternal benefit society doing business in the state, the valuation of whose certificate made December 31, 1917, shows that the present value of the future net contributions together with the admitted net assets was less than 90 per cent. of the present value of the promised benefits and accrued liabilities, would be required to reduce such deficiency not less than 5 per cent. of the total deficiency on December 31, 1917, at each succeeding triennial valuation, and that under the rate collected prior to the raise of rates by the defendant, pursuant to the amended by-law in question, such a deficiency did exist, and that the improvements therein required by this law could not be made except by an increase of the original rates.

The action was instituted in the court below February 15, 1913. The defendant's answer was filed July 10, 1913, and the plaintiffs' demurrer thereto was disallowed January 3, 1914. On January 27, 1915, plaintiffs gave notice of a motion to set the cause for trial, and on January 30, 1915, defendant filed its notice of motion to change the place of trial, grounded upon the convenience of the witnesses and the promotion of the ends of justice.

[1] The motion for a change of venue was made and granted pursuant to the provisions of subdivision 3 of section 397 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and consequently the motion accompanied by an affidavit of merits was not required to be filed at the time the defendant filed its answer.

The Code section under consideration provides that the court may on motion change the place of trial of an action for any one of several enumerated causes, and while it is true that section 396 of the same Code requires that a demand for a change of venue based upon the ground that the action was not commenced in the proper county must be made accompanied with an affidavit of merits at the time the defendant demurs or answers, nevertheless this section must be read in conjunction with section 397. Bohn v. Bohn, 164 Cal. 532, 129 Pac. 981. Manifestly the provisions of subdivision 1 of the latter section to the effect that a change of the place of a trial may be had upon a showing that the county designated in the complaint is not the proper county for the trial are entirely separate and distinct from subdivision 3 of the same section (section 397, Code Civ. Proc.), which provides that a change of the place of trial may be had when the convenience of witnesses and the cause of justice will be thereby promoted. In other words, granting that the action was commenced in the proper county, nevertheless the defendant was entitled to a change of venue upon the ground of the convenience of witnesses, etc., and in the absence of any statutory limitation of the time within which the motion may be made upon that ground, it could be rightfully made within a reasonable time after the case was at issue upon the facts. Cook v. Pendergast, 61 Cal. 72, 78.

[2] The affidavit of merits filed upon behalf of the defendant in support of the motion is in the usual form, and apparently meets all of the requirements of the rule relating to such affidavits, but even if it were deficient in the particulars claimed by counsel for the plaintiffs, it would not follow that the motion was improperly granted, because an affidavit of merits is not essential to an application for a change of venue, grounded upon the convenience of witnesses. Cook v. Pendergast, supra; Pascoe v. Baker, 158 Cal. 232, 110 Pac. 815.

[3] While it is true that applications for a change of venue are generally classed and considered as dilatory moves, and therefore should be presented, and prosecuted with diligence in order to secure favorable consideration, nevertheless the mere fact that the motion in the present case was not made until nearly a year after issue was joined on the facts did not, in and of itself, operate to deprive the court of the power to pass upon and grant the motion. Despite such delay, it was the duty of the court to determine from all of the attending facts and circumstances the bona fides of the motion, and then to ascertain whether or not the delay complained of was oppressive, and did, or would be likely to, result in detriment to the plaintiffs. Doubtless in determining these questions the court below considered the fact that the plaintiffs had delayed for nearly a year before moving to set the cause for trial.

The determination of these questions necessarily rested in the sound discretion of the court below, and while it may be conceded that the motion for a change of venue might have been properly denied upon the ground of undue delay in presenting it, still we are not prepared to say that, under all of the circumstances, the order granting it was an abuse of discretion.

[4] Upon the hearing of the motion, and in support thereof, there was offered and received in evidence the affidavit of C. A. Post, the supreme counselor of the defendant, to the effect that the home office and principal place of business of the defendant was at all times in the city of Los Angeles; that all the books, papers, and records of the defendant were kept at the office of the supreme secretary at the home office in Los Angeles; that many of said books, etc., contain matters and things (detailing them) material and necessary as evidence in the establishment of the defendant's defense to the action; that on account of many matters and things which may be developed in evidence during the course of the trial it was impossible to ascertain in advance of the trial just what particular books, records, etc., may be needed as evidence, and therefore it was desirable and necessary in order that the trial be facilitated and the ends of justice promoted that the trial be held in the county of the defendant's principal place of business, where its books, records, etc., would be readily accessible.

The affidavit referred to further deposed that in conjunction with an inspection and consideration of the defendant's books, records, etc., the testimony of its supreme president, secretary, chief clerk and head bookkeeper concerning certain designated and material matters would be required to establish the defense interposed, and that each of the officials named reside in the county of Los Angeles.

The fact that the affidavit in question referred to all of the books, records, and papers of the defendant is a sufficient answer to the contention that it did not allege that the original books, records, etc., of the defendant were at and kept in the city of Los Angeles; and manifestly the counter affidavit of one Rae Plummer made upon behalf of the plaintiffs, wherein she averred that she kept in the city of San Francisco certain original books of entry of the local subordinate lodge known as San Francisco Lodge, No. 69, had no tendency to show that the original books, records, etc., of the Supreme Lodge of the defendant were kept elsewhere than in Los Angeles, as alleged in the defendant's affidavit.

The Plummer and other counter affidavits, relied upon by the plaintiffs to show that the convenience of witnesses would be promoted by a trial of the case in the city of San Francisco, relate only to the production of evidence which would have been limited to showing the plaintiffs' good standing in the local lodge, but inasmuch as that fact was admitted to be true, either in the answer of defendant or by stipulation filed in open court, the plaintiffs obviously would not have been put to the necessity of producing witnesses upon that phase of the case. In fact, every material allegation of the plaintiffs' complaint, save the alleged illegality of the adoption of the by-law in question, was likewise, in effect, admitted. Therefore only the evidence and witnesses designated in the affidavit of the defendant would be required upon the trial of the case, and as that evidence and those witnesses were permanently located in Los Angeles, we have no doubt but that the order granting the motion was a proper exercise of discretion.

We are unable to discover any material or circumstantial conflict in the entire evidence adduced upon the hearing of the motion, but even if such a conflict existed, as counsel for plaintiffs seem to contend, we would not interfere with the order of the court in the absence of a showing of an abuse of discretion.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. CHARLIE. (Cr. 405.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 6, 1917.)

1. Criminal Law 🔑1159(3)—Appeal—Verdict on Conflicting Evidence.

On appeal in a criminal case, where a pronounced conflict in the evidence existed, the verdict of the jury is conclusive.

2. Criminal Law 🔑1037(1)—Appeal—Reservation of Grounds of Review—Objection to Remarks of Counsel.

Where objection to remarks of the district attorney, of such character that any damaging effect on defendant's rights might have been obviated by timely and proper instruction to the jury that they were not at liberty to consider such remarks, was not taken by defendant at trial, and their impropriety, when the remarks were made, was not called to the attention of the trial court, the appellate court cannot inquire into the merits of the objection made to the remarks.

3. Criminal Law 🔑1171(6)—Argument of District Attorney.

In prosecution of an Indian for assault with a deadly weapon, where the district attorney declared in argument that the Indians in Modoc county were bright people, and that if the jury were to acquit they would believe that they could repeat the same kind of conduct with impunity, his further remarks that the Indians were a little bit shrewder than was thought, and that it was habitual with them to claim that their boys were over 21, the children themselves doing so in order to avoid going to the Indian school, were not so far afield as to have seriously prejudiced defendant's rights.

4. Assault and Battery 🔑96(8)—Trial — Instruction.

In a prosecution for assault with a deadly weapon under information alleging the assault was willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously committed, an instruction that, if the jury believed that defendant, "as charged in the information," committed an assault, etc., they should find defendant guilty, was not improper as obligating the jury to find defendant guilty irrespective of his defense of self-defense.

5. Criminal Law 🔑823(6)—Appeal—Harmless Error—Instruction.

In a prosecution for assault with a deadly weapon, though an instruction on self-defense was awkwardly phrased, and did not accurately state the law according to Pen. Code, § 198, where the court elsewhere submitted a full and complete statement of the law of self-defense, the error in the charge was harmless to defendant.

6. Criminal Law 🔑823(6)—Appeal—Harmless Error—Instructions.

In such prosecution, where the court correctly charged on the subject of self-defense, the error in instructing that, if defendant sought a quarrel with the assaulted party with a deadly weapon, the jury should find defendant guilty, whether or not the assaulted party attempted to assault defendant with a deadly weapon in the quarrel, was harmless to defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Modoc County; Clarence A. Raker, Judge.

Robert Charlie was convicted of assault with a deadly weapon, and he appeals. Affirmed.

J. T. Sharp, of Alturas, and J. Sidney Henderson, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. The information in this case charges that the defendant, on the 18th day of March, 1917, in the county of Modoc, committed upon the person of one West Steele an assault with a deadly weapon. The jury found the defendant guilty of the assault as so charged, and he appeals to this court from the judgment of conviction.

Both the defendant and the prosecuting witness, West Steele, are Indians. It appears that the defendant claimed an indebtedness due him from Steele in the sum of $2, the former claiming that the latter, prior to the date of the trouble resulting in the assault, had borrowed that amount from him. On the day of the assault the defendant had intended going to the town of Likely, in Modoc county, but, before starting to said town, and accompanied by two or three other Indians, he called at the home of West Steele, a short distance from Alturas, for the purpose of collecting the money he claimed Steele owed him. On entering the house, the defendant asked Steele for the money, whereupon the latter declared that he owed the defendant nothing. An altercation followed, resulting in a fist fight, the defendant being the aggressor in the assault, having struck the first blow. After for a brief time fighting in the house, during the progress of which an old Indian woman, named Katie Pete, attempted to separate the men and so put an end to the fight, the defendant stepped out of the house onto the front porch, saying to Steele as he did so that there was not room enough in the house in which to fight, and "you come outside and we will fight it out." Steele took off his overcoat and started to follow the defendant to the outside, but the old woman above named still held on to him and so attempted to prevent him from going outside. Steele, however, succeeded in getting out of the door and onto the porch. Just as he stepped out of the door, the defendant struck him with a knife on the side of the head, near the left eye, inflicting an ugly wound, of an inch or more in length, and which penetrated to the bone. Steele was attended by a physician, who took several stitches in the wound and otherwise treated it. The defendant was on the day of the assault arrested by the sheriff. A large pocketknife, which, when open, was seven inches in length from the end of the handle to that of the blade, was taken by the officer from the person of the defendant. Upon the blade of the knife were blood stains. The defendant admitted to the sheriff that he cut Steele with said knife. The defendant was to some extent intoxicated at the time of the affray.

The above recital of the facts is founded upon the testimony introduced by the people.

The defendant and his witnesses gave an entirely different version of the difficulty, so far as the vital facts were concerned. The accused testified that Steele was the aggressor; that he (Steele) struck the first blow in the house; that, while he (defendant) himself saw nothing in the hand of Steele as the latter emerged from the house and appeared on the porch, an Indian named Griffith, who followed Steele out on the porch, yelled to defendant that Steele had a knife in his hand; that Steele, almost simultaneously with the warning so given, struck at the defendant, but the blow failed of its mark; that thereupon, believing that Steele had a knife in his hand, he (defendant) struck the former with a knife, which he had hastily taken from his pocket and opened when warned that Steele was likewise armed.

[1] It is, of course, apparent that a pronounced conflict in the evidence exists, and obviously the familiar rule as to such conflicts must govern this court in considering the questions of fact thus arising. The jury, as is well understood, had the right to accept the testimony of the people and reject that of the defendant. This they obviously did, and their conclusion is conclusive upon us. While it is not for this court, under such a state of the record as to the proof as is presented here, to analyze, or otherwise consider the testimony for the purpose of justifying the jury's verdict, it may nevertheless be suggested that it is not to be wondered that the jury should have rejected the testimony of the defendant, since it appears that, on having his attention called at the trial to a radical variance between his testimony given there and that given at his preliminary hearing upon vitally important facts, he admitted that he lied and gave false testimony when testifying before the magistrate.

But the points which the defendant the more seriously and earnestly urges upon us involve the alleged misconduct of the district attorney in his address to the jury and certain instructions embraced within the court's charge to the jury. These propositions will now be considered.

1. While the defendant testified at the preliminary hearing of the charge that, as Steele stepped out of the door onto the porch, the witness Griffith addressing the defendant, exclaimed, "Look out," he did not at said hearing testify that Griffith at the time mentioned also warned him that Steele had a knife in his hand. The district attorney, on cross-examination of the defendant at the trial, asked him why, if it were true, as he declared it to be at the trial, that Griffith warned him, at the time Steele stepped out on the porch, that the latter had a knife in his hand, he did not testify to that fact at the preliminary examination, to which the defendant returned the explanation:

> "I know I didn't have a lawyer in the justice's court. And I made a mistake there."

The district attorney, in commenting upon the disparity between the defendant's testimony before the magistrate and that given by him at the trial regarding the matter mentioned, said:

> "That was defendant's testimony down before the magistrate, and if it was not the truth it came pretty near being. That was before he had any attorneys to tell him it was not true. When he got attorneys, they said to him, 'We can make a fine self-defense case out of this, so you say that you saw the knife; you must tell that all the time, and we will put Oakley (meaning the witness Griffith), on the stand to corroborate you, and we have got a good case.'"

[2] The defendant here contends that the above language was entirely without justification from the record, and that its effect was to inspire in the jury great prejudice against the defense set up by him. The remarks were not warranted by anything found in the record, and, of course, the plain implication from said language is that the defendant's counsel had manufactured for him a spurious case of self-defense, an imputation which should never be made before a jury in any case, much less in a criminal case, in which a person's liberty is at stake, unless there is clear evidence brought properly into the record justifying it. But we are not authorized to inquire into the merits of the objection made to said remarks, because the record does not disclose that such objection was taken at the trial, or that the matter was, at the time the remarks were made, called to the attention of the trial court. Since the remarks complained of were wholly beyond justification by the record, and, indeed, so plainly so that the jury themselves must have at once perceived it, we think that any possible prejudice which might have followed therefrom could have been corrected or destroyed by an order of the court striking them out and an admonition to the jury to disregard them. It has been repeatedly held in this as well as in other jurisdictions that an objection to unwarranted and objectionable remarks by the district attorney, in the course of his argument to the jury in a criminal case, where such remarks are of a character that any damaging effect thereof on the rights of the accused may be obviated by timely and proper instruction by the court to the jury that they were not at liberty to consider such remarks in their deliberations upon their verdict, will not be reviewed or considered by the appellate court unless the remarks so complained of have been objected to at the time they were made and the power of the court to correct the abuse then invoked. People v. Ah Fook, 64 Cal. 380, 383, 1 Pac. 347; People v. Beaver, 83 Cal. 420, 23 Pac. 321; People v. Frigerio, 107 Cal. 153, 40 Pac. 107; People v. Kramer, 117 Cal. 647, 651, 49 Pac. 842; People v. Brittan, 118 Cal. 409, 412, 50 Pac. 664; People v. Owens, 132 Cal. 469, 471, 64 Pac. 770; People v. Shears, 133 Cal. 154, 159, 65 Pac. 295; People v. Ruef, 14 Cal. App. 576, 619, 114 Pac. 48, 54; People v. Amer, 8 Cal. App. 137, 143, 96 Pac. 401; People v. Stein, 23 Cal. App. 108, 118, 137 Pac. 271; People v. Ye Foo, 4 Cal. App. 730, 89 Pac. 450; Horn v. State, 12 Wyo. 162, 73 Pac. 705.

[3] But the defendant complains that the district attorney, in the course of his argument, further transcended the record, and in so doing prejudiced the jury against him when he made the following observations:

> "These Indians are a little bit shrewder than we think. For example, they cannot compel Indians over 21 years of age to go to the Bidwell School, and there is not an Indian boy running around here but what claims he is over 21 years of age, even when you know positively they cannot be over 10. You would be surprised, but if you ask some Indian with a little bit of a boy how old the boy is you would get the reply, 'Why he is 22 years old.' It is always 22 years old, to keep from sending the boy over to school. I have taken particular notice, and where I have a pretty good idea of their age, it is often amusing to have them claim to be 22 years old when they were only about 12 or 14. Another thing is that they never get any older than 22. Wild Bill here will get on that stand and swear that he is about 22 or 23 years old. It has been done here in court so many times that I know just how it is."

Counsel for the defendant objected to said remarks, and requested the court to instruct the district attorney to confine himself to the record. The court in reply stated that it was of the opinion "that it is proper argument; it is an illustration is all."

The remarks thus objected to and above quoted were made by the prosecutor in substantiation of a declaration previously made by him in his argument that the Indians in Modoc county were bright people, and that, if the jury were to acquit the defendant under the evidence, "these Indians" will then believe that they can repeat the same kind of conduct and "get by with it." In other words, the prosecutor, by the observations in question, appears to have adopted that method of impressing upon the jury the importance of the verdict in its effect, in the one way or the other, upon the Indians generally of Modoc county; that, being people of more than ordinary shrewdness for red men of their tribal characteristics, they would receive a verdict of guilty as a severe warning against the use of intoxicating liquor, to which nearly all their internecine difficulties are primarily attributable, while, on the other hand, a verdict of acquittal would probably have the effect of encouraging them in the reckless use of intoxicants, with the result that serious affrays of the character of the one culminating in this prosecution might become common among them. While there was no evidential justification for the remarks, particularly the statement as to the disposition of the Indians to falsify or misrepresent their ages to avoid compulsory attendance at the school maintained for the education of their youth, we cannot say that, in making them, as an illustration of the point he was then pressing upon the attention of the jury, the district attorney went so far afield in legitimate argument as to have thus seriously prejudiced the rights of the accused.

The Indians of the California tribes are an inferior race, generally live by themselves, and as to whose doings entirely among and wholly affecting themselves, however serious at times may be the consequences, there is not infrequently a considerable degree of indifference manifested by the white men. It it probable, therefore, that the remarks complained of were made solely for the purpose of impressing upon the jury the proposition that the charge preferred and the evidence presented by the people in support thereof should receive as serious and earnest consideration as they would be given if the defendant and his victim were not Indians. Moreover, in themselves or taken alone, the remarks were harmless; indeed, viewed without regard to the connection in which they were used, they were meaningless, so far as this case was concerned, and could have exerted no influence one way or the other in bringing about a verdict. Besides, they were general in their application, having reference to all the Indians of that locality, and not to the defendant alone. At all events, in view of the evidence, we cannot persuade ourselves that the jury were unduly influenced by them.

[4] 2. Complaint is made of the following given instruction:

> "The court instructs you that, if you believe from the evidence in this case, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant, Robert Charlie, on or about the 18th day of March, 1917, as charged in the information in this case, committed an assault upon the person of West Steele with a deadly weapon, you should find the defendant guilty."

Challenging the legal soundness of said instruction, as applied to this case, counsel say:

> "The instruction is so framed that the jury was bound to find the defendant guilty if they followed it, and which in our opinion they did do, for the reason that there was no contention on the part of the defense that the defendant did not assault the complaining witness, but that the defense was that he was justified, and therefore, for the instruction to be fair to the defendant, and in conformity to the law as applied to the evidence of the case, the instruction should have been so framed as to make the qualification that 'unless the act was done in self-defense.' "

A simple reply to the criticism thus aimed at the instruction is that it states that, if the jury believed from the evidence that the defendant committed the assault, etc., "as charged in the information," and that the information alleges that the assault therein charged was "willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously" committed. Obviously, if the evidence was such as to convince the jury beyond a reasonable doubt that the assault was committed as so charged, then there was nothing left for the jury to do but to convict the accused, notwithstanding his plea of self-defense and the evidence produced by him in support thereof. If, in other words, the defendant willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously committed the assault, as the information charges, then manifestly there could be no support for the plea of self-defense. Moreover, the court elsewhere in its charge instructed the jury fully and clearly upon the law of self-defense as it is laid down in the Code.

[5] 3. The following instruction, given by the court, is criticized as not involving a correct exposition of the principle of law sought to be stated thereby:

> "To justify the using of a deadly weapon in self-defense, it must appear that the danger which such person was in was so urgent and pressing that, in order to save his own life, or to prevent his receiving great bodily harm, the use of such weapon was absolutely necessary, and it must appear that the person on whom he used such weapon was the assailant, or that the person resorting to the use of such weapon had really and in good faith declined further struggle before he made use of said weapon."

It is said of that instruction that it contains an erroneous statement of the law of self-defense in that it delares that the danger to the person using the weapon was so urgent and pressing that, in order to save his own life, or to prevent his receiving great bodily harm, "the use of such weapon was absolutely necessary," whereas, the law is that the circumstances upon which the person using the weapon is justified in acting are such only as are "sufficient to excite the fears of a reasonable person," and the party making the assault or doing the killing "must have acted under the influence of such fears alone." Pen. Code, § 198.

The instruction is awkwardly phrased, and does not accurately state the law of self-defense, although it is clear therefrom that the court thereby intended to say to the jury that the assailant would be justified in acting upon appearances or apparent danger of losing his life or suffering great bodily injury at the hands of the assaulted party. But, as before stated, the court, elsewhere in its charge, submitted to the jury a full and complete statement of our law of self-defense, and we cannot under such circumstances justly declare that the shortcomings of the above instruction resulted in prejudice to the accused.

[6] 4. The next assignment of error involves an attack upon the legal soundness of the following given instruction:

> "The court instructs you that one who has sought a quarrel with another with a design to force a deadly issue cannot avail himself of a plea of self-defense in using a deadly weapon in such quarrel. And if you believe from the evidence in this case beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant sought a quarrel with West Steele with a deadly weapon, you should find the defendant guilty, regardless of whether or not you believe that said West Steele attempted to assault said defendant with a deadly weapon in such quarrel."

The only objection urged against said instruction is to that portion thereof which reads, "* * * * that the defendant sought a quarrel with West Steele with a deadly weapon," the criticism thereof in effect being that the mere seeking of a quarrel with another with a deadly weapon does not constitute an assault with a deadly weapon. A literal view of the instruction well justifies the criticism. This fault in the phraseology of the instruction, however, might be reconciled with the rational view that thus the court intended to refer to one who has sought a quarrel, and in the quarrel assaulted another with a deadly weapon. But, in view of the clear statement by the court elsewhere in its charge of the law of self-defense, we do not believe the accused could have suffered injury or prejudice from the instruction, particularly the portion which is specifically criticized by the defendant. In fact, as to all the instructions, the accuracy of which in stating the principles of law thus sought to be given to the jury is challenged by the defendant, we cannot justly hold, after a review and consideration of the entire record, that from the errors so occurring a miscarriage of justice will follow an affirmance of the judgment. Const. art. 6, § 4½.

Obediently to the foregoing views, the judgment is affirmed.

PACIFIC GAS & ELECTRIC CO. v. ROBERTS, State Treasurer.

COAST COUNTIES LIGHT & POWER CO. v. SAME.

1. Statutes 🔑72—Uniformity of Operation—Public Service Corporations—Taxation.

Where a light and power corporation owned stock of another company, purchased some electricity from a third company, sold some to its subsidiary, and the balance of that purchased and manufactured to private consumers, taxing it on the entire gross receipts from operation under Const. art. 13, § 14, subd. "a," did not violate article 1, § 11, requiring all laws of a general nature to have uniform operation.

2. Taxation 🔑382—Corporation Taxes—"Gross Receipts from Operation."

The words "gross receipts from operation," as used in Const. art. 13, § 14, subd. "a," providing a tax upon such receipts of public service corporations, mean the entire operative income without deductions of any sort, and do not contemplate a tax upon gross profits.

3. Statutes 🔑218—Construction—Extraneous Matter.

The mere fact that a commission on taxation recommended a system of tax on gross earnings, and that the amendments to the constitutional section on corporation taxation were voted for by the people influenced by such recommendation, did not require the phrase "gross receipts from operation," as used in the amendments, to be interpreted according to the commission's idea.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Two proceedings by the Pacific Gas & Electric Company and by the Coast Counties Light & Power Company against E. D. Roberts, as Treasurer of the State, for abatement of alleged excessive taxes. From a judgment adverse to them, plaintiffs appeal in each case. Affirmed.

Wm. B. Bosley, of San Francisco, for appellants. U. S. Webb and Raymond Benjamin, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. As the questions involved in both appeals are identical, we shall discuss them in an opinion applicable alike to each case. Each appeal is from a judgment.

The plaintiff Pacific Gas & Electric Company sued to recover $41,000.45, the amount of certain taxes assessed to that corporation for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1911, and paid under protest. The judgment of the superior court was in favor of the defendant. The action of the other plaintiff was for the recovery of $1,693.99 paid under the same circumstances. The judgment except in amount was exactly the same as in the other case. We will present in detail the facts of the first case only.

This appeal is on the judgment roll. The findings are based upon defendant's admissions contained in the answer or made at the trial, and the main question presented is whether or not the findings support the judgment. The essential findings were that plaintiff was at all times relevant to this discussion a Californian corporation engaged in the sale of gas and electricity; that on the first Monday in March, 1911, said company exclusively owned and operated certain properties used in its said business; that it was also at that time operating in its business other properties owned by subsidiary companies, among them the Suburban Light & Power Company; that during the entire calendar year ending December 31, 1910, the properties of the Suburban Light & Power Company were operated by it as an independent company, and the rest of the properties aforesaid were operated by the plaintiff in conducting the business of transmitting and selling gas and electricity; that the gross receipts of the Suburban Light & Power Company from the sale of gas and electricity during the year 1910 amounted to $188,401.60, but of such gas and electricity large quantities were purchased from plaintiff for the sum of $52,717.99; that the gross receipts of plaintiff derived from the sale of electricity during that year amounted to $7,816,313.12, but of such electricity large quantities were bought from other and independent corporations for $972,293.52; that the state board of equalization assessed to plaintiff as taxes for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1911, upon the properties of the Suburban Light & Power Company, $7,536.06, or 4 per cent. of the gross receipts, and as taxes upon that part of plaintiff's properties used by it in transmitting and selling electricity $312,652.53, or 4 per cent., and at the same time assessed to plaintiff as part of the taxes upon its own property $2,108.71 (being 4 per cent. of the sum of $52,717.99 paid to plaintiff by the Suburban Light & Power Company), and to plaintiff's vendors as part of the taxes upon their properties $38,891.74, being 4 per cent. of $972,293.52 paid by plaintiff to its vendors for electricity purchased from them. There were findings to the effect that plaintiff had tried in vain by the methods prescribed by law to have the alleged errors corrected; that such efforts were unsuccessful; and that the moneys had been paid under protest. The conclusions of law were that the gross receipts of the plaintiff and of the Suburban Company were as found by the state board and that the assessments were legal and valid.

Plaintiff's contention is that the "gross receipts from operation," within the true meaning of subdivision "a" of section 14 of article 13 of the Constitution of California are obtained by subtracting from the entire amount realized from the sale of the commodities distributed by any one of the public service corporations therein contemplated the cost of such of said commodities as have been purchased from other companies. It is asserted that this interpretation of the cited constitutional provision is correct because: (1) The taxes there specified are upon the operative properties of the corporations; (2) such interpretation would be in harmony with section 1 of article 13 of the Constitution, providing for taxation in proportion to value of property, and with section 11 of article 1, requiring all laws of a general nature to have uniform operation; and (3) plaintiff's interpretation of the term "gross receipts from operation" is the ordinary and usual one.

It is argued that if the Pacific Gas & Electric Company, during the year 1910, had owned and operated the distributing systems owned and operated by the Suburban Light & Power Company during that period, and had manufactured and sold to ultimate consumers, at the same price, the same quantity of gas and electricity which was sold to the Suburban Light & Power Company, the entire amount of tax which would have been assessed upon all of the property which was in fact owned during that year by the Suburban Light & Power Company and a part of the property owned by the Pacific Gas & Electric Company would have been 4 per cent. of $188,401.60 instead of 4 per cent. on that sum plus 4 per cent. of $52,717.99. In other words, appellant insists that the method followed by the state board of equalization and upheld by the court resulted in double taxation, which, according to its view, is forbidden by the constitutional provisions to which reference is made, namely, section 1 of article 13 and section 11 of article 1. The effect of section 1 upon section 14 of article 13 was discussed by Mr. Justice Sloss in the unanimous opinion of this court in Bank of California, National Association, v. Roberts, 173 Cal. 398, 160 Pac. 225. That was a case in which double taxation was the subject of complaint, such double taxation arising from the inclusion of the value of shares of stock in other banks owned by the bank which was taxed in reaching the value of its assessable assets notwithstanding the fact that such other shares were subject to separate assessment and taxation. At page 403 of 173 Cal., at page 227 of 160 Pac., the following language is used:

> "Does the Constitution of California prohibit such double taxation as may be involved in the assessment here complained of? No doubt, our Constitution, as it stood prior to the amendments of 1910, did contain such prohibition. Section 1 of article 13, as it originally read, provided that: 'All property in the state, not exempt under the laws of the United States, shall be taxed in proportion to its value, to be ascertained as provided by law.' This is the language which was held, in the cases above cited, to forbid double taxation. 'All property' is not taxed in proportion to its value if some of it is taxed once and some of it more than once upon the ascertained value. Burke v. Badlam, 57 Cal. 594. But when the new system of taxing certain corporations for state purposes was embodied in the Constitution, section 1 was also amended. That section was made to read as follows: 'All property in the state except as otherwise in this Constitution provided, not exempt under the laws of the United States, shall be taxed in proportion to its value, to be ascertained as provided by law, or as hereinafter provided.' The change consisted in the addition of the italicised words. Here is an express declaration that the general rule requiring property to be taxed in proportion to its value shall be subject to the qualification that such proportionate method of taxation shall not apply where the Constitution makes other provision. It has, as we have seen, made other provision for the assessment of bank property. The respondent claims that the words 'except as otherwise in this Constitution provided' qualify merely the subject of the sentence, to wit, 'All property in the state.' In other words, the contention is that this qualifying clause was meant to cover only the exemptions specifically provided for in section 1 and subsequent sections of article 13. This is a strained interpretation of the language. The amendments to section 1 and to section 14 were proposed and adopted at the same time, and there can be no doubt that the changes formed parts of a single comprehensive scheme. The plan of section 14 is in various respects inconsistent with the idea that the property therein described shall be assessed in proportion to its value. The taxes levied, while described as taxes upon the property of corporations, are not based upon any mode of ascertaining either the proportionate or the absolute value of such property. Thus in subdivision 'a' railroad, telegraph, telephone, gas, or electric and certain other companies are subjected to a tax of a certain percentage of their gross receipts from operations within this state. Subdivision 'b' imposes upon insurance companies a tax of 1½ per cent. upon the amount of the gross premiums received. Such taxes cannot upon any fair construction be said to comply with a requirement that all property shall be taxed in proportion to its value. Surely it was not believed, when section 14 was adopted, that the method of taxation therein provided for should be limited or controlled by any general provision such as that theretofore contained in section 1. The amendment of section 1 was designed to avoid any possible conflict with section 14. Even if, however, there should be any opposition between the general terms of section 1 and the provisions of section 14, the latter, as the more specific and particular enactment, would prevail."

There is little to add to this exposition of the subject which entirely disposes of appellant's objection to the supposed disharmony between sections 1 and 14 of article 13.

[1] The method followed in taxing appellant's operative property is not opposed to section 11 of article 1, because obviously it is uniform in its application to all corporations of the same class.

[2] But it is argued that the expression "gross receipts from operation," used in subdivision "a" of section 14 of article 13 of the Constitution of California, is equivalent to "gross earnings" or "gross income." This argument is based in part upon the assumption that the method of taxation of public service corporations is a substitute for the levy of ad valorem taxes upon their property, and that a just result may only be reached by applying the percentage fixed by law to the income from the property used exclusively in the production and distribution of the commodity sold. It is not necessary to determine whether this method of taxation which we have been discussing is solely a substitute for the exaction of ad valorem taxes or for those and also for occupation license, excise, and other privilege taxes, although the provision that they shall be "in lieu of all other taxes and licenses" might seem to lend some force to the latter view. In Pacific Gas & Electric Co. v. Roberts, 168 Cal. 420–424, 143 Pac. 700, 701, Mr. Justice Henshaw, who delivered the opinion of this court, after commenting upon Mr. Justice Peckham's suggestion in McHenry v. Alford, 168 U. S. 651–671, 18 Sup. Ct. 242, 42 L. Ed. 614, that such a tax is not in reality upon the gross earnings, but upon the lands and other property of the company, used this language:

> "Without pausing here to review the decisions of the Supreme Court bearing upon the question, but contenting ourselves with a subsequent reference to some of them, it may be said that the conclusions of the Supreme Court were that property used in the public service frequently acquired a value in the use, which value was something greater than the value of the property not engaged in such use; that by the systemization and unification of such properties in use they in the aggregate acquired a special value by virtue of this unity of use; that this special value was in the nature of property; that a fair tax upon gross earnings bore such a relation to the values of these properties under their unity of use as to justify such a tax upon revenue as being a legal and commutated or substituted tax for other taxes which were or might have been levied."

It thus appears, and has been definitely decided by this court, that the tax, whatever its scientific essence, is levied upon property created in part by the unity of use of other property. There is a unity of use in the distribution of gas and electricity sold to its consumers by such a corporation as the Pacific Gas & Electric Company, whether those commodities be produced in its own retorts and by its own generators or purchased ready made from other corporations. The tax might be levied upon the gross earnings (as indeed it is in some states), but we see nothing to prevent its ascertainment by calculating a certain per cent. of the "gross receipts from operation." Either method would be a "commutated or substituted" tax upon properties which have acquired peculiar and special worth because of their "unity of use." Therefore, unless the words of our Constitution either in themselves or interpreted in the light of custom and precedent compel us to hold that the taxes to be paid by appellants should have been calculated upon the basis of gross earnings, we shall be bound to uphold the judgment of the superior court.

That the words of the Constitution did not contemplate deduction from the "gross receipts from operation" we do not doubt. The expression first occurs in subdivision "a" of section 14 of article 13 as follows:

> "Said tax shall be equal to the percentages hereinafter fixed upon the gross receipts from operation of such companies, and each thereof within the state."

The same form of expression is again used in the same subdivision and in the very next sentence, which is as follows:

> "When such companies are operating partly within and partly without this state, the gross receipts within this state shall be deemed to be all receipts on business beginning and ending within this state, and a proportion, based upon the proportion of the mileage within this state to the entire mileage over which such business is done, of receipts on all business passing through, into, or out of this state."

This is perfectly plain, unequivocal language, and it will be noticed that the deductions from receipts upon business done partly within the state are based, not upon the cost to the company assessed of the proportion of the service rendered or the commodity distributed within the state, but upon the mileage covered. The addition of the words "from operation" to the words "gross receipts" does not change their meaning to an equivalent of "gross profits." On the contrary, those words but emphasize the fact that the tax contemplated by the Constitution was to be levied upon the property and franchises of corporations used exclusively in public service. Many such corporations have investments which have no relation to the operation of their business of supplying gas, hauling freight and passengers, and the like. The clear intent was to base the tax upon the income derived from the exercise by the corporation of functions reasonably within their charter powers. The authorities sustain this view. In State v. Minnesota & International Ry. Co., 106 Minn. 176, 118 N. W. 679, 1007, 16 Ann. Cas. 426, in discussing a statute requiring the payment of 3 per cent. on the "gross earnings" of a railroad, the Supreme Court of Minnesota said:

> "We believe the proper meaning of the act under consideration to be that, when a railroad company is engaged in work reasonably within its charter powers, the receipts from such sources constitute gross earnings in the operation of the railroad."

In the same opinion this language is used:

> "There is good authority for holding that under the statute involved in the present appeal all income, or earnings of whatever nature, received by the railway company should be included within the term 'gross earnings.' Such was the view apparently taken by the Supreme Court of Wisconsin in State v. McFetridge, 64 Wis. 130, 24 N. W. 140. The Wisconsin statute provided that railroads should pay, in lieu of all other taxes, a certain per centum of their gross earnings, and it was held that rental paid for a leased railroad was included within the meaning of that term. The Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of New York (People v. Roberts, 32 App. Div. 113, 114, 52 N. Y. Supp. 859) decided that 'gross earnings from its transportation or transmission business,' as used in the statute, was intended to mean that all corporations embraced within the provisions of the act should pay to the state a tax upon all receipts arising from or growing out of the employment of its capital, whether that capital was employed in the transportation or transmission business, or otherwise. In Detroit v. Commissioner, 119 Mich. 132, 77 N. W. 631, the Supreme Court was of opinion that sums received by a railroad company for switching, rental of tracks and terminals, and interest on loans and deposits, were a part of its 'gross income,' and taxable as such."

In Commonwealth v. United States Express Co., 157 Pa. 579, 27 Atl. 396, it was held that a tax upon the whole of the gross receipts of an express company is not double taxation, although the amounts paid by the express company to railroad companies for transportation are included in and taxed as part of the gross receipts of such companies. It was held that the sums paid by the defendant to railroad companies were paid for services rendered to the express company, while the latter's gross receipts were the result of services rendered by it to its customers. So in the case now before us the money paid by the Suburban Company for gas in bulk was paid to appellant and received in its capacity as a wholesale dealer, while the amounts received by the Suburban from its customers were paid for delivering gas to them—an entirely different service. There is no more reason to make a deduction because the two corporations were engaged in the same sort of business than there would be to subtract from the grand total of plaintiff's gross receipts the amounts paid for oil used in the manufacture of gas by said corporation. This principle is well expressed in the concurring opinion of Mr. Chief Justice Sterrett in the case last cited. After quoting from the statute imposing a tax of a certain percentage on the "gross receipts of said company received from express business done wholly within this state," he said:

> "The tax is thus laid, not upon net earnings or upon gross earnings less the amount paid other companies for transportation services, but upon the entire gross receipts of the defendant's express business done wholly within this commonwealth. As construed in Railroad Co. v. Commonwealth, 104 Pa. 86, the term 'gross receipts' has been regarded as equivalent to 'gross increase' or 'gross earnings.' The defendant might, with almost equal propriety, claim the right to deduct office expenses and cost of local delivery service."

In State v. Illinois Central Railroad Co., 246 Ill. 188, 92 N. E. 814, the court was considering a provision in a charter of a railroad company requiring it to pay a percentage of "the gross receipts," and it was held that the quoted expression meant the entire income without deduction. In the illuminating discussion of this subject the court cited German Alliance Ins. Co. v. Van Cleave, 191 Ill. 410, 61 N. E. 94, wherein "gross income" was held to be the gross receipts of the business, the court saying that the word "gross," as used in the statute, is opposed to "net," and in its ordinary signification is applied to all of the receipts of the business, while net receipts are those remaining after deductions for the expenses of conducting the business. See, also, Goldsmith, Comptroller General, v. Augusta & Savannah Railroad Co., 62 Ga. 468; Railway v. Shinn, 52 Ark. 93, 12 S. W. 183; Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Co. v. Commonwealth, 104 Pa. 80; People ex rel. The Brooklyn Union Gas Co., v. Morgan, 114 App. Div. 266, 99 N. Y. Supp. 711; Commonwealth v. Brush Electric Light Co., 204 Pa. St. 249, 53 Atl. 1096. In People ex rel. The New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Co. v. Roberts, as Comptroller, 32 App. Div. 113, 52 N. Y. Supp. 859, cited supra, the New York statute imposing an excise tax of a given percentum upon the gross earnings of railroads was held to include earnings of every kind excepting those derived from interstate commerce. In that case the inclusion of the income derived by the relator from stocks and bonds of other corporations which had paid their corporation tax was sustained. The court said that the rule against double taxation is a rule of legislation, and not of law, and while the courts will uphold an unforced construction of a statute which will result in relieving property from double taxation, nevertheless the power of the Legislature to require payment of such tax is undoubted. The Court of Appeals affirmed the judgment on the opinion of the Appellate Division. People v. Roberts, 157 N. Y. 677, 51 N. E. 1093.

[3] We are referred to the report of the commission on revenue and taxation made in December, 1906, which outlined a system of taxing "gross earnings," and it is argued that, as the people in voting for the amendments to article 13 of the Constitution were largely influenced by that report, it should be considered by this court as a construction of the words "gross receipts from operation" so powerful as to compel the conclusion that those words are the equivalent of "gross earnings." While the report is very valuable and enlightening upon the subject treated, we cannot read it into the Constitution for the purpose of defining words of plain meaning. If we were to be governed by contemporaneous construction, we would have to consider also that given by the Legislature to the fourteenth section of article 13 shortly after its adoption, as evidenced by section 7 of chapter 335 of the Statutes of 1911, p. 533, which is in part as follows:

> "The term 'gross receipts from operation' as used in section two of this act is hereby defined to include all sums received from business done within this state, during the year ending the thirty-first day of December last preceding, including the company's proportion of gross receipts from any and all sources on account of business done by it within this state, in connection with other companies described in section 2 of this act."

Since this case was submitted a new statute has been passed by the Legislature. It is contained in chapter 214 of the statutes enacted at the last session. Section 8 of said chapter 214 adds a new section to the Political Code, numbered 3665a, which is substantially the same as section 7 of chapter 335 of the statutes of 1911, but with the addition of the following paragraph:

> "Any company claiming that the levy of the percentage fixed by section three thousand six hundred sixty-four a of this Code on the total gross receipts of such company results in double taxation of the property of such company, may make application to the state board of equalization for a hearing on such matter. Said board shall have power to take evidence and determine the facts with respect to such claim, and in event said board finds the claim of such company to be true, said board may authorize such company to deduct from its reported gross receipts that amount of such receipts which, if included in such total gross receipts, would cause such double taxation."

Doubtless this measure was adopted for the purpose of providing machinery for the use of the taxing board in the event that appellants should succeed in these cases on appeal and that this court should hold in accordance with the views of counsel for the appealing corporations. In view of this decision the board will not stand in need of the authority sought to be conferred.

It follows from the foregoing discussion that the superior court correctly found against the plaintiffs in both cases.

The judgments are affirmed.

CITY OF LOS ANGELES v. ZELLER et al. (L. A. 3700.)

1. Constitutional Law 🔑278(2)—Jury 🔑28(2) — Waiver — Condemnation Proceedings—Statute.

Street Opening Act (St. 1903, p. 378) § 8, as amended by St. 1909, p. 1037, providing that a notice of motion to set a cause for trial may be given by any of the parties, and that, if upon the hearing of such motion a trial by the jury or by the court without a jury is not demanded by the defendants, or by the plaintiff, such trial shall be deemed waived, etc., is not violative of Const. art. 1, § 14, providing that private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation, which shall be ascertained by a jury unless a jury be waived as in other civil cases in a court of record, since the Legislature had the same power in treating of the special matter of street improvements to provide that a waiver of the right to trial by jury shall occur when the parties affected fail to appear at the time the motion to set a day for the hearing of the cause is noticed to be made as it had to provide in general, by Code Civ. Proc. § 631, that a waiver of the right to trial by jury is made by consent, oral or written; the clause of Const. art. 1, § 14, "as in other civil cases," not being a limitation of the clause "unless a jury be waived."

2. Jury 🔑25(2)—Waiver.

Where parties appear and go to trial without objection before a court, they will be deemed to have waived a trial by jury.

3. Eminent Domain 🔑169 — Opening of Street by City on Railroad Property — Statute.

The city of Los Angeles had power to proceed with its suit to condemn railroad property for street purposes, although the Railroad Commission had not determined where the intersecting street should cross the tracks of the railroad, since Public Utilities Act (St. [Sp. Sess.] 1911, p. 40) § 43, making the permission of the Railroad Commission a prerequisite to the establishment of grade crossings of any railroad by a street, has no application to street openings and railroad crossings in the city of Los Angeles.

4. Eminent Domain 🔑47(6)—Statutes 🔑97(2)—Special Legislation—Authority to Condemn Property.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1240, subd. 4, providing that property devoted to one public use may be appropriated for another where the latter is more necessary than the former, and declaring that use as a public street or highway is deemed more necessary than any public use to which the property may already be devoted, is not violative of the Constitution amounting to special legislation.

5. Eminent Domain 🔑47(5) — Condemnation of Railroad Property for Street—Statute.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1240, subd. 4, the city of Los Angeles was authorized to take by condemnation the right of way of a street or other railroad for use as a highway or street.

6. Eminent Domain 🔑150—Damages—Condemnation of Railroad Right of Way.

In proceedings by the city of Los Angeles to condemn for street purposes a strip of land owned by an electric railroad 1,600 feet long and 35 feet wide used as the railroad's right of way, the court's action in allowing only the nominal sum of $10 as damages for the taking was improper; the award being inadequate.

Shaw and Sloss, JJ., dissenting.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action by the City of Los Angeles against J. T. Zeller and others, the Pacific Electric Railway Company, and the Union Trust Company of San Francisco, as such and as trustees. From the judgment, defendants appealed to the District Court of Appeal, and the case was transferred to the Supreme Court on order made after decision in the District Court. Judgment was reversed, with direction to the superior court to enter its judgment in conformity with the findings of fact. On rehearing, judgment and order reversed.

J. W. McKinley, Frank Karr, A. W. Ashburn, and R. C. Gortner, all of Los Angeles, for appellants. Albert Lee Stephens and Charles S. Burnell, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. In this case an opinion was prepared by the District Court of Appeal, but subsequently an order was made transferring the case to this court, where an opinion was prepared and announced, but a rehearing was granted in order that a further consideration might be had of the action of the superior court in upholding a compensation merely nominal for the taking for use as a public street of a strip of land owned by a street railway and occupied by it for the purposes of its business. Upon further study of the matter a majority of the justices are of the opinion that the superior court erred in sustaining an award of damages in so small an amount. Upon the other questions discussed we reaffirm our former opinion which was in part the adoption of the views of the District Court of Appeal. As given below the portions in single quotation marks are from that part of the former opinion prepared by Mr. Justice Sloss, and those in double quotation marks are from the opinion written by Mr. Justice James and originally filed in the District Court of Appeal:

"'Appeal from a judgment and from an order denying the motion of appellants for a new trial. This action was brought by the city of Los Angeles to condemn for street purposes ground used as a right of way by appellant Pacific Electric Railway Company and to which ground said appellant held fee-simple title. The ground consisted of a strip of land approximately 30 feet in width and of more than 1,000 feet in length, upon which was located rails, poles, wires, and the usual equipment of an electric railway. This strip of land was continuous, except that it was intersected and crossed by one street which was 90 feet in width. Other streets numbering four abutted the right of way at right angles from the south, and one abutted the north line of the right of way at its westerly end. Sixteenth street in the city of Los Angeles formed a continuance of the strip mentioned at the east, and along this street the tracks of the railway company extended, leading toward the center of the city of Los Angeles. The result of the condemnation proceedings, if successful, would be to open Sixteenth street westerly throughout the length of the strip mentioned and form means of access from Sixteenth street into and out of the several streets which were closed against the south line of the right of way strip. After preliminary proceedings had agreeable to the provisions of the Street Opening Act of 1903 (Stats. 1903, p. 376), suit was commenced and notice of motion to set the cause for trial given. At the time set for the hearing of this motion appellants did not appear and the court thereupon appointed three referees to ascertain the compensation proper to be paid to the parties interested. This board of referees made its report and objections were filed thereto, both upon the part of the city, plaintiff, and appellants here. Before hearing was had upon the report, these appellants withdrew the objections made, and the court took up the matter on the objections raised on the part of the city. Before this latter hearing was had appellants made a demand for a jury trial, which was denied. The court at the hearing modified the report of the referees and made its order allowing to the appellants the sum of $10 for the taking of the parcels of land sought to be condemned, and allowing the sum of $26,900 as damage to the property not taken of the appellants. Judgment followed accordingly.

[1, 2] "'It is first claimed that a jury trial should have been awarded appellants upon their demand made prior to the hearing of the objections to the referees' report. In section 8 of the Street Opening Act mentioned, as amended in 1909 (Stat. 1909, p. 1035), it is provided that a notice of motion to set a cause for trial may be given by any of the parties, and that 'if, upon the hearing of such motion, a trial by jury or by the court without a jury is not demanded by the defendants, or any of them, or by the plaintiff, such trial shall be deemed to be waived, and the court must appoint three disinterested persons referees, to ascertain the compensation to be paid to such defendants so waiving a trial by a jury, or by the court without a jury.' There was a clear waiver of the right to trial by a jury made by the appellants if the provisions of the Street Opening Act as just quoted are to be given any effect. Counsel contend, however, that the Constitution of this state (section 14, article 1) does not permit the waiver of a jury to be worked, except it be done in the manner which affects all civil actions alike. Section 14 of article 1 provides in part as follows: 'Private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation having been made to, or paid into court for, the owner, and no right of way shall be appropriated to the use of any corporation other than municipal until full compensation therefor be first made in money or ascertained and paid into court for the owner, irrespective of any benefit from any improvement proposed by such corporation, which compensation shall be ascertained by a jury, unless a jury be waived, as in other civil cases in a court of record, as shall be prescribed by law. * * *' It is insisted that the clause 'as in other civil cases' is a limitation of the clause 'unless a jury be waived.' We do not so construe the provision, but so construe it rather to the effect that the phrase 'as in other civil cases' refers to the matter of fixing the compensation by a jury which is provided for in the sentence immediately preceding that referring to the waiver of a jury. As we would construe the provision, it would read in this way: 'Which compensation shall be ascertained by a jury, as in other civil cases in a court of record.' Section 7, article 1, of the Constitution provides that the trial by jury may be waived 'in civil actions by the consent of the parties, signified in such manner as may be prescribed by law.' It follows, considering this section alone, that it is left to the Legislature to determine as to what may amount to a waiver of the right to a jury trial in civil action. The Legislature in general has, by section 631 of the Code of Civil Procedure, provided that a waiver of the right to trial by jury is made by consent, oral or written, and by the failure of the party to appear at the trial. No reason appears why the Legislature has not the same power in treating of the special matter of street improvements to provide that a waiver of the right to trial by jury shall occur when the parties affected fail to appear at the time the motion to set a day for the hearing of the cause is noticed to be made. Proceedings for the opening, widening, and improving of streets in municipalities form a subject for special treatment and procedure, and the provision relating to the appointment of referees is one consistent with the proper nature and subject of such acts. It is appropriate that the matter of the appointment of referees shall be determined in advance of the date of a proposed trial, for if it is not demanded by the parties that the work assigned to be performed by the referees shall be performed by the court or by a jury, then there is no occasion for such trial to be had. If there is to be a trial by court or jury there can be no referees. Hence the effect under the provisions of the act of a motion to set a cause for trial is to give notice that referees are then to be appointed, unless the parties appear and object thereto and require a trial by the court or jury. If they fail to so appear, their right to such a trial is waived, and properly so. The demand of the appellants for a jury trial made before the hearing on the objections of the city to the referees' report came too late. The trial had already been had; that is, the evidence had been taken by the referees and findings reported. It only remained for the court to consider the objections made to the report and to modify or confirm the same or set the report aside and appoint a new board of referees. At that stage of the proceedings there was no hearing pending at which it would have been appropriate to make use of the services of a jury. The record shows a complete acquiescence on the part of appellants in all of the proceedings taken in the condemnation matter up to the time the report of the referees came before the court for confirmation. In so far as objections to those proceedings might be waived, the circumstances are such as to show conclusively that the appellants are bound, because of their failure to seasonably raise objection thereto. In the bill of exceptions it is set out that the board of referees proceeded to take testimony to show the value of the land sought to be taken and the damages which would accrue, and nothing is therein shown which would indicate that the defendants were not present at such hearing. It would therefore appear that not only did they fail to make any objection to the hearing before the referees, which was in effect the trial, but that after filing objections to the report of the referees they withdrew these objections and left such report to stand, presumably approving thereof. Aside from any question as to the right of the Legislature to make a special provision respecting the waiver of a jury trial in street opening cases, there is a general rule which is applicable where the parties have failed seasonably to make a demand for a jury trial. It is held that where parties appear and go to trial without objection before a court, they will be deemed to have waived a trial by jury. Boston Tunnel Co. v. McKenzie et al., 67 Cal. 485, 8 Pac. 22; Ferrea v. Chabot, 121 Cal. 233, 53 Pac. 689, 1092." '

[3] "The second point urged is that the city was without power to proceed with the condemnation suit until the Railroad Commission had acted and determined where the intersecting streets should cross the tracks of the railway company. It is sufficient, in answer to this point, to refer to our recent decision in City of Los Angeles v. Central Trust Co., 173 Cal. 323, 159 Pac. 1169, where we held that, at the time these proceedings were had, the provision of section 43 of the Public Utilities Act of 1911, making the permission of the Railroad Commission a prerequisite to the establishment of grade crossings of any railroad by a street, had no application to street openings and railroad crossings within the city of Los Angeles.

[4, 5] " 'The further contention is advanced that there is no authority in a municipal corporation to take by condemnation the right of way of a street or other railroad, for the reason that property already devoted to a public use cannot be taken for the purpose of serving another public use. It is admitted that subdivision 4 of section 1240 of the Code of Civil Procedure in terms provides that property devoted to one public use may be appropriated for another public use where the latter is more necessary than the former. The subdivision mentioned further declares that the use as a public street or highway is deemed more necessary than any public use to which the property may already be devoted. It is claimed, however, that this latter provision violates the provisions of the Constitution in that it amounts to special legislation. It would seem unnecessary to discuss the argument under this head to the last point mentioned. It was not proposed by the city in this case to annihilate or destroy the value of the property for the uses to which the railroad company was putting it; in fact, the use of the right of way was specially reserved to the railroad company, together with its tracks, wires, and equipment. There was no purpose manifested to destroy the utility of the right of way as a right of way for railroad purposes. The city sought only to share the use of the ground by permitting the public to use it in common as a highway.' "

[6] We now come to a consideration of that part of the court's action in allowing only the sum of $10 as damages for the taking of the parcel of land, 1,600 feet long and about 35 feet wide, which was sought to be condemned. Admittedly, this land is worth vastly more than $10 or any such trivial sum, but it was argued in the superior court and here that since the city wished to preserve, not to take away, the railroad company's use of the strip of land for transportation purposes the injury resulting from the sharing of such purposes by the general public would be merely nominal. It is, of course, admitted that the corporation would be put to greater expense by the surrender of its exclusive use of the strip of land, but we are asked to assume that such detriment is covered by the large item of damages allowed by the court. Taking the latter contention first we cannot see how an award of damages could possibly meet the condition because the detriment caused by the appropriation of the land for a street would be so great and of a nature so diverse that no rational basis for the calculation of mere damages could be found. Some of the phases of such detriment would be: (1) Interruption of the service by compulsory obedience to the law regulating speed on public streets; (2) added danger of accidents of the sort that could not ordinarily happen on a private right of way; (3) increased expense due to the corporation's duty to keep a part of the street in repair; and (4) the taking from the railway corporation of the right to affix waiting stations, switches, and the like to the land. We cannot assume that these and other injuries to the owner of the property either were or could be met by the award of damages for property not taken. The trouble with the argument of respondent upon this and the other branch of the case is that it ignores the possibility of the use of the real property for any other purpose than the operation of a railway.

Concerning the supposed adequacy of $10 as an amount of compensation for the fee to the strip of land belonging to the corporation, Mr. Justice Henshaw wrote as follows when the case was previously under consideration:

"I cannot bring myself to believe that an award such as is here made, of $10, for a strip of land 1,600 feet long by 35 feet wide, for which land unquestionably the appellant paid a large amount of money, is anything other than a cloak for confiscation. If 1,600 feet may thus be taken, why not 160 miles, and why may not the counties of the state adopt this method of condemnation of parts of steam railway rights of way, for which those companies have paid vast sums of money, and thus obtain highways for the use of the public without cost? I can perceive no parallelism between this case and a mere right of way for a highway across a steam railroad right of way. In the present case the fee is taken. In the crossing case but an insignificant easement is condemned. Moreover, steam railroads, so far as present knowledge goes, have a permanency which does not apply to suburban electric roads. It is foretold as to the latter that automobile transportation will soon drive out of existence most if not all of such lines, and indeed, as a matter of statistics, it is declared that more passengers are carried in the United States to-day by public service automobiles than are carried by all of the steam and electric railroads of the country, and that the percentage is increasing. To permit a highway to be thus carved out of the privately owned right of way of a suburban electric road upon which highway the service of the electric road will to its injury be put in competition with automobile service, presents an added feature establishing the grotesque inadequacy of the award here made. And finally should the railroad corporation owning this land ever feel impelled to abandon its railroad and devote this right of way to private use and sale it will have been deprived of a strip containing considerably more than an acre for the sum of $10, while there is no hazard in saying that its value to-day in the open market is easily as many thousand dollars."

There is little to add to this expression of our views. Respondent has cited numerous authorities announcing the rule that an easement for a street across the right of way of a steam railroad may be granted for merely nominal compensation. Typical of such decisions is the leading case, C., B. & Q. R. R. Co. v. Chicago, 166 U. S. 226, 17 Sup. Ct. 581, 41 L. Ed. 979, wherein the Supreme Court of the United States upheld a judgment of the Supreme Court of Illinois allowing nominal damages for the condemning of a right of way for a street across the tracks of the railway company. That decision, which was by a divided court, carefully distinguished between the right to cross a railroad company's right of way and any further invasion of its property. In that case, at page 248 of 166 U. S., at page 589 of 17 Sup. Ct., 41 L. Ed. 979, we find the following language used in the opinion:

> "In its opinion in this case the Supreme Court of Illinois says that when a city council, under the authority of the act of April 10, 1872, extends the street across railroad tracks or right of way, 'it does not condemn the land of the railroad company nor prevent the use of the tracks and right of way.' [Chicago, B. & Q. Ry. Co. v. Chicago] 149 Ill. 457 [37 N. E. 78]. We take this to be a correct interpretation of the local statute, and as indicating not only the interest acquired by the public through proceedings instituted for the extension of a street across the tracks and right of way of the railroad company, but also the extent to which the company was deprived, by the proceedings for condemnation, of any right in respect of the land. Such being the law of the state, it would necessarily follow that the jury, in ascertaining the amount of compensation, could not properly take as a basis of calculation the market value of the land as land. The land as such was not taken, the railroad company was not prevented from using it and its use for all the purposes for which it was held by the railroad company was interfered with only so far as its exclusive enjoyment for purposes of railroad tracks was diminished in value by subjecting the land within the crossing to public use as a street."

> "The right of the company to use the land or its right of way for as many tracks as it reasonably required for its business—if such right it had when the present proceedings were instituted—is not affected by the opening of the street in question. The opening of the street across the company's land—the city not acquiring the fee-simple title—was necessarily subject to the right, if any, of the company to lay down additional tracks if necessary in the proper conduct of its business."

It will thus be seen that the case from which these quotations are made and others of similar type are not authority for the taking for street purposes without material compensation of longitudinal strips over which electric railroads are operated in cities. Mr. Elliott in his work on Roads and Streets (3d Ed.) thus announces the rule:

> "A right to cross an existing public way with a street or road may often be implied where a right to longitudinally take the way would not be deemed to exist." Section 248.

And in section 249 of the same work the learned author uses the following language:

> "A private corporation which acquires a right to construct a turnpike or a railroad acquires it subject to the dominant right of the state to cross its turnpike or railroad whenever the public necessity demands that new roads or streets shall be opened. In accepting a grant from the state, the private corporation impliedly agrees that the sovereign right to provide the citizens with necessary highways shall not be impaired."

From the foregoing discussion it follows that the judgment and order must be reversed, and it is so ordered.

We concur: HENSHAW, J.; LORIGAN, J.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. (concurring). I concur in the judgment and also in the opinion except in so far as the last point discussed is concerned. As to that I also concur generally in the views expressed, and in the conclusion reached to the effect that the railroad company was entitled to a substantial sum as and for the taking of its property. As I understand the record, the whole of the strip of land, approximately 30 feet in width and 1,600 feet in length, owned in fee by the company, is condemned for the purposes of a public street. Simply because the company is to be allowed to use this street for the same purpose that it is now using the property as owner, as a railroad right of way, nothing is allowed as for a taking of property, and this although such use will henceforth be the ordinary use in common with the public of a public street, subject to all conditions and restrictions imposed on railroad companies granted a right to use a public street as a right of way.

The more I consider this matter, the more strongly I feel that this view is not only manifestly unjust and inequitable, but also unwarranted in law. The relative situation as regards this property prior and subsequent to the condemnation is well set forth by counsel for the company as follows:

> "The defendant is the owner of the fee and had, before the condemnation, the right to excavate and carry away any portion of the soil or to change the grade of its road at will, or to store ties, poles or other materials along the right of way, or to build sidetracks, to store cars thereon or to build waiting stations, platforms, depots, warehouses, repair shops or other structures upon said strip of land (which is not entirely occupied by the existing tracks), to fence the same against trespassers and to exclude all of the public from travel thereon except when transported in the defendant's cars, and to use it in any other way that the owner of property may use it, either on, above or below the surface of the earth, so long as the use is not such as to become a nuisance. But by the condemnation in the case at bar, by the paving of the street, which will follow, the city has taken from the defendant all of the substantial value of its ownership of the land and has left it, as we said before, only the right to use the surface as one of the general public, subject, of course, to increased hazard of accident, increased expense of operation and maintenance, impaired running time and very substantially impaired enjoyment of the property in general. The control over the surface of the ground is now vested in the city, instead of the defendant, and the use of the subsoil has become nil."

To my mind there is here an actual taking of property within the meaning of our law relative to eminent domain, and the company is entitled, as a prerequisite to such taking, to a substantial sum as and for the value of the property thus taken. The crossing cases are sufficiently distinguished, to my mind, in the opinion.

As already noted, the property sought to be condemned does not constitute "only a part of a larger parcel." Section 10, Act 1903; Stat. 1903, p. 379. The whole of a parcel of land owned and used by the railroad company is thus taken for street purposes. I doubt, therefore, if there is any basis for an award to the company except as and for the value of the "property sought to be condemned, and all improvements pertaining to the realty."

I concur: LAWLOR, J.

SHAW, J. (dissenting). I dissent from the judgment of reversal and from that part of the opinion holding that the sum of $15 is an inadequate allowance for the value of the estate to be taken by plaintiff from the Pacific Electric Railway Company in the strips of land used by it for its railway between Los Angeles and Santa Monica. The amount allowed was $15 and not $10 as stated in the main opinion. The railway company originally acquired these strips of land as a place whereon to lay its railway tracks and place its poles, wires, and other appliances appurtenant thereto along that part of its line. Thereafter it built its tracks, established its line, and has ever since maintained and operated its railway system upon and over said strips. It acquired the fee-simple title to the land. The estate therein necessary for railway purposes, however, was not a fee, but only an easement. The record shows that the city did not seek nor ask to condemn or take this easement, this right of use by the Pacific Electric Railway Company for its railway, but that, on the contrary, the court below, in pursuance of a stipulation between the parties stated in its conclusions of law that this easement for railway purposes, with all its appurtenant structures and appliances, should be reserved to and was to remain in the railway company, and that the city was to acquire only an easement in the land for public use as a street, but subordinate to the right or easement of the railway company aforesaid.

An estate in fee is divisible in various ways not involving a division of the surface of the land. It may be divided into a number of qualified estates. Different easements or subordinate estates may be carved out of the fee, and such easements or estates may be sold separately and to different persons by the owner of the fee. The railway company, if it had so desired, could have conveyed its railway, with the easement necessary for its maintenance and operation, to one person, a subordinate easement for the servient use of the land as a public street to another person, and the fee burdened with these two easements to still another. Being separable interests or estates in the land, they are susceptible of a separate valuation.

The only property proposed to be taken by the city was the subordinate easement for a public street. For this taking the railway company was entitled to the just value of the estate taken. This value was to be, and was, ascertained and found by the court below from the evidence. There was abundant evidence to the effect that the value thereof did not exceed the $15 allowed. This is admitted. The testimony was that the strips of land subject to a perpetual easement for railway purposes had no substantial value. A mere subordinate easement would, of course, have even less value.

There remains as an element of value only the remote possibility that at some unknown time in the future in the uncertain course of future events and developments, the railway company may cease or abandon the operation of its line, or, that its right to do so may be forfeited, in which case the servient fee, relieved of the depreciative burden of railway use, would again become of value as unburdened land, if not appropriated to public use as a street. If this could be assumed to occur at a definite time in the future, it would afford a basis for estimating a present value equal to the present worth of the value when the event occurred and payable at that time. The time, of course, cannot be predicted. No attempt was made at the trial to do so, or to elicit from any witness a valuation based on the uncertain contingency of a cessation of the railway use or the forfeiture of the right. The possibility of an abandonment or forfeiture, or of a present value arising from such future possibility, was not even suggested. The only evidence of value consisted of varying estimates based on the hypothesis that the land was burdened with a perpetual easement for railway use.

In these circumstances all that this court can properly say as to the value of this subordinate easement to be taken by the city is that the court below has made a finding that its value is $15, and that this finding is fully supported by legal evidence given at the trial. There are no facts of which the court can take judicial notice that would defeat the effect of this evidence.

There is another branch of the case, the question of damages to property not taken, caused by the public use to which the city proposes to devote the easement which is to be taken. This appears to have produced some confusion of ideas on the question of the value of the estate actually taken. The owner of land taken for a public use is entitled not only to the value of the land actually taken, or of the estate or interest that is actually taken from him in such land, but also to the damages which such taking will directly cause to property belonging to him which is not taken. The Constitution declares that "private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation." The act of 1903, under which this action was begun, provides that the court shall find, separately: First, the value of each parcel of land to be taken "and each separate estate or interest therein"; second, if the part taken is part of a larger parcel, the damages which will accrue to the part not taken "and to each separate estate or interest therein," by reason of its severance from the part taken and the construction of the improvement in the manner proposed by the plaintiff. Section 10, Stats. 1903, p. 376. The Code, which that act adopts for the mode of procedure by action, contains substantially the same provisions on the subject. Code Civ. Proc. § 1248, subds. 1, 2. The damage caused to an easement by the taking of a subordinate easement for public use may not be well described either in the Code or in the act of 1903, but it is covered by the constitutional guarantee, and therefore it was properly allowed and its payment imposed by the court as a condition precedent to the taking.

There was evidence to the effect that the appropriation of the surface of these strips of land to use as a street, though subordinate and subject to the use for railway purposes, would nevertheless entail greater expense upon the railway in the maintenance and operation of its railway system, because of the necessity of adjusting its tracks to the grade established for the street and because of the greater dangers to persons rightfully using the street for ordinary travel. This would require greater care to avoid injuring them and subject the railway company to increased liability to damages growing out of the negligence of its employés in that respect. This element of damage forms no part of the value of the easement actually taken. It affects only the estate which is not taken, but which is to remain in and belong to the railway company as before, that is, its paramount right to the continuous use of said strips of land for railway purposes. It is, properly speaking, damages caused to the property not taken, damages thereto caused by the use to be made of the property actually taken. This damage was also the subject of testimony given at the trial, and upon that evidence the court below allowed the railway company, as compensation, the sum of $26,900. It is further claimed that the use as a street will prevent the railway company from storing ties or other railway material on the parts of the strips adjoining the tracks, temporarily, for the convenient making of repairs or other operations in the maintenance of the railway use, and from building waiting stations, side tracks, or other structures convenient for railway operation and maintenance, on the parts not occupied by the tracks nor necessary for the passing of cars over them. These rights constitute a part of the easement for railway purposes which is to be reserved to the company, and with which, according to the stipulation, the use as a street must not interfere, and are not to be considered as elements of damage or value. The incidental interference with these operations arising from the public use as a street constitutes a damage to the railway easement not taken, and is included in the aforesaid damage allowance. The right to store ties or other material on the adjacent ground for purposes not necessary for immediate repair or maintenance was not shown to be of value and was not the subject of separate investigation at the trial. The court cannot know judicially that it has a substantial value. The right to take away the soil and to use it in other ways not inconsistent with the railway use was taken into consideration by the witnesses who testified to the value of the property taken, and the findings based on that testimony are conclusive upon this court on appeal.

In my opinion the findings of value and damages are supported by the evidence, and the conclusions of law thereon are correct. By inadvertence the judgment as drawn does not conform to the findings and conclusions of law, in that it does not contain the reservation to the railway company of its paramount easement for railway purposes. But this is plainly a mistake, and could be remedied by modifying the judgment.

In re YORBA'S ESTATE.

ARNAZ v. BOTILLER et al.

(L. A. 5027.)

1. Executors and Administrators 🔑23—Further Appointment after Distribution of Estate.

Where the estate of a decedent has been finally settled and distribution made, further letters of administration should not be issued, unless there still remains property of the estate not fully disposed of, or some act to be done relating thereto which only an administrator can do.

2. Descent and Distribution 🔑75—Wills 🔑722—Title of Heirs or Devisees.

The property of a decedent passes upon his death to his heirs or devisees by inheritance or by the terms of the will, and their title does not originate in the decree of distribution, though such decree, when it has become final, constitutes a muniment of title which will prevail over contrary provisions of the will or of the statutes of descent.

Where a will had been admitted to probate, due notice to creditors given, all debts and expenses of administration paid, and the accounts of the executor settled, and the heirs and devisees without a proper decree of distribution divided the estate among themselves, and their division was acquiesced in and acted upon for many years, they were estopped to question the validity of the disposition thus made, and the court was not required to grant letters of administration for the mere purpose of determining anew the proper distribution of the estate on application of one claiming under a party to the voluntary distribution.

4. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS ⚿=315(6)—DECREE DENYING DISTRIBUTION—CONCLUSIVENESS—"OPINION."

In the administration of an estate an order of distribution was made which it was claimed was invalid because not based upon a petition or preceded by notice. A number of years later a son of the decedent was appointed administrator with the will annexed, and subsequently filed a petition for final distribution. B., claiming to be entitled to one-third of the estate, filed a petition for distribution of such share to him. The court filed and entered a paper indorsed "Opinion—Order," stating that the various orders approving and settling the accounts, and directing and confirming distribution of the estate, had become final and conclusive; that B.'s petition was denied, that findings and decree would be signed accordingly; that no decree of distribution would be made other than one confirming the distribution already made; and that such decree was unnecessary, but might be effectual to dispose of the questions raised by the applications. Held, that while an "opinion" is the informal expression of the views of the court and cannot prevail against its final order or decision, the paper was intended, not only as an opinion, but as an order denying the application for distribution, and, not having been appealed from as authorized by Code Civ. Proc. § 963, it became a final adjudication that the estate had been fully distributed, and that no further distribution should be had.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; James C. Rives, Judge.

Proceeding by Beatrice Arnaz y de Johnson against Frederick Botiller and others, for the appointment of an administrator with the will annexed of the estate of Bernardo Yorba, deceased. From an order denying the application, the petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

J. Mack Love, Joseph F. Devin, A. F. Campbell, Hahn & Hahn, and J. E. Hannon, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. G. R. Freeman, of Corona, for respondents. E. W. Freeman, of Los Angeles, amicus curiæ.

SLOSS, J. [1] Beatrice Arnaz y de Johnson appeals from an order of the superior court of Los Angeles county denying her application for the appointment of an administrator, with the will annexed, of the estate of Bernardo Yorba, deceased. The order in question recites that all the debts of the deceased, and all the costs of administration, have been paid; that the accounts of the executors have been approved and allowed; "that the residue of the property belonging to said estate has been partitioned, and distributed to those entitled thereto, according to law; that there is no necessity for any further administration." If these recitals (or findings, as they may be termed) were warranted by the evidence, the application was rightly denied. Where an estate has been finally settled and distribution made, further letters of administration should not be issued "unless there still remains property of the estate not fully disposed of, or some act to be done relating thereto which only an administrator can do." O'Brien v. Nelson, 164 Cal. 573, 129 Pac. 985.

Bernardo Yorba, the decedent, had departed this life more than 65 years before the appellant's petition for letters was filed. He died, testate, in November, 1858. His will was duly admitted to probate in the probate court of Los Angeles county on December 20, 1858. The very voluminous record before us shows numerous proceedings had in the matter of the estate. These culminated, on November 17, 1873, in an order of the said probate court settling the accounts of the executors, and granting them a discharge. This order recited, among other things, "that all the property of said estate has been distributed to the persons entitled, from time to time under the orders of this court, and that no property of said estate now remains in the hands of said executors, and * * * that all the debts and expenses of administration of said estate have been paid." It appears that, upon the death of Bernardo Yorba, those claiming under his will went into possession of the real and personal property left by him. Whether by voluntary agreement or in pursuance of decrees made in partition suits which affected different portions of the property, the devisees and legatees received in separate use and enjoyment the whole of said estate. Either in person or through their successors in interest they have ever since remained in such possession and enjoyment.

The ground upon which the appellant bases her demand that an administrator should, after the lapse of all these years, be appointed is that there has never been any valid proceeding closing and distributing the estate. It is contended that the order of 1873 was not such a proceeding, for the reasons, among others, that it was not based upon a petition for distribution, nor was it preceded by the notice which, under the statutes then in force, was necessary to vest in the probate court jurisdiction to order the distribution of an estate.

[2, 3] The appellant herein is the daughter of one of the sons of Bernardo Yorba, and claims under her father. He, it appears, was one of the devisees who took a portion of the estate in severalty, and enjoyed its possession and use until he granted it to others. Under our system of law, the property of a decedent passes, upon his death, to his heirs or devisees. They take at once by inheritance, or by the terms of the will. Their title does not originate in the decree of distribution, although such decree, when it has become final, constitutes a muniment of title which will prevail over contrary provisions of the will or of the statutes of descent. Where, as here, the heirs and devisees have assumed to divide the estate among themselves, and their division has been acquiesced in and acted upon for many years by all parties in interest, we think they and their successors should be held estopped to question the validity of the disposition thus made, or to surround with doubt and confusion the claims of ownership based upon their own voluntary acts, long unquestioned and relied upon. In the present case, everything necessary to the complete administration of the estate had been regularly done, with the exception of the formal decree of distribution. The will had been admitted to probate, due notice to creditors had been given, all debts and expenses of administration had been paid, and the accounts of the executors had been settled. We think the court was not required to grant letters for the mere purpose of determining anew the proper distribution of the estate, when the request was made by one claiming under a devisee who had, many years before, been a party to a voluntary distribution of the estate, and who had, without objection, received and retained the benefits of such distribution.

[4] But if this position be open to question, the order appealed from may be sustained upon more technical grounds. The record shows that in July, 1896, Vicente Yorba, a son of the decedent, filed his petition to be appointed administrator with the will annexed. On August 4, 1896, the court made its order granting letters to said petitioner, who duly qualified and acted as such administrator until his death, which occurred in 1903 or 1904. In July, 1897, the administrator filed a petition for final distribution of the estate, and notice of the time set for the hearing of said petition was duly given. One A. Bila, claiming to be entitled to one-third of the estate, filed a petition asking for the distribution of such share to him. Various parties claiming the ownership of portions of the estate filed answers, opposing any distribution upon the ground that the estate had been finally closed by the proceedings of November, 1873, above referred to. These petitions, with the oppositions thereto, came on duly for hearing, and on March 12, 1900, the judge of the superior court filed, and caused to be entered in the minutes, the following paper, thus indorsed:

"Opinion—Order."

"This is an application for a general distribution of said estate. A. Bila petitions for a distribution of one-third thereof to him.

"I think that the various orders approving and settling accounts, and directing and confirming distribution of the estate made from time to time in the course of the proceedings had therein have become final and conclusive, and that final and complete distribution of the estate has been made to those entitled thereto.

"The petition of A. Bila is denied, as is also the application for attorney's fees. Findings and decree will be signed accordingly. But no decree of distribution will be made other than one confirming the distribution already made herein.

"Such a decree is unnecessary, but may be effectual to dispose of the questions that have been raised upon these applications."

The appellant contends that this paper is a mere opinion, showing upon its face that the court contemplated some further action, which should constitute its formal decision or order. If this be the right construction of the document, it did not, of course, constitute a judicial determination binding either upon the court or the parties. An "opinion" is the informal expression of the views of the court, and cannot prevail against its final order or decision. Montecito Valley Co. v. Santa Barbara, 144 Cal. 578, 595, 77 Pac. 1113; Estate of Spreckels, 165 Cal. 597, 606, 133 Pac. 289. But the paper above quoted is quite different from those under consideration in the cases just cited. While it possesses some of the characteristics of an opinion, it was evidently intended by the court to be more than that. It was framed in such manner as to express, not only the views of the court on the legal questions presented, but a judicial determination of those questions. The manner in which it was indorsed ("Opinion—Order") is one indication of its dual purpose. Taking the paper as a whole, it should, we think, be construed as an order denying the application for distribution, together with a statement of the ground for such denial, viz., "that final and complete distribution of the estate has been made to those entitled thereto." The several sentences referring to the signing of findings and decree, while not entirely clear, convey the idea that the judge deemed no decree of any kind to be required, but that he was willing, if the parties should consider it necessary for the protection of their interests, to make a confirmatory decree. No such decree was ever made, and the parties apparently treated the paper thus signed and entered upon the minutes as a final disposition of the proceeding for distribution. This view is confirmed by the circumstance that the record contains a copy of a notice, given by the attorneys for the administrator, that they would move the court "to modify its decision heretofore announced. * * *" Nothing further appears to have been done with this motion.

We have, then, a proceeding duly brought before the court by notice binding every one interested in the estate, and having for its object a distribution of the estate. This proceeding was terminated by an order denying distribution upon the ground that the estate has been fully distributed. An order "refusing the distribution of an estate" is, and was at the time this order was made, the subject of an appeal. Code Civ. Proc. § 963. No appeal was taken, and the order of March 12, 1900, refusing distribution of the estate, has become final and conclusive upon all parties in interest. As to those parties, it constitutes a final adjudication that the estate has been fully distributed, and that no further distribution should be had. It follows that there was, in contemplation of law, no estate to be administered, and that the petition for the appointment of an administrator with the will annexed was properly denied.

The order is affirmed.

INGALLS v. MONTE CRISTO OIL & DEVELOPMENT CO. (L. A. 3727.)

1. WITNESSES 🔑268(1)—CROSS-EXAMINATION—SCOPE.

In servant's action for injuries by the falling of a derrick, it was proper to cross-examine defendant's witness as to whether other derricks had fallen, as tending to show that, though there may have been no patent defect, defendant's experience would have suggested frequent inspections.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1048(5)—HARMLESS ERROR.

In a servant's action for injuries, where a witness was asked if he had ever been warned by defendant of the unsafe condition of the derrick on which plaintiff was at work, assuming that the question was erroneous, as assuming the unsafe condition, defendant was not prejudiced where the witness replied in the negative.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑258(11)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—PLEADING—SUFFICIENCY.

A servant's complaint, alleging that in order to perform his work he was obliged to stand on a walking beam of a derrick over which the roof, by reason of its imperfection, defectiveness, and inadequacy of construction, became loose, and without warning fell and injured plaintiff, and that the defect was due to the negligence of defendant, is sufficient against demurrer.

4. NEGLIGENCE 🔑111(3)—PLEADING—SUFFICIENCY.

Negligence may be charged in general terms, but it must appear from the facts averred that the negligence caused or contributed to the injury.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1040(10)—SCOPE OF REVIEW.

Where the case is fully, fairly, and understandingly tried, there is no reason for reversing the judgment, though the court erroneously overruled demurrer to complaint.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; W. M. Conley, Judge.

Action by Leslie Ingalls against the Monte Cristo Oil & Development Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Henry Ach, of San Francisco, Hunsaker & Britt, of Los Angeles, and George E. Whitaker, of Bakersfield, for appellant. Mathew S. Platz and R. H. Wilson, both of Bakersfield, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Plaintiff was awarded judgment in damages for personal injuries. Defendant appealed from the said judgment more than 60 days after entry thereof, and its counsel frankly admit that they may not question the sufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict. However, they insist that the judgment should be reversed for one or more of the following reasons: (1) The complaint does not state a cause of action. (2) The trial court gave erroneous and misleading instructions. (3) The court erred in overruling defendant's objections to certain questions asked of witnesses Tooker and Senter.

There was an earlier appeal in this case from an order granting a new trial. That appeal was decided by the learned District Court of Appeal after assignment of the cause to that tribunal, the order was reversed, and a petition for a hearing in this court was denied. Ingalls v. Monte Cristo Oil & Development Co., 23 Cal. App. 652, 139 Pac. 97. Respondent is of the opinion that appellant's second and third assignments of error have been finally determined adversely to its contentions, in the decision on the former appeal; but appellant takes the position that, as no further action was required in the retrial of issues when the cause was remanded after the first appeal, the rule and doctrine of the "law of the case" is not applicable (citing Sharon v. Sharon, 79 Cal. 633–653, 22 Pac. 26, 131). It is not necessary to apply that rule to the decision of the District Court of Appeal in the matter of the instructions here attacked. Appellant's counsel concede that the question whether or not the instructions were misleading and erroneous, which is now presented, was decided by the District Court on the appeal from the order granting a new trial. We have again examined the opinion of that learned court upon this subject, and, as we did upon consideration of the petition for transfer, we again approve of and adopt the reasoning and the conclusion of the District Court of Appeal that there was no material error in giving the instructions of which appellant complains. We do this, not because we regard that opinion as the "law of the case," but because we are convinced that it is correct.

[1] The District Court of Appeal did not decide the questions raised by the attack upon the rulings touching the testimony of witnesses Tooker and Senter. Witness Tooker was permitted, over objection by defendant, to testify regarding the falling of other roofs of derricks. He was a witness called by defendant, and he had testified that there had been 50 derricks built on the property of defendant, and that the one on which the accident occurred was like all of those constructed at about the same time. These derricks were on the oil fields belonging to the defendant. The only purpose of such testimony was to place before the jury the fact that there was nothing about this particular derrick and its roof to attract the foreman's attention to it. Upon cross-examination, the witness was interrogated with reference to the falling of the roofs of other derricks. Finally the court framed a question which was as follows:

> "The question has reference to the derricks located in the Kern River oil fields belonging to the Monte Cristo Oil & Development Company; do you know of any of them falling down?"

To this the witness answered:

> "I can't designate any particular derrick. I have known of such, when there was no one working in the derrick. I do not know the cause of its coming down. I can recollect one, because when I saw it in the morning it was riding the walking beam, a portion of it fastened to the derrick, and another portion lying down on the walking beam, and the walking beam still moving up and down—still working, and the well still pumping, and the roof riding up and down on the walking beam."

This was legitimate cross-examination, as it tended to show that, although there may have been no patent defect in the roof, the experience of defendant's agents with similarly constructed derricks would have suggested frequent inspections to guard against accidents which might be caused by latent structural faults. The occurrence of accidents similar to the one under investigation is of value sometimes in determining the amount of care reasonably to be exacted in a particular case, and the jury is entitled to have evidence of such happenings presented to it. Dyas v. Southern Pacific Co., 140 Cal. 296–304, 73 Pac. 972.

[2] Plaintiff's counsel asked one of plaintiff's witnesses, Verde Senter, if he had ever been warned by any of defendant's representatives of the "unsafe, faulty condition or construction" of the roof on that derrick upon which plaintiff was at work at the time of the accident. Over objection, the witness was required to answer the question. His reply was in the negative. If the question was erroneous, as assuming the unsafe condition of the roof, the defendant was not injured. But it did not assume anything. The questioner merely sought to discover whether or not the roof had ever been denounced to the witness by defendant's agents. If Senter had replied in the affirmative, defendant might have been injured; but his answer in the negative was harmless, because it indicated that, so far as the witness was concerned, he was aware of no knowledge of defendant regarding the hidden defects in the roof, if any there were, which had not been described to Ingalls when he was put to work. It was the duty of the employer to maintain the derrick in a safe condition, and it was therefore competent for plaintiff to prove, if he could, that it had become insecure and unsafe, and that the defendant knew and admitted that fact. His effort to make such a showing by witness Senter's testimony was unsuccessful; but it was not error for him to make the attempt.

[3-5] There was no error in the action of the court in overruling the demurrer to the complaint. In that pleading the relationship of employer and employé was set forth. It was averred that, in order to perform the work assigned to him, Ingalls was obliged to stand upon the walking beam of the derrick, and that, while he was so standing on the walking beam the roof on and over the derrick, "by reason of its imperfection, defectiveness, unsafeness, and inadequacy of construction became loose, unfastened, caved in, and suddenly and without warning fell, and in so falling struck the said plaintiff with such force that it knocked him off and from the said walking beam, and caused him to fall, be thrown, and cast to the floor of the said derrick with great force; that the imperfection, defectiveness, unsafeness, and inadequacy of construction of said roof as above alleged was due and caused by the negligence and want of proper or any care on the part of the defendant." The demurrer was both general and special. The special objections were, in brief, that the alleged uncertainty, ambiguity, and unintelligibility were due to the failure to set forth how the unsafeness, inadequacy of construction, etc., were caused by defendant's negligence or want of proper care; to the further failure to aver whether or not plaintiff knew, or might have known, of the impending danger by due diligence and inquiry; and to the additional failure to specify whether the defective condition of the roof was due to latent or patent faults in its construction. It is the rule in this state that negligence may be charged in general terms; but it must appear from the facts averred that the negligence caused or contributed to the injury. Measured by these requirements, the complaint is sufficient, and it properly passed demurrer. Stein v. United Railroads of San Francisco, 159 Cal. 370, 113 Pac. 663.

Besides, the case was fully, fairly, and understandingly tried, and there would be no reason for reversing the judgment, even if the ruling on the demurrer by the superior court had been erroneous. Stein v. United Railroads, supra; Bank of Lemoore v. Fulgham, 151 Cal. 234–237, 90 Pac. 936; Dow v. City of Oroville, 22 Cal. App. 215–221, 134 Pac. 197.

SOLOMON v. FEDERAL INS. CO.

(L. A. No. 3844.)

1. Insurance 🔑281 — Fire Insurance — Breach of Warranty—Materiality.

Under Civ. Code, § 2611, as to breach of warranties in insurance policies, a policy providing that, if any warranty is breached, the policy shall be null and void, issued on an automobile the value of which is misstated, precludes any consideration of materiality of the breach.

2. Insurance 🔑280 — Fire Insurance — Breach of Warranties—Liability.

To describe an automobile in a valued policy as having been made in 1909, when in fact it was made in 1907, is such a material misdescription of the thing insured as to constitute a breach of the express warranty provided for in Civ. Code, § 2607.

3. Insurance 🔑281 — Fire Insurance — Breach of Warranty and Policy.

In view of Civ. Code, § 2565, providing that materiality is to be determined, not by the event, but solely by the probable and reasonable influence of the facts upon the party to whom the communication is due, in forming his estimate of the disadvantages of the proposed contract or in making his inquiries, the mere fact that the jury found the automobile to be worth what it was stated to be worth in the application did not disprove the defense of breach of warranty; plaintiff having stated that he paid $1,000 more for the car than he did pay.

4. Insurance 🔑379(7)—Agency for Insured—Misrepresentations.

Where an insurance agent requests insurance from a company which he does not represent, he is acting for the insured, who is responsible for misrepresentations in the application made out by the broker.

5. Insurance 🔑379(6)—Misstatements in Application—Effect.

The insured is responsible for misrepresentations in the application when it is drawn by a regular soliciting agent of the insurance company, where such an agent has no authority to waive the provision contained therein that the policy is to be avoided if any misrepresentation has been made concerning a material fact.

6. Insurance 🔑96—Agency for Insurer—Retention of Commission—Effect.

Retention of a commission on a policy by an independent insurance broker does not constitute him the agent of the insurer.

7. Insurance 🔑145(1) — Misrepresentations in Application—Effect on Renewal Policy.

That the misrepresentations complained of were made in the application for the original policy and that the policy sued upon was a renewal policy is immaterial.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Action by N. R. Solomon against the Federal Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

McCutchen, Olney & Willard and J. M. Mannon, Jr., all of San Francisco, for appellant. Geo. E. Whitaker, of Bakersfield, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. This is an action to recover $3,000 upon a valued fire insurance policy upon plaintiff's automobile. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals.

Appellant's contention is twofold: First, that the automobile for the loss of which plaintiff brought suit does not answer the description in the policy, thus constituting a breach of warranty and preventing the risk from attaching; second, that it issued the policy on the strength of certain statements in the application for insurance which are untrue, and therefore relieve the defendant from liability.

It appears that in October, 1910, plaintiff resided in Bakersfield, and was the owner of a 4-cylinder, 40 horse power Pierce-Arrow automobile manufactured in 1907; that one Otis Bishop was at that time manager of the insurance department of the Bakersfield Abstract Company; that in October, 1910, plaintiff made oral application to Bishop for insurance upon his automobile, asking for a valued policy in the sum of $3,500, properly describing the car as to horse power, number of cylinders, and year of manufacture; that Bishop turned this information over to his San Francisco correspondents, Gordon & Hoadley, with the request that they secure the insurance, but not mentioning any particular company; that Gordon & Hoadley made out a formal application which described the car as a 1909 Pierce-Arrow of 45 horse power, and stated that plaintiff had purchased the car secondhand for $3,500; that Gordon & Hoadley were general agents for several insurance companies, but did not represent defendant, Federal Insurance Company, with which they filed the application in this case, nor had they ever had any dealings with defendant, before or after this particular transaction; that defendant, acting upon the application, issued a valued policy in the sum of $3,500; that said policy described the car as a Pierce-Arrow, 6-cylinder, 48 horse power automobile; that plaintiff duly paid the premium, out of which Bishop and Gordon & Hoadley retained the usual brokers' commissions; that in October, 1911, upon the notification of Bishop that the policy was about to expire, Gordon & Hoadley secured a renewal for another year for the reduced sum of $3,000; that before plaintiff had paid the premium upon the new policy the car was destroyed by fire, and thereafter defendant refused to accept the premium, disclaiming liability on the ground that the car destroyed did not correspond with the one described in the policy. It is upon this renewed policy that plaintiff brought suit and recovered judgment.

[1] Taking up the first point made by appellant, the question arises whether the misdescription of the automobile in the policy amounts to a breach of warranty such as will relieve the insurer. Our Civil Code (section 2607) provides that:

> "A statement in a policy, of a matter relating to the person or thing insured, or to the risk, as a fact, is an express warranty thereof"

—and that (section 2612):

> "A breach of warranty, without fraud, merely exonerates the insurer from the time that it occurs, or where it is broken in its inception prevents the policy from attaching to the risk."

The effect of this section is limited by section 2610:

> "The violation of a material provision of a policy, on the part of either party thereto, entitles the other to rescind."

But section 2611 goes on to say that:

> "A policy may declare that a violation of specified provisions thereof shall avoid it, otherwise a breach of an immaterial provision does not avoid the policy."

The policy contains the following clause:

> "In the event of any violation of any warranty hereunder this policy shall immediately become null and void."

If the misdescription of the automobile amounts to a breach of warranty, this clause in the policy, taken in connection with section 2611 of the Civil Code, precludes any consideration of the materiality of the breach. See Fountain v. Conn. Fire Ins. Co., 158 Cal. 760, 764, 112 Pac. 546; Bastian v. British American, etc., Ins. Co., 143 Cal. 287, 291, 77 Pac. 63, 66 L. R. A. 255. See, also, Victoria S. S. Co. v. Western Assur. Co., 167 Cal. 348, 357, 139 Pac. 807.

The only question under this head is whether in describing an automobile for insurance purposes in a valued policy the year of manufacture is such a material part of the description that a misstatement in this particular constitutes a breach of the warranty that the thing insured has been properly described. There was no dispute on the point that, other things being equal, a car two years older has a lesser value. This becomes particularly important in a valued policy, where the insurance company agrees in advance that the property insured is worth the amount for which it is insured, in this case, $3,000. Civ. Code, § 2756. Such a valued policy was under consideration in Harris v. St. Paul Fire & Marine Insurance Co. (Sup.) 126 N. Y. Supp. 118, where a 1906 automobile had been described as a 1907 model. The court there said:

> "It is perfectly clear that a used car, constructed in 1906, and insured in November, 1909, is not of the same insurable value as a car constructed in 1907, and the statement of the plaintiff that the car was of the 1907 model was a material representation, upon which the defendant had a right to rely, in issuing a valued policy in the sum of $2,000."

To the same effect are Reed v. St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 165 App. Div. 660, 151 N. Y. Supp. 274, and Smith v. American Automobile Ins. Co., 188 Mo. App. 297, 175 S. W. 113, 114. In the latter case the court said:

> "It would seem to be in accord with common knowledge that a five year old automobile would be less valuable than, and not so safe a risk as, one two years old, and that the effects of wear and tear would be more likely to manifest themselves in the older car. If the fact that the machine is five years old instead of two is not material to the risk, we cannot well see what would be."

In the case at bar no testimony was introduced to show the effect of age upon the risk of loss by fire, although in Smith v. American Automobile Ins. Co., supra:

> "It was also shown in evidence * * * that as cars grow older the chances of self-ignition increase on account of the wear and vibration whereby the quantity of gasoline used is greater and fire is more apt to occur."

[2] Respondent does not deny that the description of his automobile in the policy as a 1909 model is in accordance with the statement in the application made out by Gordon & Hoadley, but relies upon the showing made at the trial that appellant had itself supplemented the description in the application by adding that the car had 6 cylinders and 48 horse power. It is not at all clear that the insured, after retaining the policy for a year, can then insist that a misdescription of the thing insured, sufficient to constitute a breach of warranty, was the act of the insurance company and entirely unknown to the insured. See Madsen v. Maryland Casualty Co., 168 Cal. 204, 206, 142 Pac. 51, and cases there cited. We do not, however, pass upon this point, since it is clear that to describe an automobile in a valued policy as having been made in 1909, when in fact it was made in 1907, is such a material misdescription of the thing insured as to constitute a breach of the express warranty provided for in section 2607 of the Civil Code.

[3] The second point made by appellant is that the policy was issued under mistakes of fact caused by respondent's misrepresentations in the application concerning the year in which the car was built and the amount paid therefor. The application for the policy stated that the car was built in 1909, and that plaintiff paid therefor $3,500. In fact, the car was built in the year 1907 and the plaintiff paid $1,500 for it and some merchandise, which, he testified, made the car cost him $2,500. Respondent contends that these misrepresentations are immaterial, in view of the finding that the car was worth $3,000, the amount for which it was insured. But, according to section 2565 of the Civil Code:

> "Materiality is to be determined not by the event, but solely by the probable and reasonable influence of the facts upon the party to whom the communication is due, in forming his estimate of the disadvantages of the proposed contract or in making his inquiries."

See McEwen v. N. Y. Life Ins. Co., 23 Cal. App. 694, 697, 139 Pac. 242; Columbian Insurance Co. v. Lawrence, 10 Pet. 507, 515, 9 L. Ed. 512.

Such a test of materiality makes the purchase price of a second hand automobile particularly important in a valued policy, as it must be manifest that an insurance company will not agree to pay $3,000 for the loss of an automobile which cost the insured but $2,500. This is not a case of overestimating the value of the thing insured, which in an open policy is not necessarily fatal. Here we have the statement of a fact, the price the insured paid for his car. No question of mistaken opinion is involved. Where a valued policy is issued upon the basis of the application alone, as in this case, it is difficult to see what could be more important to the insurer in determining the amount of the policy than positive statements of the year in which the car was built and the price paid for it by the insured.

[4] Respondent seeks to avoid the effect of this conclusion by insisting that the misstatements as to purchase price and year of manufacture appearing in the application were not made by him, but were made by Gordon & Hoadley, whom the court found to be agents of the Federal Insurance Company. But this finding is not sustained by the evidence. As already indicated, the evidence shows that Gordon & Hoadley were not the regular agents of appellant, that they had never represented appellant before or since, and that this particular transaction was the only one in which Gordon & Hoadley and appellant ever had any dealings. Moreover, it was established that Bishop represented the plaintiff, and that Gordon & Hoadley were Bishop's San Francisco correspondents, who made out the application solely at his request, and that appellant knew nothing of the entire transaction until the application was placed in its hands by Gordon & Hoadley. It is well settled that, where, in circumstances such as are presented here, an insurance agent requests insurance from a company which he does not represent, he is acting for the insured, who is responsible for misrepresentations in the application made out by the broker. Parrish v. Rosebud M. & M. Co., 140 Cal. 635, 645, 74 Pac. 312; Mahon v. Royal Union Mut. Life Ins. Co., 134 Fed. 732, 67 C. C. A. 636; McGraw Wooden Ware Co. v. German Fire Ins. Co., 126 La. 32, 38, 52 South. 183, L. R. A. [N. S.] 614, 20 Ann. Cas. 1229, and cases cited.

[5] The law in this state goes further and holds the insured responsible for misrepresentations in the application when it is drawn by a regular soliciting agent of the insurance company, where, as in the policy here, such an agent has no authority to waive the provision contained therein that the policy is to be avoided if any misrepresentation has been made concerning a material fact. Elliott v. Frankfort Marine, etc., Ins. Co., 172 Cal. 261, 156 Pac. 481, L. R. A. 1916F, 1026; Madsen v. Maryland Casualty Co., supra; Sharman v. Continental Ins. Co., 167 Cal. 117, 125, 138 Pac. 708, 52 L. R. A. (N. S.) 670; Iverson v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 151 Cal. 746, 749, 91 Pac. 609, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 866.

[6, 7] It does not alter the case that Gordon & Hoadley retained a commission for placing the insurance. Bishop, who admittedly was not appellant's agent, also shared in the commission, and it conclusively appeared at the trial that all independent brokers in San Francisco receive similar commissions. This does not constitute the broker an agent of the insurance company. United Firemen's Ins. Co. v. Thomas, 92 Fed. 127, 34 C. C. A. 240, 47 L. R. A. 450; McGraw Wooden Ware Co. v. German Fire Ins. Co., supra. Nor does it matter that the misrepresentations were made in securing the original policy, of which the one in suit is a renewal; for the latter was issued upon the original application wherein the misrepresentations appeared. McKibban v. Des Moines Ins. Co., 114 Iowa, 41, 86 N. W. 38; 2 Clement, Fire Insurance, 518.

Judgment reversed.

WILBUR v. EVERHARDY et ux.

(L. A. 3975.)

1. MINES AND MINERALS ⟹34 — DEED OF PLACER CLAIMS—EFFECT.

Under U. S. Rev. St. § 2320 (Comp. St. 1916, § 4615), a conveyance of a placer claim includes as a matter of law all known veins and lodes of quartz.

2. CONTINUANCE ⟹29—GROUNDS—SURPRISE —SUFFICIENCY OF SHOWING.

Defendant in action to quiet title was not entitled to continuance on the ground of surprise by introduction of a recorded deed, notice of which he is presumed to have had.

3. CONTINUANCE ⟹25—GROUNDS—SURPRISE —SUFFICIENCY OF SHOWING.

It is not error to refuse a continuance for the purpose of securing an absent witness in the absence of showing that her testimony would have had any material bearing nor what the nature thereof would have been.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank G. Finlayson, Judge.

Action by Curtis D. Wilbur against Joseph Everhardy and wife. From an order denying defendants' motion for new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Adolphe Danziger, of Los Angeles, for appellants. W. Maxwell Burke, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This appeal is from the order of the court denying defendants' motion for a new trial. Plaintiff brought his action to quiet title to 20 acres of land, property known as "the Plain View placer claim" and as the "Sunset placer claim." In establishing title plaintiff first connected defendant Joseph Everhardy with the property by introducing a copy of his location notice, then his deed to plaintiff of one-half of his interest in the mining claims, and, finally, a later deed of grant to the whole 20 acres described by metes and bounds. "Defendants thereupon expressed surprise at said deed, claiming that the same was made by mistake and that it was intended by the defendant Joseph Everhardy to include by the conveyance thereunder only placer mining rights in the property described therein, and not to include any quartz mining claim rights in said property, and moved for a continuance on said grounds of surprise and mistake." Much evidence was introduced upon this subject-matter, and from that evidence it appeared that there could have been no surprise, either at plaintiff's introduction of this deed, or at his contention that the defendant meant what in it he declared. It was shown that defendants' attorney knew, as he was charged with notice, of the existence of the deed because it was of record. It was shown that after having made the deed for a valuable consideration defendant Joseph Everhardy sought the rescission of the contract with a tender, or an offer of tender back, of the money he received for his deed because his wife objected. It was shown by his advisor who took his acknowledgment to the deed that defendant Joseph Everhardy knew the nature and contents of it at the time he executed it. It was shown (of course, under conflicting evidence) that the bed rock tunnel which it was urged by defendants was work done upon the quartz claims was but a drainage tunnel to relieve the placer claim from water.

[1] But in addition to this the conveyance of the placer claim, as matter of law, included all known veins and lodes of quartz. U. S. Rev. St. 2320 (Comp. St. 1916, § 4615).

[2, 3] Under these circumstances, since there could have been no surprise, the court would have been justified in refusing a continuance, which continuance was sought for the purpose of securing the attendance of the other defendant, the wife of Joseph. But in addition to this it is not made to appear that the evidence of the wife would have had any material bearing upon the controversy, nor yet even is it made to appear what the nature of her evidence would have been.

The order appealed from is therefore affirmed.

FRAUD ⚷58(2)—MISREPRESENTATION—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In suit for having sold plaintiff a lot in a tract, on the false representation, evidenced by a map, that a street had been dedicated as a public highway and would in time be opened as such, evidence held insufficient to support plaintiff's contention.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Wellborn, Judge.

Action by M. L. Wicks, Jr., against the Rampart Boulevard Company, a corporation, and the Union Trust & Realty Company, a corporation. From judgment for defendants, and an order denying his motion for new trial, plaintiff appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

Geo. S. Hupp and Frank C. Hill, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. Lewis W. Andrews, Thomas O. Toland, Andrews, Toland & Andrews and Cedric E. Johnson, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff sued, alleging that defendant, Rampart Boulevard Company, had sold to him a lot in a tract upon the representation, evidenced by a map, that a street (Second street) between Coronado street and Rampart boulevard, in the city of Los Angeles, had been dedicated as a public highway, and would in time be opened to the use of the public as such highway. After trial the court found against plaintiff's contentions, and he appeals from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

Plaintiff upon the trial testified that after visiting the tract of land he found thereon one Nolan who represented himself as the agent of the selling agents of the tract, and that Nolan gave him a map showing the division of the tract into lots and the streets which were to traverse the tract. On this map was delimited Second street. He made his payment on the purchase price of the lot and entered into a contract for the purchase, which afterward he fulfilled; that years passed and the defendant manifested no intention to open the street, wherefore he brought this action to have his rights in it defined. The defendant Boulevard Company by its evidence showed that it owned this tract; that the real estate firm of Strong & Dickinson was engaged by it to secure purchasers after it had prepared its official map (official in the sense that it was adopted by the corporation defendant, the owner of the land, and filed for record), which official map was to show the lots and their prices, and the public streets. Strong & Dickinson were also interested as owners or part owners in an adjoining tract known as "Rampart Heights Division B." Without authority from defendant, Rampart Boulevard Company, or its officers, and even without their knowledge, Strong & Dickinson prepared an advertising map, combining the tract in which they were interested with an unauthorized plat of the lands of the defendant corporation. This unauthorized map purported to show Second street to be a public street as contended for by plaintiff. It was a copy of this unauthorized map which was delivered by Nolan to plaintiff. Nolan, however, had no authority to bind either Strong & Dickinson or the defendant, Rampart Boulevard Company. Strong & Dickinson never gave to Nolan any copies of this unauthorized map. He secured them without their knowledge from their office, and when they knew that he had possession of some of them they went to his place of business, gathered up all that could be found, and destroyed them. Moreover, the writing which Wicks received from Nolan when he made his deposit on account of the purchase price declared expressly that it was not a contract of sale. The evidence shows that to enter into such a contract it became necessary for the plaintiff to call upon Strong & Dickinson, and he did so. In the negotiations with Mr. Dickinson which resulted in the executory contract of sale into which Mr. Wicks finally entered, the official map of the tract was before the parties. This official map showed that there was no such street as Second street, and the contract which was entered into made express reference to this official map. Thereafter the plaintiff with the consent of the defendant owner of the land abandoned this executory contract, and negotiated with the defendant for a new purchase, a purchase embracing less land than that called for by his original contract. Under this arrangement the earlier contracts were surrendered, and he took a deed to one lot as delineated upon the official map, the plaintiff upon this matter himself testifying that the original contracts were all surrendered at the time he accepted his deed, and that before he got his deed he knew that the recorded map referred to in his contract and in his deed did not show that the disputed strip was a street, and did show it as being two lots; that at the time he took his deed he made no objection to having the property deeded by reference to the map; "I was not counting on a street; all I counted on myself was a crosswalk."

Though the evidence discloses more than this, here is enough to support the finding which the court made against plaintiff's contention. This finding is of determinative consequence and renders unnecessary the consideration of any other proposition the appellant advances.

The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

Ex parte BRITT. (Cr. 2066.)

1. Habeas Corpus 🔑99(1)—Detention of Infants—Sufficiency of Evidence.

A writ of habeas corpus by a father to obtain custody of his minor child in the care of her grandaunt denied, owing to special circumstances of father's character and ability, child's inclination, and her present surroundings.

2. Habeas Corpus 🔑3—Detention of Infants—Nature of Controversy.

A controversy over the custody of a minor child in the care of her aunt arising on the father's petition for habeas corpus should have been settled in a guardianship proceeding or on application for adoption.

In Bank. Petition for writ of habeas corpus by Andrew J. Britt to obtain custody of his daughter, Ruby Britt. Petition denied and writ discharged.

Cecil H. Phillips, of San Bernardino, for petitioner. McNabb & Hodge, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Andrew J. Britt, father of Ruby Britt, a minor child of the age of seven years, sought to obtain the custody of his daughter, who is now in the care of her grandaunt, Amanda Starkweather, a resident of this state. Upon his petition a writ of habeas corpus was issued, and the matter has been heard upon record evidence, stipulated facts, and depositions.

It appears that Britt and his wife and child resided at Kansas City, Mo., where he was employed as a night watchman and a painter. On the 7th of July, 1910, Mrs. Britt, who had been in failing health, went to Colorado in the hope that the change would benefit her. Andrew Britt, according to his own testimony accompanied her to the train, having given her the money necessary for the journey, and he kissed her good-bye. Within a very few weeks after her departure he filed a verified complaint charging her with adultery and also with deserting him on the 7th of July, 1910, the day upon which she had departed with his full approbation. We cite this incident as one of the indices to the character of Andrew Britt which this record furnishes. Mrs Britt did not know of the existence of this complaint until September, 1911, as she deposed in her verified answer and cross-bill.

Notwithstanding the filing of his complaint, shortly after it was filed, and very soon after Mrs. Britt's return to Kansas City, Mo., a reconciliation took place, and the Britts lived together for some months; she being still ignorant of the pendency of the action for divorce. Britt, in his testimony before our commissioner, places the time during which they then lived together at a year or "a little over." He then went to California, where he remained for six months. During that time he contributed nothing to the support of the child or the mother, although he says he sent $30 for taxes and interest due on his property and the mortgage thereon.

During his absence Mrs. Britt filed an answer and cross-bill in the action for divorce, and on January 8, 1912, her prayer was granted, and the custody of the minor child was awarded to her. She was also given alimony in the sum of $800—an obligation subsequently met by Britt by the transfer to her of his interest in the equity in their home. The decree of divorce was given by the circuit court of Jackson county, Mo.

After his sojourn in California petitioner returned to Kansas City, but did not contribute to the support of his child, because, as he said, he was not given opportunity to see her whenever he wanted to do so. The testimony of Mrs. Martin, the child's grandmother, shows that at that time Mrs. Britt was having a hard struggle to support herself, and Mrs. Martin, although a poor woman, was aiding her in the care of the little girl. Of course, petitioner was not legally bound to care for the child at that time, but his conduct in the premises indicates that his feeling for the infant was not warmly paternal.

After some months of struggle Mrs. Britt, who had become a victim of tuberculosis, went to Colorado Springs. Britt paid her fare, and shortly after her departure with their child he followed her, with the understanding that they were to remarry. Not obtaining work in Colorado Springs, Britt went to Los Angeles, and after securing employment there sent for his former wife, who went to Los Angeles, where they lived ostensibly as man and wife for 2½ months. This relation, which Britt characterizes as "a try-out proposition," was severed because he objected to Mrs. Britt's association with some woman who was their neighbor and Mrs. Britt refused to give up the friendship. He left her without money in a strange city, far from her friends, and although he declares that she refused his offers of money made a few days later when he returned to their apartment, which she still occupied, the fact remains that Mrs. Starkweather, Mrs. Britt's aunt, who is the respondent here, paid the expenses of the journey to Kansas City, Kan. (just over the state line from Kansas City, Mo.), where Mrs. Martin resided. Mrs. Britt, who had visited for a short time with Mrs. Starkweather at San Bernardino, reached Kansas City, Kan., in April, 1913. She went to work, but left the child with Mrs. Martin, who had the little one until Mrs. Starkweather took Ruby to California under circumstances which we shall presently discuss.

Mrs. Britt died in April, 1914. Two weeks before that time Mr. Britt gave the grandmother $10 and promised her $10 a month for the support of the child. According to Mrs. Martin's testimony, his entire subsequent contributions for care and clothing for Ruby amounted to not more than $30 or $40. He asserts that he gave more money than that, but admits that his payments ceased in June, 1914, because he was not given full opportunity to visit his daughter.

Mrs. Martin, who, according to her testimony, had become desperately poor by reason of the loss of the support formerly afforded her by her husband and son, both of whom had died, began proceedings in the juvenile court of Wyandotte county, Kan., alleging in her affidavit that Ruby Britt was an abandoned child, her mother being dead and her father "having practically abandoned her for several years." A hearing was had, and Harriet B. Cole was appointed guardian of the person of the little girl. This order was made on June 28, 1915. Ten days later Andrew J. Britt applied for a hearing in the matter on the ground of falsity in the averments of Mrs. Martin's application and on the ground that he was entitled to the custody of the child, Ruby Britt. After citation to the child two hearings were had, and the court overruled the motion with costs taxed against Britt.

In October, 1915, Amanda E. Starkweather applied for an order of adoption, and, the guardian consenting, the probate court of Wyandotte county, Kan., declared Ruby Britt duly adopted by Mrs. Starkweather. Immediately after this order was made, Mrs. Starkweather brought Ruby to California, and since that time, as the evidence abundantly shows, has given her all the care, affection, and nurture that a mother might bestow. The little girl has been somewhat afflicted, suffering at times with a weakness of the ankles requiring that braces be worn on them. Mrs Starkweather is a woman of means, and has surrounded the child with the comforts as well as the good moral influences of an excellent home.

Petitioner learned of the adoption proceedings soon after the order was made, but he took no steps to get possession of his child, and made no demand upon Mrs. Starkweather until he came to California about a year later. He testifies that the delay was due to the fact that he was saving money for the fight for the recovery of possession of his child.

It appears without contradiction that the little girl has a great love for Mrs. Starkweather and a distinct aversion to petitioner.

[1, 2] We have thus recited the facts, perhaps at unnecessary length, for the purpose of indicating that this is a controversy which should have been settled in a guardianship proceeding or on an application for adoption of the minor. It is conceded by counsel for respondent that the order of the probate court in Kansas was made without jurisdiction because Mrs. Starkweather was not a resident of that state and could not under its laws adopt the minor. But it does not follow that upon proceedings under a writ of habeas corpus this court will award the custody of the child to the father. Where, under appropriate proceedings, a parent has been declared a fit and proper custodian of the person of a child, this court has been inflexible in the enforcement of the parental right, and has never allowed its judgments to be swayed by the poverty of the parent as compared with the affluence of the person from whom the child is demanded. Likewise the court has frequently ignored the affection of the child for the custodian and the manifest dislike of the minor for the parent. But in every instance we have done this under the plain mandate of our guardianship laws. We might cite many authorities upon this point, but the rule both in guardianship proceedings and in those taken under writs of habeas corpus is well illustrated by such cases as Guardianship of Mathews, 169 Cal. 26, 145 Pac. 503, Guardianship of Mathews, 164 Pac. 8, and In re Mathews, 167 Pac. 873, Crim. No. 1997, in which the opinion was filed September 17, 1917. But here we are not impelled to put into operation the decree of a court establishing the fitness of a parent for the custody and control of a child. It is very unlikely that any court, upon application for letters of guardianship, would pronounce this petitioner, in view of such evidence as that which has been presented to this court, a suitable person for the control, education, and rearing of the little girl, his daughter, Ruby Britt. The court of proper jurisdiction in Missouri deprived him of the custody of his child in the suit for divorce. The juvenile court in Kansas to which he applied for the further hearing in the guardianship matter refused to set aside its order previously given and made; such refusal following two hearings held after the case was reopened. Every time his fitness has been the subject of judicial inquiry the court has determined that he was not the proper person to possess and control his child. While he may be able to give the child the necessaries of life, he declares his purpose to be, if given custody of her, to place her with a man and his wife whose duties call them away from home every night until a late hour. He purposes to dwell in the same house, but his duties as a janitor would take him away from the child frequently at night. The words of the late Chief Justice Beatty in denying a petition for a writ in a case similar to this (In re Gates, 95 Cal. 461, 30 Pac. 596) are entirely appropriate here. He said:

> "In view of the special circumstances of the case, I do not feel called upon to make any coercive order by which the mere legal right of the petitioner may be enforced against the child's manifest inclination and reasonable choice to remain where she is."

The same doctrine has been announced by the District Court of Appeal. In the Matter of the Application of Bell, 28 Cal. App. 547, 153 Pac. 240. These cases are to be carefully distinguished from those in which, after hearings held for the very purpose of determining the fitness or unfitness of a parent, courts have awarded the custody of a child. They are also quite different from those cases in which the demand for the possession of a child is supported by a showing of ability, willingness, and sincere effort to perform parental duty. In the matter before us it appears that the petitioner's fitness has been denied in judicial proceedings more than once; that for a long time he showed no desire for the society of his child; that he withheld from her assistance when a really affectionate parent would have offered it; and that after Mrs. Starkweather, doubtless in the utmost good faith and in the full belief that she was within the sanction of the law, had taken the child into her household, he waited long months before he asserted his supposed right as a parent to provide a home for his little daughter. These are some of the "special circumstances" which operate in favor of our refusal to make the "coercive order" which petitioner seeks.

The prayer of the petitioner is denied, and the writ is discharged.

REINHARDT v. REITZ. (Sac. 2357.)

1. MALICIOUS PROSECUTION ⟹32—MALICE—EVIDENCE.

Want of probable cause does not raise a presumption of malice; but malice must be proved like any other fact in the case.

2. MALICIOUS PROSECUTION ⟹71(3) — ABSENCE OF MALICE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Evidence in malicious prosecution held sufficient to go to the jury on the want of malice.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR ⟹1064(1)—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

The evidence warranting the jury in finding want of malice, error in instructing that the law presumes malice from want of probable cause is not harmless.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Glenn County; Wm. M. Finch, Judge.

Action by Walter Reinhardt against John Reitz. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Frank Freeman, of Willow, for appellant. Ben F. Geis and Claude F. Purkitt, both of Willow, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. From a judgment rendered in an action brought for malicious prosecution defendant presents this appeal. The plaintiff was arrested and lodged in jail upon the filing of a complaint by defendant in a justice's court charging him with the crime of burglary. When the preliminary examination was had, the plaintiff was discharged, whereupon he brought this action to recover damages for injury to his reputation and good name and for money expended for counsel fees in defending himself against the charge. The action was tried before a jury, and a verdict rendered for $575 and costs.

It appears from the evidence that the defendant is a German who was at the time of the arrest of the plaintiff not familiar with the law or with the practice of the courts touching matters involved. For several years prior to and at the time of the alleged burglary in the commission of which it was claimed certain money belonging to defendant was taken, he was conducting a saloon in the town of Willows. His money was always kept hidden in various places in the saloon. Besides some change kept in a cash register, it was his practice to place about $30 in gold under a bottle on what was called the back bar. His bartenders used this money when necessary for the making of extra change. The balance of the gold the defendant concealed among the barrels, boxes, and other articles stored in the cellar of his saloon, the sole entrance to which was through a trap door in the floor of the main barroom. At the time of the burglary he had thus secreted in the cellar about $800 in gold. He usually attended to his business alone, and did his own janitor work, but occasionally employed others to assist in tending bar. These bartenders did not have occasion to go into the cellar, for the defendant always brought up the liquors himself and personally replenished the bottles on the bar for the daily consumption. For nearly five weeks the plaintiff had been thus employed to tend bar. He was a fellow countryman, was married, had several children, and according to the defendant's testimony, had told him that his trade in Germany was that of a locksmith. The plaintiff denies having made any such statement. Although the defendant testified that he often sent the plaintiff into the cellar in the course of his employment, the latter declared that the only time he went there was with a customer who was looking for a barrel, and that he did not then see any money. The evidence does not show that the plaintiff ever had knowledge of any money being kept in the cellar. Part of his duties consisted in opening the saloon in the morning. For this purpose he had been supplied with keys to the front and rear doors which remained in his possession during the period of his employment.

Plaintiff was compelled to find other employment because the defendant told him that he would do the work himself. Plaintiff found work with one Dave Proulx, a rival saloon keeper, who had a place of business on the same street, and also did janitor work for various persons, including one W. H. Markham. As tending to show defendant's ill will toward plaintiff, testimony was introduced to the effect that many of his former customers had followed plaintiff and given their trade to the Proulx saloon. The defendant was heard to complain that "Walter," meaning the plaintiff, "ran my business down." However, after dispensing with plaintiff's services, defendant continued to do his own work.

It further appears that on Monday morning, the day of the burglary, defendant entered his saloon by the back door, as was his custom, the other doors all being securely locked and bolted from the inside, and discovered gravel on the floor leading to the cellar entrance and to the back of the bar. He had thoroughly cleaned the saloon the night before. His suspicions being aroused he immediately looked for his money, which he had last seen on the preceding Saturday evening, and discovered that all of it had been taken. There was evidence tending to show that the place had been burglarized, and that the burglar had gained admission by unlocking the rear door. The door was secured by two locks, and required two keys to open it. The defendant testified that he called the city marshal. With him came Markham, who told defendant that plaintiff had not appeared at his place of business to do the janitor work, nor at Proulx's saloon, where he was then employed. Defendant also testified that he then recalled what plaintiff had told him about his trade as a locksmith, and stated to the marshal that he suspected the plaintiff had stolen the money. Markham suggested that a warrant be sworn out, and the marshal assured defendant it was the proper thing to do. But at the trial defendant testified:

> "I didn't want to arrest him. I wanted the house [Reinhardt's home] searched. I didn't know the difference between a warrant and a search warrant."

At all events it appears that he applied at the justice's court for a warrant against the plaintiff, and was afterwards informed that the plaintiff had been arrested and lodged in jail. Not being able to raise the required bail, plaintiff was kept imprisoned for three days. In the meanwhile the district attorney, without consulting defendant, prepared a search warrant and requested him to sign an affidavit for the purpose of having it issued, which defendant did. Plaintiff's house was searched, but no part of the missing money was found, nor any evidence secured against him. And at the preliminary examination the magistrate found that there was not sufficient cause to believe plaintiff guilty of the offense charged.

[1] The principal point urged by appellant is that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict in so far as it implies a finding of want of probable cause for plaintiff's arrest, and the existence of malice. But we are not called upon to consider the sufficiency of the evidence, for the judgment must be reversed upon another ground. The court below erroneously instructed the jury that:

> "If there was no probable cause for the prosecution, the law presumes malice on the part of John Reitz. Prosecution without sufficient grounds and without probable cause, the result of which is the discharge of the prosecuted, raises the presumption of malice."

This statement of the law is not correct. The proper rule is as stated by the court in another instruction:

> "Malice must be proven the same as any other fact in the case. The want of probable cause does not raise a legal presumption of malice." Runo v. Williams, 162 Cal. 444, 122 Pac. 1082.

[2, 3] We have set out the evidence somewhat at length in order to determine whether the giving of the erroneous instruction was prejudicial error. In our opinion the state of the evidence will not warrant the conclusion that the jury could not, under proper instructions, have found a want of malice.

Judgment reversed.

ADAMS v. PRATHER et al. (S. F. 8054.)

APPEAL AND ERROR ⇐843(2)—BOND ON APPEAL—SUBSEQUENT APPEAL.

On appeal from order staying execution of judgment directing delivery of real property, the court will not review trial court's alleged noncompliance with Code Civ. Proc. § 945, requiring undertaking on appeal covering value and use of property pending appeal, where judgment has already been affirmed upon a former appeal; the question being merely an abstract proposition of law, and plaintiff's remedy being to apply for a writ of mandate if necessary to compel the trial court to conform its statutory duty in regard to the bond.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by Edson F. Adams, as executor of will of Thomas Prather, against Samuel D. Prather and others. Plaintiff appeals from order approving undertaking on appeal to stay execution and from order staying execution of judgment in his favor. Appeal dismissed.

See, also, 167 Pac. 534.

Corbet & Selby, of San Francisco, Snook & Church, of Oakland, and J. P. O'Brien, of San Francisco, for appellant. Chapman & Trefethan, of Oakland, and R. H. Countryman, of San Francisco, for respondent.

VICTOR E. SHAW, Judge pro tem. The action was brought by plaintiff as executor on behalf of creditors of Thomas Prather, deceased, to have certain conveyances of real property made by him without consideration to defendant Samuel D. Prather declared fraudulent and void. Judgment was entered as prayed for, declaring the conveyances and transfers of the property "fraudulent and void as against the creditors of Thomas Prather, deceased," and authorizing plaintiff, upon obtaining an order so to do from the superior court sitting in probate, to sell so much of the property as might be necessary to pay said creditors "in the same manner as if the said Thomas Prather had died seised thereof." By the decree "it is further ordered that the defendant Samuel D. Prather deliver to said plaintiff, as such executor, for the purposes aforesaid, all of said properties, real and personal, hereinbefore set forth and described, to be sold and applied in the manner aforesaid." On March 20, 1916, defendant Samuel D. Prather perfected an appeal from this judgment, and, desiring to stay execution thereof, presented and filed a duly executed undertaking, the sole condition of which was that during his possession of the real estate described in the decree he would protect it from waste. Thereupon the court, on June 1, 1916, made an order that execution of the judgment from which the appeal was prosecuted be stayed pending a determination thereof. From the order so made plaintiff has appealed, his contention being that the judgment directs the delivery of possession of real property as to which defendant was not, under the provisions of section 945 of the Code of Civil Procedure, entitled to a stay of execution, save and except upon filing an undertaking to the effect that he would, if the judgment was affirmed or the appeal dismissed, pay the value of the use and occupation of the property during the possession thereof and until delivery of the same pursuant to the judgment.

The judgment from which Samuel D. Prather prosecuted his appeal was affirmed by an opinion of this court (167 Pac. 534), filed on August 31, 1917. Hence, should we hold in accordance with appellant's contention that the trial judgment should have required an undertaking covering the value of the use and occupation of the property pending the appeal, it would be an idle act and serve no purpose, since the judgment, the stay of execution of which was sought, having been affirmed, there is nothing upon which such order for an undertaking, if made, could operate. The issue presented by the appeal is a mere abstract proposition of law, as it must be in all such cases where the court refuses to require the giving of the statutory undertaking to stay execution of judgment. The nature of the case is such that the only adequate remedy of an aggrieved party is, as was said by this court in Doudell v. Shoo, 158 Cal. 50, 109 Pac. 615:

> "If the judge of the court below refuses to perform his plain statutory duty in this respect, the remedy of the appellant is to apply to this court for a writ of mandate to compel him to do so."

For the reasons given, the appeal is dismissed.

ATCHISON, T. & S. F. RY. CO. v. WEST.

(L. A. 4024.)

1. Work and Labor ⚷10—Payment—Recovery — Necessity of Recording Contract.

Where written contracts, under which a railroad contractor did work, were not recorded, the road could nevertheless recover against the contractor for excessive payments over and above the contract price paid the contractor by mistake, the contract price measuring the amount the contractor was entitled to retain notwithstanding the law's declaration that for nonrecordation such a contract is void.

2. Payment ⚷89(5)—Payment by Mistake—Sufficiency of Evidence.

In a railroad's action against its contractor for work on its right of way to recover excessive payments made by mistake, evidence held sufficient to show mistake.

3. Contracts ⚷292—Decision of Umpire—Fraud.

Where, by the contract between a railroad and one doing work for it, the action of the road's chief engineer in approving vouchers in payment for work done was final and conclusive upon the parties, the binding effect of his decision was vitiated by fraud of the grand division engineer and of the voucher clerk, inducing mistake by the chief engineer.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Benjamin F. Bledsoe, Judge.

Action by the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Company, a corporation, against George W. West. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order refusing motion for new trial, defendant appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

Anderson & Anderson, of Los Angeles, and Chas. L. Allison, of San Bernardino, for appellant. E. W. Camp, U. T. Clotfelter, M. W. Reed, and A. H. Van Cott, all of Los Angeles, and Leonard & Surr, of San Bernardino, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff charged that it entered into a contract with defendant for the doing of certain work on its railroad right of way. This work, in general terms, was to widen cuts and fills. The doing of it necessitated upon the part of the contractor the movement of materials of different character—earth, cemented material, and solid rock. These materials were measured by the cubic yard. The contractor was to receive different prices for the handling of the different materials. Thus the softer earth of the embankment was to be paid for at 20 cents, and the hardpan of the embankment at 32 cents per cubic yard. "Extra cement material" was to be paid for at 62 cents per cubic yard. Solid rock was to be paid for at 75 cents per cubic yard. In different causes of action plaintiff charged overpayments to its contractor on account of the work which he had performed. In some of these causes of action the charge of overpayment was based upon mutual mistake; in others upon fraud perpetrated upon plaintiff by the defendant and by the engineer employed by plaintiff to make estimates of the amount and character of the work done by defendant. The total amount thus overpaid defendant by plaintiff was alleged to be $22,797. The cause was tried before a jury which returned its verdict in favor of the plaintiff in the sum of $10,000. On this verdict judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff, and from that judgment and from the order of the court refusing to grant his motion for a new trial defendant appeals.

Broadly speaking, the evidence of plaintiff established its system of work and payments therefor. The plaintiff employed division engineers, and in the division of one of them, Bradley, the work here in question was performed. This division engineer (and others) reported to Mr. Arey, engineer of grand division, who, in turn, reported to Mr. Phillips, chief engineer. It was the duty of the division engineer, Mr. Bradley, to forward to Mr. Arey at the end of each month a statement of the amount and character of the work performed. If Mr. Arey was dissatisfied with this report in any particular and saw fit to revise or change it in any material respect, it became his duty to advise the chief engineer, Mr. Phillips, of this difference of view between himself and his division engineer. Differences did arise between Mr. Bradley and Mr. Arey. These differences resulted in changes made in Mr. Bradley's estimates of the character of the material moved, with the result, generally speaking, that Mr. Arey decreased the number of cubic yards of the earthy material which was to be paid for at 20 cents per cubic yard, and largely increased the estimates of rock, cemented material, and hardpan. Mr. Arey was the brother-in-law of the contractor, defendant West, and they were in communication with each other upon the subject of this work. Mr. Arey did not adopt the uniform and required practice of consulting with his chief engineer, Mr. Phillips, over these differences between himself and Mr. Bradley, but forwarded his estimates to the voucher clerk, who through fraudulent collusion or through gross mistake himself did not call the chief engineer's attention to any differences or discrepancies, but presented in the form of regular vouchers Mr. Arey's estimates thus made, for the chief engineer's approval. Thus they were approved. The further evidence of the plaintiff went to establish, and to the satisfaction of the jury did establish, plaintiff's contention and Mr. Bradley's estimates as to the character of the material moved by the contractor.

[1] We have, for the purposes of the legal considerations, thus sufficiently outlined the nature of the evidence. Appellant's first contention is that as the written contracts under which he did the work were not recorded, they were void in law and cannot be made the basis of any recovery. This contention, however, is in direct opposition to all adjudications. Laidlaw v. Marye, 133 Cal. 170, 65 Pac. 391; Sullivan v. Cal. R. Co., 142 Cal. 201, 75 Pac. 767; Condon v. Donohue, 160 Cal. 749, 118 Pac. 113; Mannix v. R. L., etc., Co., 166 Cal. 333, 136 Pac. 52. The gravamen of this action lies in the mistake whereby the contractor was paid over and above the contract price. It has ever been held that notwithstanding the declaration of the law that for nonrecordation such a contract is void, yet the contract price measures the contractor's right of recovery. Here we have the reverse of the proposition. The contract price equally measures the amount which the contractor is entitled to retain. Appellant next contends that the contracts were incomplete, inchoate, and therefore of no legal efficacy. The contracts are of considerable length. A setting of them forth would establish their completeness and the unsoundness of appellant's contention in this regard. He signed them; he did his work under them; no other question is presented save whether or not he was overpaid under the plain and unambiguous terms of the contract. This should suffice without exemplification of the contracts in full.

[2] Next, appellant contends that the evidence is insufficient to show any mistake. We have sufficiently outlined the character of the mistake. Indeed, it is but kindness to call it a mistake, since the evidence very clearly establishes a fraud upon the part of Arey and the voucher clerk, which fraud, however, was not with sufficient directness made chargeable against the defendant. Appellant's argument in this respect is that the contracts made the chief engineer "the final umpire in all questions which may arise relative to work done under this contract." Then follow aspersions upon the competency and credibility of this chief engineer, the like of which this court regrets to say are of all too frequent occurrence in the briefs presented by appellant's counsel. Thus it is said that the chief engineer "seeks to evade his responsibilities in the premises by a claim of gross carelessness and utter incompetence on his part—a claim fully justified in every possible particular if his testimony is worthy of any credence whatever by any tribunal of ordinary intelligence." It is then argued that by reason of this asserted incompetency the chief engineer delegated full authority to Mr. Arey to pass judgment upon these matters, and that Mr. Arey having done so, his judgment is final. The brief statement of facts which we have heretofore made wholly disposes of such a contention.

[3] Appellant complains of the refusal of the court to give instructions which were to the effect that as under the contracts the chief engineer of the company was the final umpire in all questions which might arise relative to the work done, and as he had approved the vouchers in payment for the work done, his action was final and conclusive upon the parties. It scarcely needs the citation of authority to support the declaration that the binding effect of such an umpire's decision is wholly vitiated by fraud, and that while the chief engineer actually approved these vouchers by mistake, that mistake was induced by the deliberate misconduct amounting to fraud of the engineer Arey and the voucher clerk Graham. The instructions were therefore properly refused.

For these reasons the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

BRAUN v. KAHN et al. (S. F. 8055.)

1. Vendor and Purchaser 🔑266(7)—Vendor's Lien—Waiver.

The bringing of an action upon an obligation given by the vendee for the price of real estate and the recovery of a judgment and issuance and levy of an execution on the land subject to the vendor's lien is not a waiver or extinguishment of the lien, particularly where such land has been protected from ordinary executions by a homestead declaration.

2. Vendor and Purchaser 🔑280(1)—Vendor's Lien—Enforcement—Complaint.

Under Civ. Code, § 3046, providing that one who sells real property has a vendor's lien thereon for so much of the price as remains unpaid and unsecured otherwise than by the personal obligation of the buyer, where a complaint in an action to enforce a vendor's lien set forth the fact that plaintiff claimed the lien for the balance of the price for which the purchaser's note had been given, it was sufficient against a general demurrer, though not expressly alleging that plaintiff had or was entitled to a lien "for so much of the price as remains unpaid and unsecured otherwise than by the personal obligation of the buyer."

3. Vendor and Purchaser 🔑266(1)—Vendor's Lien—Waiver.

To constitute a waiver of a vendor's lien, there must be some act or omission on the part of the vendor inconsistent with his assertion of the lien and evincing his intention to waive it and such as would render it inequitable to thereafter attempt to assert the lien.

4. Vendor and Purchaser 🔑285(2)—Vendor's Lien—Enforcement—Judgment.

A judgment in an action to enforce a vendor's lien was not defective because it did not provide for the procedure or for redemption upon foreclosure of the lien; as the Code provides the procedure and its sections are to be read into the judgment.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Wm. H. Waste, Judge.

Action by William Braun against Emilie Kahn and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. H. Morrissey, of San Francisco, for appellants. Walter R. Dunn, of Oakland, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The appeal is from a judgment declaring and enforcing a vendor's lien in favor of the plaintiff upon certain property sold by the plaintiff to the defendant Emilie Kahn.

The appeal was taken to the District Court of Appeal, and in that court in due time the judgment was affirmed upon an opinion prepared by Mr. Justice Richards.

The petition for a rehearing was granted, not so much from dissatisfaction with that opinion, as from the fact that the appeal had been taken to the wrong court, and the District Court was without jurisdiction, and the further fact that our own decisions regarding the essentials of a waiver of a vendor's lien were in considerable confusion, and it was thought best that a decision be made by this court.

[1] The proposition that the bringing of an action upon an obligation given by the vendee for the purchase money of real estate, and the recovery of a judgment thereon for such purchase money, does not extinguish the vendor's lien, is established throughout the country with practical unanimity. In addition to the authorities cited in the opinion of Justice Richards, we cite the following: 39 Cyc. 1841; 29 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 753, 768; 2 Sugden on Vendors, bottom page 679; 2 Warvelle on Vendors, § 701; 2 Jones on Liens, § 1076; Richardson v. Green, 46 Ark. 271; Yetter v. Fitts, 113 Ind. 34, 14 N. E. 707. The rule being, as stated in the opinion of the District Court, that the vendor's lien is not waived by a judgment unless the vendor has exhausted his remedy by execution upon the property, it follows that the mere issuance and levy of an execution on the land subject to the vendor's lien, particularly where such land has been protected from ordinary executions by a homestead declaration, does not amount to a waiver of the vendor's lien.

[2-4] We are satisfied with the discussion of the case in the opinion of the District Court, and hereby adopt the same as the opinion of this court. It reads as follows:

"Concerning the facts of the case there is no material dispute. In August, 1912, the defendant Emilie Kahn purchased from the plaintiff the premises in question, together with certain building materials stored thereon, for the lump sum of $3,450, paying the sum of $3,000 in cash, and giving the plaintiff her promissory note for the balance of the purchase price of said property in the sum of $450, payable six months after date. On January 3, 1914, Emilie Kahn married Hugo Sander, and on the same day made and executed a declaration of homestead in her new name upon the property, which was duly recorded on January 5, 1914. The declaration of homestead as thus made and recorded did not disclose the name under which she had acquired the property. On December 17, 1914, the note still remaining unpaid, the plaintiff brought suit upon it without alleging or proving the existence of his vendor's lien, and presently took a default judgment against the defendant therein (Emilie Kahn), upon which judgment he had issued and caused to be levied an execution upon the property sold by him to her, but took no further action looking to a sale of the property upon such execution. On February 24, 1915, the plaintiff commenced the present action, setting forth in his complaint the previous judgment, and alleging the same to have been recovered upon the note which had been taken for the unpaid portion of the purchase price of the property, claiming a vendor's lien thereon, and praying for a recovery upon said judgment and for a sale of the property to satisfy such lien. The defendants demurred to the complaint generally, and also moved for judgment on the pleadings upon the ground that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and also upon the ground that the plaintiff had waived his vendor's lien by his failure to claim the same in his previous suit. The demurrer was overruled, and the motion denied, whereupon the defendants answered, denying the existence of the vendor's lien, and also averring that the note had been given for the building materials which had gone with the sale of the real property, and not for any portion of the latter's purchase price. Upon the issues thus framed a jury found a verdict in plaintiff's favor as to the existence of the debt, which verdict the court adopted, and further decreed that a vendor's lien still existed in plaintiff's favor, and for the foreclosure of which it was directed that an execution issue and the property be sold. It is from this judgment that the appellants prosecute this appeal.

"The first contention of the appellants is that their demurrer to the plaintiff's complaint should have been sustained and their motion for judgment on the pleadings granted, upon the ground that the complaint failed to state a cause of action for the assertion and foreclosure of a vendor's lien for the reason that the complaint contained no express allegation that the plaintiff had or was entitled to a vendor's lien 'for so much of the price as remains unpaid and unsecured otherwise than by the personal obligation of the buyer.' The appellants insist that the above-quoted words from section 3046 of the Civil Code should have been embodied in the complaint in order to state a cause of action. But an inspection of the complaint shows that it does set forth the fact that the plaintiff claims his vendor's lien for the balance of the purchase price of the property for which the defendant Emilie Kahn's personal note had been given, and we think these averments render the complaint sufficient as against a general demurrer.

"The appellants urge the further ground of error on the part of the court in overruling their demurrer and denying their motion for judgment on the pleadings and rendering judgment on the trial for the affixation and foreclosure of the lien, that the complaint not only shows upon its face, but the facts adduced at the trial prove, that the plaintiff had waived his vendor's lien by bringing a personal action and obtaining a personal judgment on the promissory note and by the issuance and levy of an execution thereon. This presents the only material question involved in the case.

"In support of this contention the appellants earnestly insist that, the plaintiff having chosen to take a personal judgment against the defendant Emilie Kahn which would operate as a judgment lien upon all her property, and having caused to be issued thereon an execution, which has been levied upon the particular property in question, he has thereby waived his vendor's lien. In support of this contention the appellants cite the case of Fitzell v. Leaky, 72 Cal. 478-483, 14 Pac. 198, as subsequently approved in the case of Longmaid v. Coulter, 123 Cal. 209, 55 Pac. 791. An examination of those cases, however, discloses that they do not go to the extent which the appellant claims for them, and that they are not otherwise sufficiently authoritative to form precedents for the principle for which the appellants contend. The case of Fitzell v. Leaky was not an action to establish or foreclose a vendor's lien; and, as shown by the opinion of the court, it is very questionable whether there was any such thing as a vendor's lien involved in the controversy in that case; but in any event the language used therein upon which the appellants herein rely was pointed out to be obiter dicta by the Supreme Court in the later case of Selna v. Selna, 125 Cal. 357, 58 Pac. 16, 73 Am. St. Rep. 47; while as to the case of Longmaid v. Coulter, supra, the court, while quoting from the case of Fitzell v. Leaky, supra, the language upon which the appellant herein relies, shows on the face of the opinion that the question involved in this case was not before the court.

"In the case of Selna v. Selna, supra, the question before the court was as to whether the filing and allowance of a creditor's claim against the estate of the vendee without including the claim or statement of an existing vendor's lien, which creditor's claim became by its approval in the nature of a judgment against the estate of the decedent vendee, was not sufficient in itself to amount to a waiver of the vendor's lien. In that case the court, in deciding in favor of the persistence of the vendor's lien, and in declaring the ruling of the court in Fitzell v. Leaky to be dicta, goes on to say: 'It is stated by the authorities that, if the vendor recover a judgment at law and has not exhausted his remedy by execution, he is not precluded thereby from proceeding to enforce his equitable lien for the purchase money'—citing Walker v. Sedgwick, 8 Cal. 398–404, and Overton on Liens, 691.

"The true doctrine as outlined by these authorities in this state, and as fully sustained by the great weight of authority in other states, would seem to be that in order to constitute a waiver of a vendor's lien there must be some act or omission on the part of the vendor inconsistent with his assertion of the lien and evincing his intention to waive it, and that it must be such an act or omission as would render it inequitable to thereafter attempt to assert it; and it has accordingly been held quite uniformly that, in order that a personal judgment obtained by the vendor for the unpaid portion of the purchase price of the property may be held to operate as a waiver of the vendor's lien thereon, it must be affirmatively shown by the defendant resisting the lien that the vendee has property to which the lien of the judgment can attach or upon which the execution may be levied and which might thus serve as security for the debt. Zeigler v. Valley Coal Co., 150 Mich. 82, 113 N. W. 775, 13 Ann. Cas. 90; Roberts v. Bruce, 91 Ky. 379, 15 S. W. 872; Dowdy v. Blake, 50 Ark. 211, 6 S. W. 897, 7 Am. St. Rep. 88; Borror v. Carrier, 34 Ind. App. 367, 73 N. E. 123.

"The contention of the appellant that the judgment is not in proper form because it does not provide for the procedure for the same and redemption of the property upon foreclosure of the lien, is without merit. The Code provides the procedure, and its sections are to be read into the judgment."

Judgment affirmed.

1. Limitation of Actions 🔑24(4)—Limitations Applicable—Contracts of Sale.

Where vendors agreed in writing to repurchase the land conveyed by them if the purchaser became dissatisfied, and the purchaser, after tendering a deed of reconveyance, sued for damages for breach of the agreement to repurchase instead of suing for specific performance, the action was in assumpsit and having been brought in four years was in time.

2. Vendor and Purchaser 🔑84 — Agreement to Repurchase—Consideration.

Where vendors agreed to repurchase if the purchaser became dissatisfied the amount paid by the purchaser for the land was a consideration for the agreement to repurchase.

3. Vendor and Purchaser 🔑84 — Repurchase—Options—Exercise—Effect.

Where vendors agreed to repurchase if the purchaser became dissatisfied, the purchaser's notice to the vendors that he elected to accept the option created at once a bilateral contract relating back to the time of the original sale and binding the vendors to buy back the property.

4. Vendor and Purchaser 🔑84 — Agreement to Repurchase—Want or Failure of Consideration.

Where vendors agreed to repurchase the land sold at the price paid them if the purchaser became dissatisfied, and the purchaser tendered a deed reconveying all the right, title, and interest in the land which he received from the vendors, the vendors were in no position to claim that the title was not reasonably worth the sum at which they agreed to repurchase, because the title was void and based on an entry canceled by the government subsequent to the tender, as the contract in effect operated as an agreement founded upon an adequate consideration to guarantee the title.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. M. Conley, Judge.

Action by R. J. Parker against Thomas Beach and another. From a judgment for plaintiff and orders denying motions for a nonsuit and a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Flint, Gray & Barker, Gray, Barker & Bowen, and Wm. A. Bowen, all of Los Angeles, for appellants. Hunsaker & Britt, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. The appellants were partners in the real estate business, conducting it under the firm name of Beach & Dool. They dealt in government lands in Imperial valley, Cal. On July 9, 1908, in consideration of the sum of $4,000, they contracted to sell plaintiff 334.72 acres of desert land upon which one William De Legro had made entry on June 3, 1908, and, as part of the transaction and in order to close the deal, entered into a written contract with him. That contract, with the pertinent provisions italicized, reads in part as follows:

"Whereas, Thomas Beach and Edward Dool, a partnership, * * * are agents for William De Legro in the selling of certain government lands in Imperial Valley; and * * * are desirous of selling to R. J. Parker the property belonging to said William De Legro [describing it]; * * * and whereas, as a consideration for buying said property through the said agency of Beach & Dool, said Thomas Beach and Edward Dool, as an inducement to said R. J. Parker to buy said property, have agreed with said R. J. Parker that should he be dissatisfied with the purchase of the above described property, they will buy back the same for four thousand ($4,000) dollars at any time between February 1, 1909, and April 1st of the same year; together with seven per cent. (7%) interest on said amount, including the cost of improvements placed on said property by the sanction of Beach & Dool: Now therefore * * * said parties of the second part [the appellants], for and in consideration of the aforesaid understanding and agreement, agree with said party of the first part [the plaintiff] that if [he] is dissatisfied with said property, * * * or does not care to retain the ownership of the same, that they and each of them will purchase said property of the said party of the first part any time between the first of February, 1909, and April 1st of the same year, and will pay [plaintiff] the sum of four thousand ($4,000) dollars, together with seven (7%) per cent. interest per annum on said amount from the date of this agreement; [and] will further pay * * * any improvements placed upon said property hereinbefore described, to which they [defendants] have given their sanction in writing.

"* * * Should * * * [plaintiff] desire to avail himself of the privilege of having * * * [defendants] purchase said property from him between the dates hereinbefore specified, he will give [them] at least thirty (30) days' notice before said time expires of his intentions to ask them to purchase said property.

"(Dated) this 9th day of July 1908.

"[Signed] Thos. Beach.
"Edward Dool.
"R. J. Parker."

Plaintiff paid appellants the $4,000 asked for the desert land entry in several installments. On July 15th he received from defendants a deed of an assignment duly executed by De Legro transferring to him all his right, title, and interest therein. But when plaintiff, about three days later, sought to file in the land office the affidavit required by federal law of assignees of original entrymen, he was informed that the assignment was defective, as De Legro had filed the application upon land selected by the state as school land. An order to show cause why the entry should not be canceled was served on De Legro on July 21st. And appellants, on November 12, 1908, at plaintiff's suggestion, returned the check, amounting to $490, which he had given them in making the last payment on the purchase price of the land. With the check defendant Dool, one of the partners, sent a letter explaining:

> "We never felt like depositing it after we found the condition the filing was in on the land. I haven't had any talk with our attorneys regarding the condition of the case, but Mr. Beach saw Mr. Bowen a few days ago, and he said he thought you would get the land all right, and if any lawyers in the city can get it, I think they are the ones."

But on February 20, 1909, plaintiff served notice on appellants, stating that he was dissatisfied with the purchase of the property, and, in pursuance of the terms of their contract, desired them to buy it back for the sum agreed upon, less credit for the $490 which had been returned. At the same time plaintiff tendered appellants a grant, bargain, and sale deed, describing the property received from De Legro. Defendants refused to perform the agreement, or to refund any further part of the purchase price. It was not until October 7, 1909, that the entry originally made by De Legro was actually canceled. On June 7, 1912, plaintiff, renewing the tender of said grant deed, commenced this action for damages arising out of the breach of the contract. Judgment was recovered for $4,880.94 and costs. Defendants appeal therefrom, and also from the orders denying their motions for nonsuit and a new trial.

Appellants do not dispute the sale of the land to the plaintiff, the making of the contract here sued upon, their receipt of $4.000 in payment of the purchase price, or the total failure of the title. It is not in fact of any apparent concern to them that they took plaintiff's money, and that he received nothing of value in return. Yet they contend, with much vehemence of assertion extending throughout lengthy briefs, that they are not as matter of law liable for the damage caused him, nor in any wise bound to him under the contract. Their argument may be fairly epitomized as follows: The contract made with plaintiff is a unilateral agreement merely giving him an option to require defendants to buy land. The consideration named is solely for that purpose and for no other. Plaintiff, therefore, in consideration of having bought De Legro's land through them, received but their promise to enter into a second mutual agreement with him for the sale and purchase of a designated tract of land. This second obligation, which arose out of the exercise of the option by plaintiff, is not enforceable, in that it lacks mutuality. As shown by the facts, to enforce it would require defendants to forfeit to plaintiff nearly $5,000 for something he does not own. In other words, the agreement lacks consideration, for in return for the "appropriation" of defendants' money plaintiff offers merely a deed which admittedly conveys no title at all. This is equivalent to giving nothing. "The plain language of this contract directly opposes the idea of such a penalty." But if the agreement was enforceable it would avail plaintiff nothing, inasmuch as the law implies a warranty of title in every executory contract for the sale of land, and plaintiff, not having a title to convey, would not be entitled to retain such moneys as he might receive therefor. Even assuming that the defective claim to the property held by plaintiff constitutes a legal consideration, specific performance of defendants' agreement to pay him $4,000 and interest therefor cannot be enforced for the reason that such a consideration is grossly unjust, unreasonable, and inadequate. Nor can plaintiff give to the buyers a title free from reasonable doubt. "He must show an equitable, fair, mutual, and conscionable bargain founded upon an adequate consideration," and is unable to do so. Also the exercise of the option by plaintiff is based upon the performance by him of certain expressed conditions precedent, namely, "should he be dissatisfied with the purchase of the * * * property," or "dissatisfied with said property," or "does not care to retain the ownership of the same." These conditions must be interpreted in the sense of referring to "the practical, business and financial aspect of the trade, and not to its legal aspect." Particularly, it is to be noted that nothing is said about title. Hence, to substantially perform the conditions precedent it is essential that plaintiff first obtain the property, for what man can be dissatisfied with the purchase of, or decide not to retain the ownership of, what he has never received? Again, the contract provides that plaintiff give to defendants "at least thirty days notice" before April 1st of his intention to exercise the option to have defendants repurchase the property. Instead he gave notice 40 days before that time, and asked for immediate payment. Finally, as he has delayed bringing this action more than three years after the alleged expressed and positive repudiation of the contract, his claim is barred by inexcusable laches. From all this it must follow, so defendants argue, that plaintiff cannot hold them to their agreement.

[1-4] We have thus given at some length the ingenious arguments advanced by appellants. Manifestly, plaintiff's action is not founded in equity for specific performance, but in assumpsit for damages for breach of a written contract. His action brought within four years was in time. The $4,000 he paid defendants was as much consideration for their agreement to repurchase the property they had sold him as for the receipt of the assignment of the entry made by De Legro. The notice given defendants that he had elected to accept the option created at once a bilateral contract, relating back to the time of the original sale, binding them to buy back of him on or before April 1st for the sum specified the "property," which they had sold him. See Schulte v. Boulevard Gardens Land Co., 164 Cal. 467, 129 Pac. 582, 44 L. R. A. (N. S.) 156, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 1013. It was precisely of such property that plaintiff, in the performance of his obligation to convey back what he had originally purchased, tendered a deed. That the title was thereafter declared void, and the entry canceled by the government cannot alter the situation. Plaintiff's contract in no wise provides that he should perfect the title before defendants could be required to repurchase it. At the time of the tender, however, plaintiff still owned all the right, title, and interest in the desert land entry made by De Legro which he had received through the agency of the defendants. His deed to them was sufficient to reconvey such interest. Indeed, it might be held that as the contract refers to this property as "belonging to" De Legro, the truth of the recital must be deemed conclusive between the parties hereto. But irrespective of this the claim, such as it was, constituted salable property. It was conceivably of some value. And defendants, having in the deal culminating in the option contract, sold it to plaintiff for $4,000, are now in no position to contend, in defense of their failure to perform their agreement to repurchase it, that it is not reasonably worth that sum. Even if the property is not worth the amount of the purchase price, the clear import of defendants' agreement is that they undertook to save plaintiff entirely harmless from any loss. To that end they agreed to repurchase the "property" they had sold him at the purchase price agreed, together with interest thereon in the event he did not care, for any reason, to retain its ownership, or should become dissatisfied with it. The contract in effect operates as an agreement, founded upon an adequate consideration, to guarantee plaintiff's title, notwithstanding he may have made an attempt, upon their suggestion, prior to the sale, to examine the record thereof. This is obviously the legal effect which the parties contemplated. Any other conclusion would manifestly work an injustice upon plaintiff and render the express terms of the contract nugatory. The contentions of appellants are without merit.

Judgment and orders affirmed.

Ex parte MATHEWS. (Cr. 1997.)

1. HABEAS CORPUS ⚷99(6) — CUSTODY OF CHILD—MOTHER.

The fact that the affections of a minor child have become fixed on those having his custody so that he regards them as his parents and his mother as a stranger, and that it is to his best interest to remain with them, will not deprive her of the right to his custody, unless she has abandoned it or is found incompetent to perform the duties of guardianship.

2. HABEAS CORPUS ⚷99(1) — CUSTODY OF CHILD—STATUTE.

In the absence of any guardianship for a minor son, the mother, as the only parent making any claim, is entitled, under Civ. Code, § 197, to his custody.

3. HABEAS CORPUS ⚷99(1) — CUSTODY OF CHILD—PARENT.

Where the court decided in a guardianship proceeding in favor of the mother's right to the custody of her minor child, she was entitled to a writ of habeas corpus to recover its custody.

In Bank. In the matter of the application of Annie Mathews, on behalf of Gerald Mathews, a minor, for a writ of habeas corpus to determine the right to the minor's custody. Ordered that the minor be delivered into the custody of the petitioner.

See, also, 169 Cal. 26, 145 Pac. 503; 164 Pac. 8.

James L. Nagle and Olin L. Berry, both of San Francisco, for petitioner. W. B. Rinehart, of Oakland, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. This is a writ of habeas corpus to determine the right to the custody of the person of Gerald Mathews, the minor son of Annie Mathews, the petitioner for the writ. The boy is now in the custody of Warren A. Rouse and Carrie E. Rouse, his wife, and has been living with them during nearly the whole of his life. The contest over his custody has twice been before this court in another form.

Some years ago Warren A. Rouse filed an application in the superior court of Alameda county praying to be appointed guardian of the person and estate of said minor. The mother, Annie Mathews, opposed this application, and the court, after a hearing, made its order appointing Rouse guardian. Upon the mother's appeal, this court held that the parent, unless found incompetent, was entitled to the guardianship of her child, and that the evidence was not sufficient to support the finding that Mrs. Mathews was incompetent. The order of appointment was accordingly reversed. Guardianship of Mathews, 169 Cal. 26, 145 Pac. 503.

The matter went back for a second trial, which resulted in an order denying the application of Mr. Rouse for letters of guardianship. From this order Rouse appealed. While matters were in this condition, the mother, Annie Mathews, filed her petition for the issuance of the present writ. Upon the return the court concluded that a decision in the habeas corpus proceeding should not be made pending the final determination of the guardianship contest, and the matter was accordingly postponed to await such determination. On March 22, 1917, this court affirmed the order of the superior court denying letters of guardianship to Rouse. Guardianship of Mathews, 164 Pac. 8.

Thereupon the habeas corpus proceeding was restored to the calendar. At the hearing no new evidence was introduced; the case being submitted upon the record presented on the two appeals in the guardianship matter.

[1, 2] Under the views declared by this court in the two appeals to which we have referred, we think it must now be held that the mother of the child is entitled to its custody, and that her right should be enforced in this proceeding. Upon the second trial the superior court, after finding that the mother was not incompetent to discharge the duties of guardianship, declared "that the best interest of said minor child in respect to its temporal, mental, and moral welfare is that said child remain in the custody of the petitioner [Rouse]." It found, further, that the affections of the child had become "fixed to the extent that said minor child has come to regard the petitioner and said Carrie E. Rouse as his parents, and that said Annie Mathews, the respondent, to that extent is practically a stranger to him." But, as was distinctly held on the second appeal, these considerations do not, under our law, justify a court in depriving a parent of the custody of the child, unless such parent has abandoned the child, or is found incompetent to perform the duties of guardianship. There is no need to repeat what was said in our former decisions. They determined definitely that, under the facts here disclosed, Warren A. Rouse was not entitled to letters of guardianship. They carried with them the further conclusion that, if there had been any occasion for the mother to apply for letters of guardianship, she would have been entitled to the issuance of such letters. In the absence of any guardianship, she, as the only parent making any claim, is entitled to the custody of the child. Civ. Code, § 197.

[3] But the respondent Rouse takes the position that the court should not, on habeas corpus, enforce the "mere legal right" of the mother, as against the material advantage and the personal preference of the minor. The late Chief Justice Beatty took this position in denying a similar application, saying that he considered his duty to be fulfilled "by seeing that the child is freed from all illegal restraint, and leaving her free to go to the home of her choice." In re Gates, 95 Cal. 461, 30 Pac. 596. A like ruling has been made by the District Court of Appeal for the Second Appellate District. In re Bell, 28 Cal. App. 547, 153 Pac. 240.

If it be sound doctrine that a court or judge may, on habeas corpus, disregard an established legal right which would control the judgment in any other form of proceeding, we are nevertheless satisfied that the rule can have no just application here. The mother and Mr. Rouse have for years been conducting a litigation whose sole purpose was to adjudicate which of them was entitled to have the custody of the child. The present writ, issued while that litigation was pending, was held in abeyance until the pending proceeding was concluded. Evidently this court felt that the right of custody should be decided in the guardianship proceeding. It has there been decided in favor of the mother. She has obtained a final adjudication that she is entitled to the custody of the child, and this writ affords the only remedy which she has for enforcing her right. After this court has, in effect, remitted her to the prosecution of the guardianship proceeding, and she has prosecuted that proceeding to a successful conclusion, there can be no justification for denying her the substantial benefit of the right which she has thus established. If we felt at liberty to award the child to one or the other of the contending parties, strong reason could, no doubt, be urged for leaving the custody where it has been for so long a time. But, as was pointed out by this court in deciding the second appeal in the guardianship matter, the mother is entitled to the custody of the child unless, by abandonment, or in some other way specified in the Code, she has forfeited that right. Such is the policy of our statutory law, and we are not authorized to alter that policy or to go counter to it. The natural right and feelings of the mother must be regarded as superior to the feelings of those who have become attached to the child, or the desire of the child himself.

It is ordered that the minor be delivered into the custody of the petitioner.

SMITH v. McPHERSON. (L. A. 4019.)

1. Breach of Marriage Promise 🔑3—Right to Recover—Void Promise.

A promise of marriage by a man who is then married, contingent upon securing a divorce, is against the manifest policy of the law, and wholly void.

2. Breach of Marriage Promise 🔑3—Right to Recover—Void Promise.

But the mere fact that the original promise was made while defendant was married did not preclude recovery, where after his divorce through a long period of years he had taken plaintiff out of the state and had held her out as his wife, and, under repeated promises to marry her, had sustained illicit relations with her.

3. Breach of Marriage Promise 🔑18—Issues, Proof, and Variance.

In an action for breach of promise of marriage, where seduction is not alleged to enhance the damages, evidence thereof is not admissible.

4. Breach of Marriage Promise 🔑20—Inferential Promise.

When a man in effect announces to the world that he is married to a woman, a reasonable inference may be drawn that at least he has promised to marry her.

5. Limitation of Actions 🔑146(1) — Oral Promise to Marry.

In view of Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 3, providing that a contract with mutual promises to marry may be oral, Code Civ. Proc. § 360, as to limitation of actions on new promise, requiring it to be in writing, does not apply to promises to marry especially where the original promise is often repeated, and defendant thereby secures sexual intercourse with plaintiff.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. A. Sloane, Judge.

Action by Lorena Fay Smith against A. W. McPherson, as administrator of the estate of William E. McPherson, deceased. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. S. Torrance, James E. O'Keefe, and C. H. Van Winkle, all of San Diego, and Robert J. Adcock, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Adam Thompson, of San Diego, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This action was brought to recover damages for the breach of a promise of marriage. The complaint averred that on the 4th day of November, 1912, plaintiff and defendant, both being in all respects competent to enter in the marriage state, agreed to marry, and that defendant promised to marry plaintiff; that from time to time thereafter he renewed this promise, until finally, on the 13th day of August, 1913 he violated his promise, and refused either then or thereafter to marry plaintiff. Trial was had before a jury, which gave its verdict in the sum of $10,000 for plaintiff. From the judgment which followed, and from the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, this appeal has been taken.

The evidence on behalf of plaintiff established that, when she was a girl a little over 15 years of age and defendant was conducting a hotel in Portland, Or., she was employed therein as housekeeper or manager. Defendant represented to her that he was unmarried, and on his promise to marry her she permitted him to have sexual intercourse with her. This was in 1902. She thereafter learned that he was married, but that his wife had begun an action for divorce against him. She permitted this relationship to continue under his repeated promises that he would marry her when his wife had secured a divorce and he was a free man. His wife did secure a divorce and married again. The defendant then came to California, bringing plaintiff with him, and engaged in the hotel business in San Diego and in other places. This relationship between them continued, saving that in California the defendant represented her to be his wife; they held themselves out to the world as husband and wife, and acted in all respects as husband and wife. From time to time he renewed his promise of marriage, naming in each instance the date when the marriage would take place. As the time arrived he would put her off by fixing another date. She had entered into this relationship with him in childhood; it had continued ever since; she felt unable to break away; she hoped each time he would fulfill his promise; but each time he had disappointed her. In 1912 he told her "not to worry; that everything would be all right; that they would get married in three months' time." Plaintiff's testimony to this effect is corroborated by a witness who was present at this conversation. Finally, in August, 1913, when plaintiff was confined to her bed, defendant said to her in the presence of the same witness:

> "Although I have promised to marry you several times, I have no such intentions of doing so, and I never will; you and my people can go to hell, as far as I am concerned. Mebel here is a friend to both of us, and I suppose she is wise enough to keep her mouth shut."

Thereafter plaintiff brought this action.

[1, 2] Appellant contends that, as the original promise of marriage was given by defendant at the time defendant was a married man, and must necessarily rest for its fulfillment upon the basic consideration of securing a divorce, the plaintiff's whole case must fall to the ground. It is unquestionably true that a promise given under such circumstances is against the manifest policy of the law, and therefore wholly void. Noice

v. Brown, 39 N. J. Law, 133, 23 Am. Rep. 213; Paddock v. Robinson, 63 Ill. 99, 14 Am. Rep. 112. Nor will this court in the slightest modify so salutary a principle. But the case here is broadly differentiated from the cases above cited and others so holding. It is differentiated in this: That defendant's promise was renewed years after the divorce, years after his former wife had married again, and when there was no obstacle, either in the law or in good morals, to prevent him from entering anew into the marriage state, and at a time when his course of conduct toward plaintiff, at least from the moral aspect, strongly demanded that he not only should make such a promise, but should keep it; for the evidence which was presented to the jury showed that this man had seduced this girl child of 15 years under promise of marriage, had taken her thereafter to California as his wife, had lived with her, and held her out as his wife, and had continued in this relationship and intercourse under frequent and repeated promises to make her an "honest woman" by marrying her.

[3, 4] In this connection may be noted appellant's next objection to the admission of the evidence of illicit sexual intercourse between plaintiff and defendant. It unquestionably is the rule that in an action for breach of promise of marriage, where the seduction of the plaintiff is not alleged to enhance the damages, evidence of illicit intercourse is not admissible. Lanigan v. Neely, 4 Cal. App. 766, 89 Pac. 441; Felger v. Etzell, 75 Ind. 417; Dupont v. McAdow, 6 Mont. 226, 9 Pac. 925; Lauer v. Banning, 140 Iowa, 319, 118 N. W. 446. But the very foundation of these decisions is removed from the case at bar. In those cases where the principle has been applied, the intercourse has been "consummated in the strictest privacy and secrecy and is known only to the parties themselves," and "evidence of such intercourse can have no possible tendency to prove the existence of a promise of marriage." But here, however secretly this intercourse began, defendant entered into an assumption of marital rights and duties and obligations, and held out this plaintiff as his wife. Where a man has held a woman out to be his wife, it certainly is no strained inference from the evidence establishing this to say that it has a tendency at least to show that he had promised to marry her. It is not even a modification of the rule which we have been discussing to declare that, when a man in effect announces to the world that he is married to a woman, a reasonable inference may be drawn that at least he has promised to marry her.

The defendant specially pleaded the defense of plaintiff's unchastity, as contemplated by section 62 of the Civil Code. Of course, her unchaste conduct with defendant himself was not a defense. Her asserted lack of continence, so far as defendant himself was concerned, rested upon evidence circumstantial in its nature, and upon testimony touching plaintiff's general reputation for lack of chastity; but the jury's determination was against this defense.

[5] Section 1624, subd. 3, Civil Code, provides that a contract with mutual promises to marry may be oral. Section 360 of the Code of Civil Procedure, providing that no acknowledgment or promise is sufficient evidence of a new or continuing contract by which to take the case out of the operation of the statute of limitations, unless "the same is contained in some writing, signed by the party to be charged thereby," has no reference to promises such as it is in evidence were made here. And for the same reason, since the promises upon breach by defendant were made anew by him, it will not be held either that the statute of limitations is applicable or that, as declared in Clark v. Pendleton, 20 Conn. 495, all of these subsequent, separate, and distinct promises after breach will be held to refer back to the original promise, made when plaintiff was a child, and when the defendant was under disability by reason of his marriage.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

EWING v. RICHVALE LAND CO. et al.
(Sac. 2553.)

APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑112—JUDGMENTS APPEALABLE—VOID JUDGMENTS.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 726, providing relative to the foreclosure of mortgages that after the filing of the commissioner's report judgment must be docketed by the clerk for any balance remaining due, a docketed entry of a deficiency judgment by the clerk was a judgment from which an appeal could be taken even though it was void, because the judgment of foreclosure contained no provision for the docketing of any deficiency, as a void judgment may be appealed from.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Action by Samuel Ewing against the Richvale Land Company and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant named appeals. On motion to dismiss the appeal. Motion denied.

J. Oscar Goldstein, of Chico, for appellant. Mastick & Partridge, of San Francisco, and James A. McGregor, of Oronville, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. A judgment of foreclosure was entered on February 25, 1916, and an appeal was taken on April 29, 1916. That appeal has been dismissed on motion of appellant. The judgment was on two promissory notes each for $4,593, and by it a sale of the premises covered by the mortgage was ordered, but there was no express provision for the docketing of any deficiency. The property was sold for $5,000, a return showing this fact was filed, and on April 22, 1916, the clerk docketed a deficiency judgment against appellant in the sum of $6,617.30. On April 24, 1916, Richvale Land Company appealed from this deficiency judgment, and respondent has moved to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that such a judgment is not appealable.

Appellant insists that there is no doubt that the deficiency was entered without authority of law; that while the original judgment as given by the court directed the commissioner to conduct the sale of the premises and to apply the proceeds to the payment of the notes, interest, etc., there was no adjudication of a personal liability against appellant which would authorize the clerk under the terms of section 726, Code of Civil Procedure, to docket a judgment for any balance remaining due; and that in the absence of a judgment of personal liability, such a docketed entry is void (citing Scamman v. Bonslett, 118 Cal. 93, 50 Pac. 272, 62 Am. St. Rep. 226; Herd v. Tuohy, 133 Cal. 55, 65 Pac. 139, and other authorities). But if we concede this much of appellant's position, we are not aided in the solution of the only question presented by this motion which is this: Is the clerk's entry of a deficiency judgment separately appealable?

At the oral argument it was suggested that relief from the apparent lien created by the void entry should have been sought by appropriate motion in the lower court to set aside and cancel the clerk's entry made without authority, and that if such a motion were denied, an appeal might have been prosecuted from the order of the court, if one were made, refusing to expunge the clerk's unauthorized entry. In other words, the objection to entertaining such an appeal is that by so doing this court would recognize the mere clerical function of a ministerial officer as a judicial act. The answer to this argument is that the docketed entry of the clerk amounts to a void judgment, and that appellant is entitled to relief from such judgment on appeal, because this court has repeatedly recognized the right to appeal from a void judgment. In this behalf appellant cites In re Bullock, 75 Cal. 419, 17 Pac. 540; Merced Bank v. Rosenthal, 99 Cal. 39, 31 Pac. 849, 33 Pac. 732, and Page v. Superior Court, 76 Cal. 372, 18 Pac. 385.

The first of these was an appeal from an order directing an administrator to file his account and settling said account. To the contention that the order was void and therefore not appealable the court replied that void orders may be appealable, saying:

> "Whether an order is appealable is to be determined by what it purports to determine, not by what may be its actual operative effect."

The second was a case in which appellant made the contention that the judgment was void because it was delivered by one whose term as a judge of the superior court had expired. Respondent conceded that an appeal will lie from a void judgment, but insisted that an appeal may only be taken from a court to a court, and as appellant denied the existence of the purported court, he also questioned the right to appeal from its so-called judgment. This court held, however, that although an appeal might not be the only remedy it would lie.

In Page v. Superior Court, supra, the matter decided was that an entry of dismissal in the clerk's "register of actions" was not a judgment of dismissal in contemplation of law, and that subsequent orders of the court were made with full authority. In the course of the discussion, after pointing out the finality of a judgment entered in the judgment book by the clerk where power to enter such judgment is given him, the court said:

> "On the other hand, if the case be one in which the clerk has no power to make the entries because of a counterclaim or cross-complaint, the clerk's judgment may be set aside by the court, or may be appealed from. A void judgment is appealable, and it may be set aside as cumbering the records."

We think that these authorities, and particularly the one from which we quote the above paragraph, sustain appellant's position. The moving party in this proceeding has filed no brief, and our own industry has discovered no authorities conflicting with those cited by appellant. Under section 726, Code of Civil Procedure, it is provided that, in proper cases, "judgment must then be docketed by the clerk," after the filing of the commissioner's report "for such balance against the defendant or defendants personally liable for the debt, and it becomes a lien on the real estate of such judgment debtor." While the judgment as docketed by the clerk derives its judicial force, if any, from the original decision of the court, it is nevertheless a separate and distinct judgment from that of foreclosure—is so made by the statute. In a sense, the judgment of foreclosure is interlocutory, and the deficiency judgment is final, the clerk's function being to record the court's determination when made definite by the sale of the mortgaged property. If a deficiency judgment is entered without authority, it is nevertheless a judgment in form. In this case the clerk docketed such a judgment. If, under the authorities cited by appellant, his act was not supported by the decision of the court, nevertheless the void judgment would be appealable, just as an appeal might be taken from a judgment of dismissal entered by a clerk without power under the statute because of the existence of a counterclaim or cross-complaint. If his act was in all respects proper and done under full authority of law, the judgment is one from which an appeal will lie. The question regarding its validity will come properly before us when we shall be called upon to decide the appeal on the merits. This court may not in this proceeding make final disposition of the case as appellant wishes.

The motion is denied.

COLUSA & H. R. CO. v. LEONARD et al.
(Sac. 2570.)

1. Eminent Domain 🔑98—Condemnation—Damages—Interference with Flood Waters.

An element of damages in condemnation of part of a tract for railroad right of way is depreciation in value of the remainder of the tract from the enhanced danger from floods, because of the railroad interfering with escape of waters.

2. Evidence 🔑544 — Opinions — Flow of Flood Waters.

Opinions that proposed railroad construction would interfere with free passage of flood waters is not such expert testimony that farmers may not give it.

3. Eminent Domain 🔑98—Condemnation—Damages.

That the construction of a railroad will interfere with the function of drainage which a water course performed is an element of damages in condemnation for right of way; Civ. Code, § 465, subd. 5, while allowing a railroad to construct its road across, along, or on a water course, requiring it to restore the water course to its former state of usefulness as near as may be.

4. Eminent Domain 🔑95—Condemnation—Construction.

Where the plan on which the road is to be built is shown in condemnation for right of way, damages from construction according to such plan are, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1248, subd. 2, to be assessed in the condemnation proceeding.

5. Trial 🔑267(3)—Instructions—Modifying Request.

Striking part of a requested instruction is not error, where all that was eliminated was implied in that given.

6. Trial 🔑267(4)—Condemnation—Damages—Instructions.

It is enough in condemnation proceedings to instruct that the damage for which compensation is to be made is the damage to the property itself, without using the words of the requested instruction that the property itself must suffer some diminution in substance.

7. Eminent Domain 🔑203(1) — Condemnation—Damages—Evidence.

Relative to damages to the remaining lands of defendant from construction of railroad over the part condemned, by obstruction of flow of flood waters, the nature of the proposed construction over the land of another, bearing on the question of sufficient outlet, may be shown.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Glenn County; Wm. M. Finch, Judge.

Condemnation proceeding by the Colusa & Hamilton Railroad Company against Ella Glenn Leonard and another. From the judgment for damages, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Frank Freeman and Geo. R. Freeman, both of Willow, for appellant. Ben F. Geis and Duard F. Geis, both of Willow, and Arthur C. Huston, of Woodland, for respondents. Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo. J. Roche, of San Francisco, and Devlin & Devlin, of Sacramento, amici curiæ.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff by this action in eminent domain sought to acquire as a roadway for its railroad a strip of land running north and south, in part dividing, and in part on the westerly boundary of, the farming lands of defendants. These lands, in all about 560 acres, are low-lying lands, in a natural state subject to overflow from the Sacramento river. They are situated in the county of Glenn, and the Sacramento river forms their easterly boundary. On this river frontage is built a high and strong levee, constructed in 1910, after the exceptionally high floods of 1909. Notwithstanding that in the years that have elapsed the flood waters have risen to the height attained in 1909, the levees have confined the waters of the river and there has been no overflow. In the earlier years before the erection of the levees, at flood seasons, the river overflowed its banks some 12 times in 45 years. Some distance to the west of the levee is an irrigating canal with banks not so high as the levee, but still several feet higher than the embankment proposed to be built on the railroad right of way, for it should here be said that this case was tried under plans and drawings showing the construction which the railroad proposed to make—in part a low fill, in part trestlework for the passage of flood or storm waters. Defendants set up two elements of special damage: First, that the construction of the railroad in the manner contemplated and the severance of the larger tract from the portion sought to be condemned, by reason of the flood waters of the Sacramento river, 100 acres of land lying west of the proposed right of way would be damaged to the extent of $25 per acre; the second, under like averment, was to the effect that the lands lying east of the proposed right of way—495 acres—would be damaged to the extent of $35 per acre. Evidence upon these matters was admitted by the court, and the jury, under this evidence, found the damage arising from these causes to be $15 an acre; or, in other words, the jury found that the market value of the land had been or would be depreciated by virtue of this railroad construction to the extent of $15 per acre.

This cause was first decided by the district court of appeals, and was taken over by this court for the further consideration of two propositions: The first, whether defendants were entitled to recover damages because of this asserted flood danger; and, second, if they were, whether or not the evidence offered by defendants upon the matter was not too remote, speculative, and uncertain to afford the basis for an award of damages.

[1] The law governing the consideration of the question of damage is, first, the familiar provision of section 14, art. 1, of the Constitution, to the effect that "private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation;" and, second, subdivision 2 of section 1248 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which declares that, if the property sought to be condemned constitutes only a part of a larger parcel, the court or jury must ascertain and assess the damages which will accrue to the portion not sought to be condemned, by reason of its severance from the portion sought to be condemned, and the construction of the improvement in the manner proposed by the plaintiff. Appellant's position may be thus stated: Respondents' claim of special damage grows out of an asserted depreciation in the market value of their property, because the proposed work of appellant will impede the free passage of flood waters if a flood should come upon such land, and this retardation of the natural passage of the flood waters over the land will result in a destruction of growing crops and in other similar injuries to their property. (This is not controvertible, for such, in truth, is respondents' evidence.) Next, argues appellant, every owner of property in California may use all legitimate means to protect his land against flood waters, even though that protection shall result in actual and appreciable injury or damage to another's property, for that damage is under our law damnum absque injuria. Such, in truth, are our uniform decisions. Lamb v. Reclamation District, 73 Cal. 125, 14 Pac. 625, 2 Am. St. Rep. 775; McDaniel v. Cummings, 83 Cal. 515, 23 Pac. 795, 8 L. R. A. 575; Gray v. Reclamation Dist. No. 1500, 163 Pac. 1024.

Appellant admits that if its taking of the land, and the use which it proposes to make of the land taken, actually and physically interfered with the natural or artificial protection against flood possessed by the untaken portion of the tract, if, for example, the use to be made of the land involved a cutting of the levee or any other similar act, compensation for this would be justly allowable. But, so runs its argument, if it owned the strip of land sought to be taken, it would be within its legal rights in building the embankment in the legitimate use and protection of its property, even if the construction did increase the danger of damage by floods to the remaining land, and that as it could unquestionably do this as the owner of the land, without making compensation to the adjacent landowner for injuries which might result from its necessary and proper works, so here, in this condemnation suit, such prospective damage, even though it be said that it would be in truth a real damage, cannot legally be used to increase respondent's award.

This argument is not only persuasive but forceful. The fallacy of it, however, lies in this consideration, what a man may legally do in the exercise of his rights of ownership is not identical in fact or in principle with what he may justly be called upon to pay in the acquisition of such ownership. A simple illustration will, we think, plainly illustrate our meaning. A municipality owns a block of land in a highly desirable residence quarter of the city. It proceeds to build thereon a hospital for contagious diseases—in short, a pesthouse. The direct and immediate effect of this is to depreciate to a very substantial extent the value of the surrounding residence property. But, while the court might listen with sympathetic ear to the lamentations of the owners of those properties, it could not salve their grief by compensation in terms of money, because the city was exercising one of its unquestioned rights of ownership, and the injury which that exercise inflicted, though real, was damnum absque injuria. But, in the same residence section, the city by eminent domain seeks to condemn one-half of a block owned by an individual for the purpose of erecting thereon a pesthouse. The depreciation in the value of the remaining property is marked, and measurable in terms of money. If the city sought to buy from the owner at private purchase this same property, no one would question but that the owner would, and properly would, fix as a purchase price a sum which would compensate him for the inevitable reduction in value of the remaining part of his land. When the city goes into court to acquire this same property by judicial decree, the same elements fairly enter into the transaction and are admissible in evidence under the very terms of our law. Therefore the question before us is not what an owner may do with his own property without liability for the damage which his legal acts may inflict upon his neighbor's property, but it is what is the fair price for the purchaser to pay for that property, where avowedly he proposes to use it in such a way as will directly operate to depreciate the value of the untaken part of the realty?

This principle, it will be found, is recognized in all the adjudications. In this state we do not permit the owner of lower lands to interfere with the natural surface flow from the lands above, to the detriment of those latter lands. In other states the common-law rule to the contrary is adopted. In those other states, as a brief consideration of their authorities will show, it is uniformly held that, in eminent domain proceedings, the injury to the remaining lands, which may result from interference with the surface flow, is a proper element for the consideration of the jury in fixing its award of damages, and this, of course, notwithstanding the fact that under their law the same interference could be occasioned, without liability to damage, by one who was the owner of the property. Thus says Lewis (2 Lewis, Em. Dom. § 496):

> "It would be difficult to enumerate the various elements of damages proper to be considered when part of a tract is taken. * * * Any interference with the drainage of the land, or with the flow of surface water, or with the water supply, are recognized by all authorities as proper items to be taken into account in assessing the damages."

In support of the text may be cited Farnham, Waters and Water Rights, §§ 357, 904; Walker v. Old Colony & Newport R. R. Co., 103 Mass. 10, 4 Am. Rep. 509; Arkansas Valley, etc., Ry. Co. v. Witt, 19 Okl. 262, 91 Pac. 897, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 237, and note; W. W. Railroad Co. v. Kuhn, 38 Kan. 104, 16 Pac. 75; Churchill v. Beethe, 48 Neb. 87, 66 N. W. 992, 35 L. R. A. 442. It follows, therefore, that the court was right in recognizing the principle that a depreciation in the value of the remaining lands caused by the enhanced danger of floods was a proper element of damage to go before the jury.

[2] We come next to the character of the evidence which the court allowed to go before the jury in support of the claim for special damage. Herein respondents admit that the proposed works of appellant would impair the value of their remaining land only in the event of flood, and, conversely, if there was no possibility of flood there would be no depreciation in value because of the works. Upon this appellant argues that its proposed use of the land would not in the slightest increase the danger of the flood; that if a flood did result it would occur through no contributing act or fault of appellant; and that the evidence shows that, by virtue of the massive levee construction, any real danger of a flood has been eliminated. Second, appellant argues that, as established by the evidence of respondents, the damage which appellant's works would cause in the event of flood would arise only from the fact that those works retarded the free flow of the flood waters off of the remaining portion of respondents' land; that appellant's expert evidence demonstrated that these proposed works would not so retard the water, as ample passageways for the water were left in the embankment; and that the conflicting evidence was that of unqualified, inexpert farmers, whose testimony should not have been received.

Touching the first of these matters, it is sufficient to say that, unless it could be established that the danger of flood was absolutely eliminated, the improbability of such a flood occurring goes only to the weight of evidence as affecting a lessening of value, rather than to the admissibility of the evidence itself. It cannot be said, as matter of law, that plaintiff's proof of the strength and sufficiency of the levees demonstrated that no flood would ever again occur. Upon the second proposition in its objection to the admissibility of the evidence, appellant bears down too hard on but one phase of the testimony given by the farmer witnesses of respondents. In effect, they were called upon to testify to their knowledge of past floods and flood conditions, to their knowledge of the value of the farming real estate, and to their knowledge or belief as to the effect which appellant's proposed work would have in depreciating the value of respondents' real estate because of the retardation of flood waters which would result if the works were constructed as proposed. Upon this last branch of inquiry these witnesses, now generally speaking, did testify as to their belief that the proposed works would interfere with the free passage of the flood waters, would cause the waters to stand longer upon respondents' lands, and that this danger did appreciably reduce the market value of those lands. Only in the sense that they testified to the inadequacy of the proposed works as granting free and unimpeded passage to the flood waters can it be said that their testimony was at all in the nature of expert evidence, going to the character and adequacy of the proposed works to relieve from flood waters. But manifestly this is not the kind of expert testimony forbidden to be received, but is rather of the character held admissible in such cases as Sowden v. Idaho Quartz Mining Co., 55 Cal. 451; Frey v. Lowden, 70 Cal. 552, 11 Pac. 838; Posachane W. Co. v. Standart, 97 Cal. 480, 32 Pac. 532; Nolan v. Nolan, 155 Cal. 476, 101 Pac. 520, 132 Am. St. Rep. 99, 17 Ann. Cas. 1056; and Gallatin v. Corning Irrigation Co., 163 Cal. 419, 126 Pac. 864, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 74.

It is concluded, therefore, that the court of appeal was correct in its judgment, which judgment expresses the same conclusions as those here presented. The foregoing, therefore, may be considered as an amplification of the opinion of the court of appeal, to which reference has been made, which is hereby adopted, and which is as follows:

> "Plaintiff commenced the action to condemn a right of way for plaintiff's railroad over defendants' land, containing 11.93 acres. Defendants answered that the construction of the railroad as proposed by plaintiff would cause defendants great damage and expense for various alleged reasons and, among others, the following:
> "(9) That the amount of land within the said right of way sought to be taken and condemned herein by the said plaintiff for the said railroad right of way is 11.93 acres, and the value of the said land is the sum of $300 per acre, and the value of the interest of the said defendants is the sum of $3,579.
> "(10) That the construction of the railroad in the manner contemplated and proposed by the plaintiff, will sever the larger tract, not sought to be condemned, into two parts, to wit: One part lying west of the proposed right of way, containing 100.17 acres, and one part lying east of the proposed right of way containing 485.57 acres.
> "11. That all of the said lands of the said defendants are subject to overflow by and from the flood waters of the Sacramento river, and that the said flood waters do flow to, upon, over, across, and away from the lands of the said defendants, and all of the said lands lie along, and are adjacent to, the said Sacramento river. That the construction of the proposed railroad across the said lands of the said defendants, in the manner proposed by the said plaintiff, will interfere with, obstruct, and prevent the free flow of the flood waters of and from the said Sacramento river, that will come upon the said lands of the said defendants from flowing over, across, and away from the said lands of the said defendants, and will cause the said flood waters to back up, accumulate, be held back, and stand upon the said lands of the said defendants lying on the east side of the proposed right of way.

"(12) That the construction of the railroad in the manner contemplated and proposed by plaintiff, and the severance of the larger tract, not sought to be condemned, from the portion sought to be condemned, and by reason of the flood waters of the Sacramento river that will come upon, back up, accumulate, be held back and upon the lands that lie west of the proposed right of way, to wit, the 100.17 acres, will be damaged to the extent of $25 per acre, making a total damage to the said lands lying on the west side of the proposed right of way of $2,504.25.

"(13) That the construction of the railroad in the manner contemplated and proposed by the plaintiff, and the severance of the larger tract, not sought to be condemned, from the portion sought to be condemned, and by reason of the flood waters of and from the Sacramento river, that will come upon, back up, accumulate, be held upon the said lands of the said defendants that lie east of the proposed right of way, to wit, the 485.37 acres, will be damaged to the extent of $35 per acre, making a total damage to the said lands lying on the east side of the proposed right of way of $16,987.95."

The issue of damages raised by the pleadings was submitted to and tried by a jury, and the questions given them by the court were answered as follows:

"(1) We, the jury, in the above-entitled action, ascertain to be and assess the market value of the land sought to be condemned by plaintiff, belonging to defendant, to wit: 11.93 acres for right of way at ——. Answer: $175 per acre.

"(2) We, the jury, ascertain to be and assess the depreciation in the market value of the land not taken by reason of the construction of the railroad in the manner proposed at ——. Answer: $15 per acre.

"(3) We, the jury, assess the value of the fencing on the right of way to be $507.

"(4) We, the jury, ascertain and assess the cost of the fencing for said right of way to be $480.

"(5) We, the jury, ascertain and assess the cost of the one 60 ft. crossing and one 40 ft. crossing with cattle guards to be $400."

Judgment passed for defendants accordingly, from which plaintiff appeals under the alternative method.

The located line of the railroad runs practically north and south, through the counties of Glenn and Colusa, parallel with the west bank of the Sacramento river, varying with its course, but, at the place involved, is over half a mile west of the river at the nearest point, that point being called Jacinto, where defendants reside. The located line follows along the west line of defendants' property, from its south boundary, for the first three-quarters of a mile, to a point where a county road, called Bayliss-Jacinto road, runs east and west through the land to Jacinto and the river. North of this road the located line continues north through the property a quarter of a mile, leaving about 100 acres on the west side of the track and about 87 acres on the east side. The tract on the south consists of about 400 acres. In the entire tract are 597.47 acres, and the Sacramento river is its east boundary. In 1910 a substantial levee was built along the west bank of the river, replacing the old one, to protect this land and other lands from river overflow. Some distance west of this levee is what is called the Sacramento Valley West Side Canal Company irrigating canal, 25 feet wide on the bottom, and 25 to 30 feet wide at the top, the excavation being thrown out on its banks on either side, but not so high as the levee. This canal is about half a mile east of the located line of the railroad.

The points urged on appeal are: (1) That all the evidence as to flood waters "was erroneously admitted as too remote, speculative and uncertain"; (2) that evidence was admitted as to the effect of the proposed railroad construction upon the flow of such waters "by witnesses without any knowledge whatever on that subject which should be handled only by men trained in such matters"; (3) that, conceding such evidence to have been properly admitted, "it is insufficient to warrant the verdict rendered as to depreciation upon the lands not taken, for the evidence and verdict show that the verdict was based wholly upon this floodwater 'bogeyman'"; (4) that "it clearly appears that there is a well-defined, natural, and regular channel or watercourse within which all this flood water, when it escapes from the river, at all times flows, which watercourse finally deposits this water in Colusa basin" and hence "subdivision 5 of section 465 of the Civil Code takes care of such a situation."

In the case of Colusa, etc., R. R. Co. v. Glenn, reported in 25 Cal. App. 634, 144 Pac. 993, the rule for computing damages was stated as given in Blunck v. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co., 142 Iowa, 146, 120 N. W. 737, as follows:

> "The real question in such cases being how much has the market value of the property been diminished by taking the right of way therefrom, it is manifest that in determining and fixing such damages all matters and conditions which may reasonably be expected to follow the location and operation of the road and affect the value of the land should be considered."

In the opinion the court, by Mr. Justice Burnett, said:

> "If there is a reasonable probability that the construction of plaintiff's railroad as contemplated will augment the damage to the land caused by flood waters, of course this is a circumstance to be considered by the jury in arriving at a proper award. Whether there is such reasonable probability is a matter of opinion based upon certain physical facts which are detailed by some of the witnesses. From plaintiff's showing the inference would follow that no probable damage would ensue from this source and that the market value of the land would not be affected by this circumstance." (The testimony of an expert witness is quoted, in which the witness stated in effect that the velocity of the increased quantity of water would cause it "to pass off in the same length of time as now. The trestles that we have located on this road will take care of all the water that comes on the Glenn place, no matter where it comes from.") Continuing, it was said in the opinion: "There was expert evidence, however, on behalf of defendant to the effect that the railroad as intended to be constructed would hold back the water on something like 480 acres of land. On this assumption the opinion was expressed that the market value would be greatly depreciated. We are not prepared to say that there was no basis for such opinion. The matter is, of course, somewhat speculative, depending upon various contingencies, but if, thereby, the market value of the land is diminished, defendant has the right to make proof of it, and there is no available method by which to show this fact except through the opinion of competent witnesses."

This case involved an inquiry into conditions similar in most respects to those existing in the present case. The land lies north of and adjoining the present defendants' land and is crossed by the proposed railroad, and would be affected by the construction of the road in much the same manner. The two cases are so nearly alike as to make the same principles of law equally applicable to both cases.

[3] The evidence showed in the instant case that, prior to the construction of the present levee in 1910, the river, in flood seasons, sometimes three or four times in one season, overflowed its banks and the levee formerly constructed at a depth of two or three feet, and the waters spread out over the back country at Jacinto to and beyond the west line of defendants' land, "a solid sea of water," as witnesses described it, three or four feet deep; that the banks of the canal, which was built prior to the levee of 1910, gave way in places and melted down under the pressure—in fact were practically submerged; that the trend of these flood waters was south and westerly, and as they subsided found their way into a depression or slough which carried off the remaining waters; and it is this so-called watercourse on which plaintiff relies in making its point 4. We may here, as well as elsewhere, dispose of this point. Section 465 of the Civil Code declares that a railroad corporation has power:

> "* * * (5) To construct their roads across, along, or upon any stream of water, watercourse, * * * which the route of its road intersects, crosses, or runs along, in such manner as to afford security for life and property; but the corporation shall restore the stream or watercourse * * * thus intersected to its former state of usefulness as near as may be, or so that the railroad shall not unnecessarily impair its usefulness or injure its franchise."

The evidence was that the proposed track of plaintiff's roadbed traversed substantially this depression on the west slope of it, although there was evidence that this so-called channel is at places west of the located track. A 90-foot trestle was provided for at a point not far from midway of the lower tract of land, and another of the same length at a point in the north tract, the purpose being to allow flood water to pass to and from each side of the track. One question was whether these openings sufficiently served their purpose, which will be given attention later.

The evidence was that this depression, or trough, or slough, as it is variously termed by witnesses, has its head near the Sacramento river upon the land north of defendants' land and was a drainway for the overflow water after the main body had subsided. It could hardly be properly termed such watercourse as is referred to in the Code. But, treating it as such, the plaintiff had no right so to construct its roadbed as to interfere with the free and unobstructed office which this slough or channel performed and, if it did so, such interference would constitute an element of damages to defendants. The principle involved was applied in Coates v. A., T. & S. F. Ry. Co., 1 Cal. App. 441, 82 Pac. 640; S. P. R. R. Co. v. Hart, 3 Cal. App. 11, 84 Pac. 218. In this connection plaintiff urges the doctrine which treats flood waters as a common enemy against which a landowner may protect himself, though to the detriment of an abutting landowner, citing Sanguinnetti v. Pock, 136 Cal. 446, 69 Pac. 98, 98 Am. St. Rep. 169, among other cases, where the doctrine was quite fully gone into in connection with Mormon slough in San Joaquin county.

We can hardly think plaintiff serious in its contention that, before it becomes an abutting landowner at all and is merely seeking a right of way by condemnation proceedings, it may defend against damages claimed for what may happen in the future should it become such abutting owner and should afterwards carry out its proposed improvement. We see no merit in this branch of appellant's argument. Nor do we think the defense made under section 465 of the Civil Code maintainable.

[4] It appeared that plaintiff's proposed road over this strip of land was to be constructed upon a definite plan, which was presented to the court and jury as part of its case, showing how the roadbed or embankment was to be built, its width being 18 feet on top; that 10 feet of the top was to be surfaced with gravel 15 inches thick into which ties were to be imbedded and tamped, and on top of these ties the rails to be fastened, making a solid embankment about 3½ feet high; that a trestle 90 feet wide in the embankment at a definite place in the lower piece of land and another of like dimensions in the upper tract, and culverts at the Bayliss-Jacinto road, were to be constructed. In short, the case was tried as though there was a completed structure of the dimensions given in the plan laid before the jury.

At this point we may dispose of another question raised in appellant's brief, namely, that whatever damage may be caused by some negligence in constructing the roadbed, or by some improper construction thereof, "may be recovered by appropriate actions by the parties damnified when such damages occur, and nothing should be allowed on the theory that such negligence may happen," citing Turpen v. Turlock Irrigation District, 141 Cal. 1, 74 Pac. 295. The action was tried, as we have stated, on a theory which conceded that the question of damages, whatever they might be, would be considered on the assumption that the roadbed was to be constructed upon the plan laid before the jury. In the Turpen Case the question was as to damages arising after the construction of the works. We are not to deal with the question as though it had first arisen after the completion of the road. We are dealing with the law under condemnation proceedings. Section 1248 of the Code of Civil Procedure furnishes the rule, which is:

> "* * * (2) If the property sought to be condemned constitutes only a part of a larger parcel, the damages which will accrue to the portion not sought to be condemned, * * * and the construction of the improvement in the manner proposed by plaintiff."

In the case of Conniff v. San Francisco, 67 Cal. 45, 50, 7 Pac. 41, the court quoted from Pumpelly v. Green Bay Co., 13 Wall. 166, 20 L. Ed. 557, as follows:

> "Where real estate is actually invaded by superinduced additions of water, earth, sand, or other material, or by any artificial structure placed on it so as effectually to destroy or impair its usefulness, it is a taking within the meaning of the Constitution."

In Reardon v. San Francisco, 66 Cal. 492, 505, 6 Pac. 317, 320, 56 Am. Rep. 109, the court gave a direct answer to appellant's contention. It said:

> "We are of opinion that the right assured to the owner by this provision of the Constitution is not restricted to the case where he is entitled to recover as for a tort at common law. If he is consequently damaged by the work done, whether it is done carefully and with skill or not, he is * * * entitled to compensation for such damage under this provision. This provision was intended to assure compensation to the owner, as well where the damage is directly inflicted, or inflicted by want of care and skill as where the damages are consequential, and for which damages he had no right of recovery at the common law."

See a clear statement of the rule in Chicago v. Taylor, 125 U. S. 161, 8 Sup. Ct. 820, 31 L. Ed. 638.

It appeared from the statements of witnesses for defendants that they based their judgment as to the depreciation of defendants' property in considerable part upon the effect of plaintiff's road as it is to be constructed, would have in holding back the flood waters of the Sacramento river. This same class of evidence was held admissible in the Glenn Case, supra, and we see no reason to change our opinion on the subject. The testimony as to the effect which the proposed railroad would have is here, as it was in the Glenn Case, irreconcilably conflicting. Witnesses, a large number of them, testified that the trestles provided for in the roadway were wholly inadequate to allow the large volume of water coming over the land in flood times to pass through them; that the necessary effect of the railroad embankment would be to hold the water back a considerable length of time longer than it would be under conditions as they now exist, and would result in the destruction of crops which would otherwise escape by the water passing off much more quickly than it could when held back, as it must be, by the railroad. Disputing the fact, but recognizing the rule as to conflicting evidence, appellant contends that the danger of such damage occurring is too remote and uncertain to be a just element of damages. This contention is based chiefly on the protection now given the land by the levee, which has stood against the flood waters since 1910, and because of the further protection afforded by the canal embankments. This latter protection may be dismissed from consideration for the evidence was that, should the levee give way, the canal embankments would not withstand the pressure of flood waters. It is matter of common knowledge that levees are by no means impregnable or that they furnish an insurance against the assaults and ravages of flood waters. There is always possible increase in the height of the flood plane arising either from unusual rainfall or from other system of levees, which increase the demand upon previously constructed systems. There is danger from the encroachment of the river itself in undermining constructed levees by washing away the margin of the bank usually left between the levee and river, and it was in evidence that the river had washed away 40 feet in one place in its tendency to reach the levee. Gophers and squirrels are constant enemies whose attacks are not always visible. There is, too, an element of danger from the ease with which a personal enemy of oneself or some neighbor may with dynamite destroy the levee temporarily, in the height of a flood. These are some of the risks to which landowners living under levee systems are subjected. While it is true that levees enhance the value of land which they protect, it is also true that it would give still greater value to the land if the landowners could be assured that such levees would never give way to flood waters.

In the Glenn Case, under conditions of fact substantially the same as here, we said:

> "The matter is, of course, somewhat speculative, depending upon various contingencies, but if, thereby, the market value of the land is diminished, defendant has the right to make proof of it, and there is no available method by which to show this fact except through the opinion of competent witnesses."

There were other elements besides this one of danger from flood waters which were considered by the jury, but we think it must be conceded that the verdict cannot be justified by these other elements alone, for witnesses stated that their estimates of damages necessarily included consideration of damages from flood waters.

We are brought to the question: Were the witnesses competent to testify to the facts upon which the jury based their verdict? Most of defendants' witnesses were farmers who had been familiar with flood conditions in that neighborhood and the effect upon the lands of defendants for 20 or 30 years, and were also familiar with the market value of land in the vicinity. They were informed of the plan proposed for the construction of the railroad, as we have outlined it, and were asked whether or not it would depreciate the value of the land not taken. Answering that it would, they were asked to state how much per acre, and answered giving various estimates running from $15 to $30 per acre. Then followed their reasons, among which was the opinion that the trestles would not carry the water coming to them in flood overflows and that the water would be "held back," as they expressed it, and prevented from passing off freely and thus cause the damage which in part was included in their estimate. There was evidence that the damage to crops depended upon the length of time the water stood on them. Their testimony was corroborated by that of civil engineer Bayard Knock, who gave it as his opinion that the railroad embankment would back the water to the river; that it would keep water from getting west of the track and deepen it east; that the trestles would relieve it some, but how much he could not say; that it "would make a difference in the fastness with which the water got off"; but how much longer it would take the water to pass off than under present conditions he could not say. It seems to us, however, that an intelligent farmer who had observed the action of flood waters for many years would be competent to give an opinion that two openings, each 90 feet long and 3 feet high and half a mile apart, would not allow the flood waters 3 or 4 feet deep flowing with some velocity and spreading over four or five hundred acres to pass through them as rapidly as it would accumulate against the railroad embankment; and that the embankment would have a tendency to "back up" the water and keep it from passing off as freely as it otherwise would, especially as the road is located so as to obstruct the depression in the land, more or less, which otherwise would help to hasten the flow off the water. These physical facts, which the farmers must have confirmed from their everyday experience, would, it seems to us, need no expert civil engineer to verify. Such testimony may not be so convincing as that of persons trained in a school of practical hydraulic engineering, but we think it was competent.

[5] Plaintiff asked the following instruction:

"In ascertaining the damages to, or depreciation in, the market value of that part of the property of the defendants, Ella Glenn Leonard and Charles L. Leonard, not sought to be taken in this proceeding, you are not to indulge in speculation, surmise, or conjecture. The law does not require plaintiff to pay damages or compensate for depreciation of the market value of the property, not sought to be taken in this action, based upon speculation, surmise, or conjecture; [in other words, you are instructed that no damage to, or depreciation of, the market value of that portion of the property involved here, not sought to be taken in this proceeding, by reason of flood waters can be based upon speculation, surmise, or conjecture]."

The court struck out the concluding paragraph marked in brackets. The instruction, as given, implied all that was stated in the eliminated portion and it must be presumed that the jury applied it to evidence relating to flood waters as well as to other evidence.

[6] The court refused the following instruction:

"The law does not authorize a remedy for every diminution of the value of the property that is caused by a public improvement. The damage for which compensation is to be made is a damage to the property itself, and does not include a mere infringement of the owner's pleasure or enjoyment. Merely rendering private property less desirable for certain purposes, or even causing personal annoyance in its use, will not constitute the damage contemplated by law; but the property itself must suffer some diminution in substance or be rendered intrinsically less valuable by reason of the public use."

The court gave the following instruction:

"After you have determined the market value of the strip of land sought to be condemned for the right of way, you must then ascertain and assess the amount of depreciation of the market value, if any, which may accrue to the portion of the land not taken by reason of the construction of the railroad in the manner proposed. This damage, if any, will be determined by ascertaining, in the same manner as heretofore stated, the market value for cash of those portions of said tract not taken, as it was on the 23d day of December, 1913, and by deducting therefrom the market value for cash of said property after the severance and the proposed railroad is constructed. The difference between these values, if there shall be any, will be the amount of the depreciation of the market value of the land not taken. The law fixes this method of ascertaining the damages, and it is your duty to follow it."

The court also instructed the jury as follows:

"Unless you find by a preponderance of evidence that the owners of the land sought to be condemned in this proceeding will be disturbed in their enjoyment of some right to which they are entitled to make use of in connection with their land, you cannot find that they were damaged within the sense of the Constitution of the state of California, which provides that they shall receive full compensation for the taking or damage of the land in a proceeding of this character. You are instructed that the market value of the land sought to be condemned in this action is not to be determined by its value for any particular use, but, resulting from a consideration of all the uses for which it is adapted and to which it may be applied, it is only when the market value of the land is diminished by a public use that it can be said to have sustained such damage as will entitle the owner to receive compensation."

There were several instructions which in effect told the jury that the damage contemplated by the Constitution is the damage to the property itself, considered with reference to the uses to which it was adapted. The court did not in terms say that "the property itself must suffer some diminution in substance or be rendered intrinsically less valuable by reason of the public use," but the jury must have understood from the instructions that they were considering the damage to the property itself, which necessarily meant "some diminution in substance." Indeed, while lawyers may understand what those terms mean, it is doubtful whether a jury would be enlightened by hearing them given. "Diminution in substance" might, unexplained, be understood to mean the digging up and carrying away the soil, which, of course, is not intended by the term. We do not think the refusal to give the instruction was prejudicial.

Some other instructions are criticised, but we do not think it necessary to comment upon them particularly. The instructions given were clear and accurate statements of the law and if there was evidence relating to matters which might have influenced the jury improperly—for example, danger of loss of stock by breaking down the railroad company's fences, or danger to persons in crossing, or of personal annoyance or infringement of the owner's pleasure—such evidence, no doubt, if any there was, would have been limited by instructions if requested. We cannot see that the plaintiff was prejudiced to an extent requiring a reversal by any instructions given or refused.

[7] But one objection to rulings on evidence is complained of and this related to the admission of testimony as to the construction of the railroad across Charles Glenn's land immediately north of defendants' land. It appeared that the plans contemplated a roadway or embankment about the same as over defendants' land with one 60-foot trestle. As the flood waters of the river first entered upon the land from the Charles Glenn land and as the character of the railroad construction over his land had a certain effect lower down, the evidence was admissible. The court limited it to the Charles Glenn land.

The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

HART v. FRESNO TRACTION CO.

(S. F. 7288.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 18, 1917. Rehearing Denied July 18, 1917.)

1. CARRIERS 🔑238—INJURIES TO PASSENGERS—WHO IS A PASSENGER.

A person may become a passenger, without having come into the carrier's vehicle, if the surrounding circumstances show an intent on his part to become a passenger, and an acceptance of him by the carrier as a passenger.

2. CARRIERS 🔑320(2) — INJURIES TO PASSENGERS—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Evidence held to make a jury question whether plaintiff running for a car had become a passenger, so as to render the carrier liable for his injuries.

3. CARRIERS 🔑347(5) — INJURIES TO PASSENGERS — BOARDING MOVING CAR — QUESTION FOR JURY.

Intending passenger's contributory negligence in attempting to board a moving car is for the jury, since it is not negligence per se for one to board a moving street car.

4. TRIAL 🔑194(2)—INSTRUCTIONS—MATTERS OF FACT.

The mere fact that the court began an instruction "it is claimed by plaintiff" did not make the instruction one on matters of fact, where the instruction embodied a fair statement of the probative tendency of the evidence.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1033(4)—ERROR FAVORABLE—INSTRUCTIONS.

Error, if any, in submitting the issues whether plaintiff could recover on the theory that he was a passenger or whether the company was liable for failure to exercise ordinary care, conceding plaintiff not to have been a passenger, is not prejudicial to the carrier, since the submission of ordinary care was unduly favorable to the carrier.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; George E. Church, Judge.

Action by Harvey J. Hart against the Fresno Traction Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, and order denying new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Everts & Ewing and Short & Sutherland, all of Fresno (Carl E. Lindsay, of Fresno, of counsel), for appellant. E. S. Van Meter and C. K. Bonestell, both of Fresno, for respondent.

VICTOR E. SHAW, Judge pro tem. Action to recover damages for a personal injury alleged to have been sustained by plaintiff as a result of defendant's negligence. Judgment for $750 followed a verdict in favor of plaintiff. The appeal is by defendant from an order of court made upon a statement of the case denying its motion for a new trial.

At the time of the alleged injury to plaintiff, defendant owned an electric railway upon which it, as a common carrier, operated cars between the city of Fresno and a station at its eastern terminus known as Sunny Side Vineyard, over which, in connection with a street car system of said city, it transported passengers between said points. The cause of action, as sufficiently, although perhaps inartistically, stated in the complaint, is based upon the theory that plaintiff at the time in question, although he had not entered defendant's car, was nevertheless a passenger thereon by reason of the fact that defendant's employés, by their acts, had accepted his offer to become such, and that in boarding the car he was by reason of defendant's negligent operation thereof thrown to the ground and injured.

[1] That one, though not inside of a carrier's vehicle, may nevertheless as to the carrier occupy the position of a passenger entitled to the highest degree of care must be conceded. Jaquette v. Capital Traction Co., 34 App. D. C. 41, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 407. The rule is that:

> "A person may become a passenger, without having come into the carrier's vehicle, if the surrounding circumstances show an intent on his part to become a passenger and an acceptance of him by the carrier as a passenger." Hutchinson on Carriers (3d Ed.) § 1005; Nilson v. Oakland Traction Co., 10 Cal. App. 103, 109, 101 Pac. 413.

[2] The contention of appellant is that the evidence is insufficient to show that respondent brought himself within the rule stated. While not questioning the existing of circumstances clearly showing an intention on the part of plaintiff to become a passenger, it is insisted that such intention was not communicated to defendant, nor any circumstances shown from which an acceptance of plaintiff as a passenger by defendant could be implied.

In our opinion the contention possesses no merit. It appears that plaintiff, with four others with whom he was employed, went to Sunny Side station with the intention of boarding one of defendant's cars as a passenger for Fresno. When they got there it was raining, and as the car had not arrived they took shelter under a tree some 125 feet in the distance short of the point where the car usually stopped at the end of the track. Upon its arrival, which it appears was late, plaintiff and his companion started hurriedly from their shelter to the car, but before they reached it the conductor changed the trolley, and the car, contrary to the usual custom, was immediately started upon its reverse course at a speed of some four or five miles per hour, but slowed down a little, enabling plaintiff's companions who were ahead of him to board the same. Plaintiff followed the moving car at a fast walk or trot, and as it slowed down to the speed at which he was walking, and while the conductor and motorman were looking back at him, he grasped the upright handrail of the car and jumped on the step thereof, at which time the car was propelled forward with a sudden jerk, causing plaintiff to slip and lose his foothold upon the step and let go the handrail, as a result of which he was thrown to the ground and sustained the alleged injury. In our opinion, the uncontroverted evidence offered tended to show that plaintiff intended to board the car to be carried as a passenger; that defendant's servants in charge thereof knew of his intention so to do, and, as indicating their consent to receive him and his companions as passengers, reduced the speed of the car, and saw or ought to have seen what he was doing, and understood or ought to have understood his purpose in doing it. The circumstances shown clearly tended, as between the parties, to establish the relation of carrier and passenger. Berry v. St. Louis Transit Co., 211 Mo. 88, 109 S. W. 661; Burger v. Omaha & C. B. St. R. R. Co., 139 Iowa, 645, 117 N. W. 35, 130 Am. St. Rep. 343.

[3] Whether or not plaintiff was a passenger on defendant's car, and as such suffered injury through defendant's negligence, were questions for the determination of the jury, as likewise, since it is not negligence per se for one to get on a moving street car (Nilson v. Oakland Traction Co., supra; Nellis on Street Railroads, vol. 1, § 259; O'Mara v. St. Louis Transit Co., 102 Mo. App. 202, 76 S. W. 680), was the question of his alleged contributory negligence. Upon each of such questions the verdict implies a finding favorable to plaintiff.

[4] There is no ground for the contention that the court charged the jury with respect to matters of fact. The instruction which forms the subject of this complaint begins with the words, "it is claimed by the plaintiff," which assertion is followed by a fair statement of what his evidence tends to prove. Conceding that the requested instruction as to the burden of proof was a proper one and should have been given, nevertheless the failure to give it could not possibly have prejudiced any substantial right of defendant.

[5] Appellant also insists that it was prejudiced by reason of the court instructing the jury upon the right of plaintiff to recover upon two theories—one to the effect that, if found to be a passenger, as such he was entitled to the exercise of the highest degree of care by defendant, and the other to the effect that, if he was not a passenger, but attempting to become such, the law imposed upon defendant the exercise of ordinary care only. As hereinbefore stated, not only was the cause of action as stated in the complaint based upon the theory that plaintiff was a passenger, but the evidence clearly tended to establish such fact, hence defendant, as to plaintiff, was in duty bound to exercise the highest degree of care. Now, conceding (but not so holding, since it is not necessary to so decide) that the court erred in giving the instruction based upon facts requiring defendant to exercise ordinary care only, it could not have been prejudiced thereby. Indeed, as to defendant obviously the instruction was favorable rather than otherwise.

Objections to some of the questions propounded with the view of proving the extent of plaintiff's injuries should have been sustained. For instance, plaintiff's employer was asked whether or not there was any kind of carpenter work which, upon being requested, plaintiff refused to do, to which he answered, "Yes." Conceding questions of this nature improper since plaintiff may have arbitrarily refused, it is apparent, in view of ample evidence given as to the extent of the injury suffered, that no prejudice resulted therefrom. They were not calculated to influence the jury in arriving at its verdict.

Our attention is directed to no prejudicial error, and the order appealed from is affirmed.

1. Appeal and Error 🔑757(1, 3)—Briefs—Incorporating Evidence.

Where appeal is taken under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 953a–953c, judgment will not be reversed because of insufficiency of evidence to justify findings of fact, where briefs do not contain any portion of judgment roll, nor enough evidence to enable court to determine merits of objections urged, but show that the record contains testimony besides that quoted relating to findings in question.

2. Appeal and Error 🔑631 — Record — Printing.

Record on appeal may be prepared under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 953a–953c, as amended in 1915, even though appeal is on judgment roll alone, and such record need not be printed, but may be typewritten under Supreme Court rule 7 (119 Pac. xi).

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action by Anna C. McKinnell against Hettie Hansen and another. From judgment for defendants, plaintiff appealed to the District Court of Appeal, where the judgment was affirmed. Application for hearing in Supreme Court denied.

The following is the opinion of Conrey, P. J., in the District Court of Appeal:

The attorney for appellants opens his brief with the statement that this is an appeal from a judgment denying the relief prayed for in the cross-complaint of appellants. He says that the cross-complaint alleged that the property described therein was the community property of appellants, and that appellant Hettie Hansen executed deeds thereof to the respondent; that appellants asked to have the deeds set aside and canceled, or that the respondent be declared a constructive trustee for appellants on certain grounds stated. The brief then proceeds to argue the following propositions: (1) That the finding that Hettie Hansen did not execute the deeds because of fear of arrest or immunity from arrest is not justified by the evidence; (2) that the finding that respondent did not have actual notice that the property was the community property of Hettie Hansen and H. P. Hansen is not supported by the evidence; (3) that there is no finding of fact nor does the evidence justify the finding that respondent was an incumbrancer in good faith and for a valuable consideration, as provided in section 164 of the Civil Code; (4) that the burden of proof is on the respondent to show that she is an incumbrancer in good faith; (5) that appellants are not estopped to assert that the property is community property; (6) that the finding that the consideration consisted of a prior existing indebtedness and additional advances of money at the time of the execution of said deeds is not justified by the evidence. Within the argument on the first proposition the point is presented that the trial court erred in refusing to admit certain offered testimony to which objections made by respondent were sustained by that court. The foregoing is a complete outline of the points presented for consideration here.

The typewritten transcripts, being a "Clerk's Transcript on Appeal," certified by the clerk of the superior court, and a "Reporter's Transcript" approved by the judge, are the only papers on file herein, except appellants' brief. Section 950 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides, among other things, that on appeal from a final judgment the appellant must furnish the court with a copy of the judgment roll. Section 953, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that the copy of the judgment roll must be certified to be correct by the clerk or the attorneys. These requirements have stood unchanged in the Code since 1874, although some other phraseology of section 950 was amended in 1915 (nearly a year after the transcripts in the case were filed). In 1907 sections 953a, 953b, and 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure were enacted. They provide for what is called the alternative method of preparing a record on appeal. This alternative method was designed to apply to a record made on the trial of an action or of some proceeding in an action. Thereby the appealing party is allowed to require that the stenographic reporter prepare a transcript of his phonographic report of the trial, in cases where there was such a report. After notice as prescribed, the transcript is settled and allowed by the judge. Thereupon it shall "become a portion of the judgment roll and may be considered on appeal in lieu of the bill of exceptions now provided for by law." Sections 953a, 953b, and 953c do not contain any provisions which modify the force or effect of sections 950 and 953, Code of Civil Procedure, or the rules of practice thereunder, on an appeal from a judgment.

Rule 7 (119 Pac. xi) of the Supreme Court, as in force in 1907 and long prior thereto, provided that all transcripts of record must be printed in the manner there stated. Thereafter rule 7 was modified by excepting from its operation criminal cases and civil cases coming under the provisions of section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure. It remains true now, just as it was prior to the enactment of sections 953a, 953b, and 953c, that a judgment roll prepared as required by section 950, Code of Civil Procedure, and its correctness certified by the clerk or attorneys as required by section 953, Code of Civil Procedure, must be printed as required by rule 7. Section 953c says of the record prepared in accordance with sections 953a and 953b: "Said record shall be filed with the clerk of the court to which the appeal is taken and no transcript thereof need be printed. In filing briefs on said appeal the parties must, however, print in their briefs, or in a supplement appended thereto, such portions of the record as they desire to call to the attention of the court." The typewritten "Clerk's Transcript" filed herein is plainly not the record prescribed in the foregoing quotation, and since it is not printed it cannot be considered. Without it this court does not know what were the issues and does not know what were the findings in the court below. If it be objected that this is a technical ruling, the answer must be that the law may be technical, as all laws or rules of practice are in a sense technical, but that the ruling in this case is not so. We are not here construing doubtful phrases. We are enforcing a long-established rule of practice, well known to the profession, which has been in force for many years, and which this court is not authorized to repeal or ignore.

But even if we were to accept the clerk's transcript of the judgment roll upon the assumption that it is properly before the court, appellants' case would not be very much improved thereby. Counsel for appellants have not printed in their brief or in any supplement appended thereto any portion of the judgment roll, nor have they printed therein a sufficient portion of the evidence to enable the court to determine the merits of the objections urged in their argument. As above noted, their principal points relate to claimed insufficiency of the evidence to justify certain findings of fact. Out of the reporter's transcript of more than 150 pages, they have quoted in their brief not more than 5 pages of testimony. These excerpts from the testimony are connected together by narrative statements related by counsel which show on their face (and counsel asserts nothing to the contrary) that the record contains much testimony other than that quoted in the brief, relating to the findings in question. Therefore we are not left in a position where we are able to assume that the quotations in the brief are complete as to the points argued, or to say that the record does not contain the evidence necessary to sustain the findings of fact. The situation is much like that in Pasadena Realty Co. v. Clune (Civil No. 1646) 166 Pac. 1025, decision filed in this court June 6, 1917, wherein we said: "In order to ascertain whether there is merit in the contentions of appellant, the court would be compelled to examine the typewritten transcript and look therein for the testimony and copies of the documents relied upon, instead of in the brief of appellant, where such testimony and records should have been printed. This the court is not required to do. Marcucci v. Vowinckel, 164 Cal. 693, 130 Pac. 430; Wills v. Woolner, 21 Cal. App. 528, 132 Pac. 283; Miller v. Oliver et al., 163 Pac. 357."

In the foregoing decision James, J., concurred in the following opinion:

I concur in the judgment. I am not prepared to agree, however, with the conclusion announced by the presiding justice that on an appeal under the alternative method, to wit, under the provisions of section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure, it is necessary that the judgment roll shall be printed. It does seem clear under that section, however, that the judgment roll should be made a part of the transcript which is certified to by the trial judge. However, as to the printing of the judgment roll, I gather that our Supreme Court has taken the view that section 953a does not contemplate that the roll shall be presented in printed form, but that the same may be typewritten. I refer to subdivision 2 of rule 7, prescribing the form of transcripts which are to be presented under the so-called alternative method. In that part of the rule to which attention is directed the court has declared that transcripts on appeal prepared under the method referred to "must be typewritten and the paper and the backs for binding the same must not exceed ten inches in length and eight inches in width, * * * the papers constituting the ordinary judgment roll, are here designated as the 'Clerk's Transcript,' and the certified transcriptions of the phonographic reporter's notes * * * are here designated as the 'Reporter's Transcript.'" Neither by the statute nor rule of court is a party excused from printing in his brief such portions of the "record," which includes both the clerk's and the reporter's transcripts, as he may desire to call to the attention of the appellate court. As we have heretofore had occasion to suggest, the so-called alternative method is most unsatisfactory in practice, and we have been unable to perceive how under that method any expense is saved to the litigants, or that the court or the attorneys are thereunder relieved of any labor. Multiplying methods under which appeals may be taken can conduce only to confusion in the practice and produce results which in no wise aid in the administration of justice.

Henry J. Bischoff, of San Diego, for appellants. Lester D. Welch, of San Diego, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. [1] In denying the application for a hearing in this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the Second Appellate District, we deem it proper to say that we do so solely upon the second ground for affirmance stated in the opinion of Mr. Presiding Justice Conrey.

[2] We do not concur as to the first ground. Rule 7 (119 Pac. xi) of this court has never been considered by this court as requiring a printed transcript where the record on appeal is made up under the provision of section 953a et seq., Code of Civil Procedure. It is the settled construction of that rule that in any civil case in which a record on appeal is authorized to be prepared under those sections the case is a civil case "coming under the provisions of section 953a" within the meaning of the rule, and that under the express terms of the rule (subs. 1 and 2) the whole record on appeal, including the judgment roll, may be typewritten. Such has been the invariable practice. Prior to the amendment of section 953a in 1915 it was held that when the appeal was on the judgment roll alone no record on appeal could be prepared thereunder, but it is settled by decisions made since the amendment that the effect thereof is to authorize a record thereunder even when the appeal is on the judgment roll alone, with the consequent right to a typewritten record thereof.

The application for a hearing in this court is denied.

Proc. § 953c, court will not reverse judgment on ground that evidence is insufficient to support findings, where appellant's brief contains some of the evidence bearing on questions argued, but shows that there was other evidence on the same subject which is not quoted.

3. NOVATION 🔑12—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—RELEASE.
Evidence held sufficient to support finding of novation of debtors where it shows that at meeting of creditors and old and new debtors it was agreed that creditors should accept reduction and look to new debtor for their money, that one suit against old debtor was dismissed in accordance with agreement, and that other creditors transferred their accounts to name of new debtor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Howard A. Peairs, Judge.

Action by Walter A. Emmett, Jr., against W. H. Coons. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

For opinion in Supreme Court denying rehearing, see 167 Pac. 890.

H. H. Bell, of Maricopa, and E. F. Brittan, of Bakersfield, for appellant. E. L. Foster and Chas. A. Barnhart, both of Bakersfield, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. The defendant appeals from the judgment and contends that the judgment should be reversed on grounds of insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings.

The only records filed herein are a typewritten reporter's transcript settled and allowed by the judge, and the typewritten clerk's transcript certified by the clerk of the court below. The judgment roll has not been printed, and it is not before the court in the form required by law. McKinnell v. Hansen, 167 Pac. 887, decided by this court June 2, 1917. By assuming the existence of the record as counsel assume it in their argument, we learn that the action was brought by the plaintiff as assignee of several creditors of Warren Barnes against the defendant, Coons, under an alleged agreement of novation whereby Coons was substituted as debtor instead of Barnes.

[1] It is conceded that there was no agreement in writing, and it is claimed by appellant that the evidence failed to show a release of Barnes by his original creditors. Such release would be necessary to make a novation substituting a new debtor. Civ. Code, § 1531, subd. 2; section 2794, subd. 3.

[2] Counsel for appellant in their brief have quoted some portions of the testimony, and thereby have attracted our attention "to such portions of the record as they desire to call to the attention of the court." Code Civ. Proc. § 953c. It may be conceded that the testimony quoted does not show any release of the original debtor by his creditors. This, however, does not enable us to say that there is no such evidence, when we observe also by reading the same brief that there was other evidence on the subject which they did not quote. Thus they refer us to the testimony of Warren Barnes and assure us that it fails to show that he was released by the creditors. They tell us that this testimony commences on page 81 of the transcript, but their quotations give only certain parts of pages 100 to 103. They do not tell us that these quotations are the only portions of the testimony of Barnes bearing upon the question argued. Again, they tell us that the testimony introduced by the defendant is in contradiction to that offered by the plaintiff. Then, instead of quoting the testimony on which they rely, they give us a statement of counsel for appellant purporting to outline what the testimony of the defendant's witnesses "shows." This is one of those numerous cases in which the Supreme Court and the Courts of Appeal are asked to waste their time in digging through records not presented as required by law, in order to reverse judgments. With hundreds of cases waiting for decision, the interests of justice do not demand and it scarcely can be said that those interests permit us to delay the decision of the cases in waiting while we make up statements and attempt to analyze records that are not properly presented. In this case there has been a more extensive quotation of evidence by counsel for respondent, who deemed it not safe to rely upon the fact that the record was not sufficiently presented on the other side.

[3] From the evidence quoted in the brief for respondent, we learn that there were meetings of creditors of Barnes, at one or more of which meetings the defendant, Coons, was present. The witnesses failed to give the names of all the creditors who were present, but apparently there were more than the number whose assigned claims are represented by the plaintiff in this action. Counsel admit that it was stipulated that the amounts of the claims as set forth in the complaint are not in question. One of the witnesses testified that:

> "It was finally agreed by everybody present that they would accept 20 per cent. reduction, and accept Mr. Coons' proposition and look to Mr. Coons for their money."

In one instance a suit which had been commenced against Barnes was, in accordance with that agreement, dismissed, and in other instances the creditors transferred their accounts to the name of Coons. While the testimony thus developed by the brief of respondent might well be more definite in some details, it does tend to support the finding which counsel have chosen to discuss, and we are unable to say that the findings are not supported by the evidence.

We have discussed the principal proposition upon which appellant relies for a reversal. The other propositions referred to in the brief are subsidiary to the principal one, and as presented are not sufficient to sustain the appeal.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: JAMES, J.; WORKS, Judge pro tem.

EMMETT v. COONS. (L. A. 5323.)

APPEAL AND ERROR ⚷631—PRINTING JUDGMENT ROLL—NECESSITY.

In an appeal from a judgment on the grounds of the insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings, it is not necessary that the judgment roll be printed where a typewritten reporter's transcript settled and allowed by the judge and a typewritten clerk's transcript certified by the clerk of the court below are filed.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Howard A. Peairs, Judge.

Application for rehearing. Denied.

For opinion of appellate court, see 167 Pac. 888.

H. H. Bell, of Maricopa, and E. F. Brittan, of Bakersfield, for appellant. E. L. Foster and Chas. A. Barnhart, both of Bakersfield, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. In denying the application for a hearing in this court, we deem it proper to say that we disapprove the statement in the opinion that because the judgment roll was not printed "it is not before the court in the form required by law." We have already expressed our view on this question, in denying a hearing in this court of the case of McKinnell v. Hansen, 167 Pac. 887, referred to in the opinion. The opinion, however, shows that in deciding the case the court did assume the existence of a proper record of the judgment roll.

CUNNISON v. MILLER et al. (Civ. 2104.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR ⚷757(1)—BRIEFS—INCORPORATING RECORD.

Judgment will not be reversed on appeal under "alternative method" where appellant prints in his brief no part of record to which he desires to call attention.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR ⚷957(2)—JUDGMENT ⚷139—DEFAULT—SETTING ASIDE—DISCRETION—REVIEW.

Determination of motion to set aside default judgment on the ground of mistake, inadvertence, surprise, and excusable neglect rests in discretion of trial court, which will not be disturbed in the absence of abuse.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR ⚷865—REVIEW—BILL—SUFFICIENCY.

On an appeal from deficiency judgment taken against appellant by default in action to foreclose mortgage, objection that complaint does not state cause of action cannot be reached where the judgment is not void.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by James Cunnison against Charles Lee Miller, William Evans, and another. From judgment for plaintiff, William Evans appeals. Affirmed.

Jas. W. Bell, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Ralph E. Swing, of San Bernardino, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Defendant Evans prosecutes this appeal from an order made by the trial court denying the motion of said defendant to have set aside a judgment taken against him after service of summons and complaint had been regularly made and default entered. The notice of appeal also states that the defendant appeals from the "deficiency judgment made and entered against him in said action."

[1] The appeal is taken under the so-called and most unsatisfactory "alternative method," but appellant has failed to follow the statute in that no part of the record to which he desires to call attention is printed in his brief. Having omitted to comply with the direction of the statute in that regard, no duty is imposed upon this court to examine the typewritten transcript. Marcucci v. Vowinckel, 164 Cal. 693, 130 Pac. 430; Wills v. Woolner, 21 Cal. App. 528, 132 Pac. 283; Miller v. Oliver et al., 163 Pac. 357; Pasadena Realty Co. v. Clune, 166 Pac. 1025; McKinnell v. Hansen et al., 167 Pac. 887.

We have, however, looked over the briefs and in an abstract way considered the propositions argued therein. The appellant, it is stated, was the mortgagee named in a certain mortgage. This mortgage and the accompanying note he transferred to this plaintiff. The transfer of the note was effected by a simple indorsement on the back. The plaintiff, bringing this action to foreclose the mortgage, joined appellant as a party for the purpose of securing a deficiency judgment against him in the event that by sale of the security the debt was not satisfied. The sale of the property did not in fact produce sufficient money to satisfy the mortgage debt, and deficiency judgment was entered against appellant for the sum of $401.50. This appellant, after service of summons, made no appearance in the action and allowed judgment to be taken against him by default. He afterwards made motion, based upon the alleged ground of mistake, inadvertence, surprise, and excusable neglect, to have this judgment set aside, which motion was by the court denied.

[2] The matter of determining such a motion rests within the sound discretion of the trial judge, and upon the statement of the facts as set forth in the brief we cannot see that the court abused its discretion. Appellant did not appeal from the judgment of foreclosure, but appealed, so it is stated, from the "deficiency judgment." The liability of appellant was determined by the judgment of foreclosure wherein it was adjudged that he was liable for any money that might be necessary to make up the deficiency between the amount realized on the sale of the property and the mortgage debt, with incidental costs. The entry of deficiency judgment was an incident which followed only because it was adjudged in the original decree that the plaintiff was entitled to that relief.

[3] The question whether the complaint stated facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, as it is argued by appellant it did not, we think could not be reached by this appeal; for a judgment so entered upon such a complaint, where the party defendant has defaulted, would not be void.

PEOPLE v. EDGAR. (Cr. 673.)

1. Witnesses 🔑351—Impeachment—Relationship with Accused—Misconduct.

While it may be shown that a witness had illicit relations with accused, as affecting her credibility, it is improper to ask questions in bad faith, and lay foundations for impeachment, when no evidence is to be offered in impeachment.

2. Criminal Law 🔑720(5)—Misconduct of Counsel.

An insistence by a prosecuting attorney that a witness swear to the truth of her statements upon a crucifix pressed against her breast was a direct intimation that the witness could not be believed under an ordinary oath, and was flagrant misconduct.

3. Criminal Law 🔑723(1)—Misconduct of Counsel.

Where, on objection to a question on cross-examination of a prosecutrix in a rape case as to her knowledge of what would happen if defendant was convicted, counsel said, "I know what would happen to him if it were my daughter," there was misconduct tending to inflame the jury.

4. Criminal Law 🔑719(1, 3) — Misconduct of Counsel in Argument.

It is error in argument to tell the jury the opinions of different persons as to the guilt of accused, the indictment and opinions of guilt not being evidence of guilt; nor can the prosecuting attorney give his opinion, except as to evidence introduced on the trial.

5. Criminal Law 🔑719(3) — Remarks of Counsel.

A remark of a prosecuting attorney that he would not prosecute a man if he did not believe him guilty is erroneous, as putting the opinion into evidence, and leads the jury to believe the attorney has based his opinion partly on facts not shown in evidence.

6. Criminal Law 🔑1171(3) — Remarks of Counsel—Error.

Remark of prosecuting attorney that he would not let fraternal orders and politics affect his prosecuting the case was prejudicial; there being no evidence whatever regarding it.

7. Criminal Law 🔑1171(3)—Misconduct of Counsel—Argument to Jury.

A statement of a prosecuting attorney in a rape case, in effect that if the defendant were not guilty he could and should have discovered and shown whether or not prosecutrix had sexual intercourse with others, was prejudicial, as impressing the jury that the burden of proof was on defendant.

8. Rape 🔑36 — Evidence — Burden of Proof.

In a rape case, there is no duty on the defendant to show who the guilty party was, or that other persons had intercourse with prosecutrix, no matter if defendant has special means for knowing.

9. Criminal Law 🔑1037(2)—Appeal—Misconduct of Counsel—Request That Jury be Admonished.

Although ordinarily necessary to request the court to admonish the jury where there is misconduct of counsel, such is not the case where the court tells the jury that he is not going to admonish them each time, but that they should not consider anything to which an objection is sustained.

10. Criminal Law 🔑730(1)—New Trial—Misconduct of Counsel — Admonishment of Jury.

Where misconduct of counsel is so persisted in and pernicious that it is not in human nature to forget, a mere admonishment to the jury is insufficient, and a new trial is necessary.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; W. A. Beasly, Judge.

William Edgar was convicted of statutory rape, and he appeals. Reversed.

H. A. Blanchard, of San Jose, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. The defendant was charged with and convicted of the crime of rape, alleged to have been committed upon a female under the age of consent. He was sentenced to 20 years' imprisonment in the penitentiary, and appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

As is quite frequent in criminal cases appealed from the county of Santa Clara (from which this appeal comes), the misconduct of the district attorney during the trial of the cause is the principal point made for a reversal of the judgment. It seems to be a pronounced proclivity of the district attorney of that county to endeavor, in the trial of a person charged with crime, to circumvent the well-settled and generally well-understood rules of evidence by willfully injecting into the case immaterial and prejudicial matters, through the medium of innuendo, bald assertions of his personal opinion as to alleged facts, and the poor pretense of arguing objections, all obviously intended for the ears and consideration of the jury. In the past, similar misconduct, which has been brought to our attention in other recent cases, did not result in a reversal of the judgment, not, however, because it was not abundantly established, but because the evidence in the given case sufficiently showed the defendant to be guilty, and we were satisfied that the verdict of the jury had not been controlled or materially affected by such misconduct. The situation in the present case is obviously different. Here the testimony of the prosecuting witness was not only uncertain and contradictory in matters of vital importance, but was shown to be willfully and absolutely false in certain particulars affecting a material phase of her story. Moreover, her story in part runs close to the border line of the fantastic.

No good purpose would be served by narrating in detail her testimony; but for the purpose of showing its improbability in an essential feature it will suffice to say that she testified in substance that the defendant, prior to the commission of the particular act for which he was on trial, had had sexual intercourse with her at regular intervals during a period of several months, but that on each occasion there was but slight penetration, and she undertook to state with exactitude its extent, and also testified that on each occasion the defendant was content to lie passively upon her for a period of 15 minutes without engaging in the motions which ordinarily accompany an act of sexual intercourse. The improbability of the testimony of the prosecuting witness in the particular stated is obvious. It was so to Dr. Beaty, a witness for the prosecution, who, referring to it, said:

> "I can conceive of an entering carefully, very carefully, and being withdrawn, without causing a rupture of the hymen. I think it is very unnatural, very unusual. It is not common to carry on acts of sexual intercourse as described by the prosecutrix. I have a reasonable doubt as to whether that would be probable, but not as to its being possible. It is a possibility, but not a probability."

The defendant, testifying in his own behalf, denied the story of the prosecutrix; and a Mrs. Perry, a witness called by him, corroborated him in the particular that he did not and could not have committed the offense charged on the day and at the place and time charged. This witness testified in substance that she and her husband had been particular and intimate friends of the defendant and his wife, and had frequently visited them at their home, and that after the wife's death she (the witness) had been in the habit of visiting the defendant at his home for the purpose of gathering up and doing his laundry, and at one time after the death of his wife had attended him during an illness; that she was at the defendant's home, accompanied by her children, on the day and during the hours that the prosecutrix testified the defendant had committed the act charged against him; that while there the prosecutrix called, but that the defendant told her to go home, and on that occasion at no time attempted, and had no opportunity to commit, any act of impropriety with her. This witness was subjected to a very severe cross-examination by the district attorney. He was not satisfied to rest upon the results obtained by this examination, but resorted to what we must characterize as the grossest misconduct in a further effort to discredit her. His attitude and conduct will be best shown by excerpts from the record of the trial.

> "Q. (By Mr. Free on cross-examination). You cannot say whether you went there [to the defendant's home] once or several times that week [the week in which the offense was charged]? A. I never went several times in one week when Mr. Edgar was not sick. Q. Oh, I see. A. When Mr. Edgar was sick, my husband as a rule would go with me, and sometimes I went alone, and my husband was a frequent visitor, and visited Mr. Edgar very often, and I went with my husband's consent. Q. Did your husband go there to visit Mr. Edgar, or come to get you to bring you home?
> "Mr. Blanchard (counsel for the defendant): Just a second. I object to that, on the ground it is immaterial, irrelevant, and incompetent, not proper cross-examination, and intended by the district attorney as an insult to this witness, and I assign the same as misconduct, and ask that the jury be instructed to disregard it.
> "The Court: The objection is sustained. Gentlemen of the jury, whenever the court sustains an objection to a question you are to disregard the question as well as the answer—there being no answer in this case.
> "Q. Haven't you and your husband had frequent trouble about Mr. Edgar?
> "Mr. Blanchard: That is objected to as immaterial, irrelevant, and incompetent, and not proper cross-examination, and intended by the district attorney as an insult to this witness, and I assign the same as misconduct of the district attorney, and I ask the court to instruct the district attorney to desist from such misconduct, and I ask that the jury be instructed to disregard any statement of that character.
> "Mr. Free: I want to answer that. This witness alleges that her conduct in this respect is agreeable to her husband, which is contrary to the fact, as we know, and the husband will so state; and I want the right to cross-examine her and lay the foundation for further testimony.
> "Mr. Blanchard: I assign the statement of the district attorney as misconduct. I state that it is absolutely false, and the husband has visited Mr. Edgar frequently himself.
> "Mr. Free: Will you consent to the husband being called and sworn and asked the questions?
> "Mr. Blanchard: I will waive none of my rights so far as that is concerned. The fact of a defendant such as Mr. Edgar being indicted on a charge of rape, and then deny him the right to have a lady come to testify, without branding her as being guilty of every crime than that one you allege this man is guilty of. This lady is the mother of five children, and one a baby in arms, a baby 18 months old; yet she comes into court to be insulted by an officer whose duty it is to protect this woman, and I insist that we have a right to the protection of this court, and I demand that the district attorney of this county desist from insulting this witness time after time.
> "The Court: Well, I don't think that further discussion is necessary. The court sustained the objection yesterday. The witness has volunteered the statement here that I presume the district attorney thought I invited this question. If he wishes to have that statement stricken out, I will have it stricken out; and, gentlemen of the jury, counsel sometimes become heated, and the court usually tries to moderate their arguments as far as possible. These arguments and statements by the district attorney and the attorney for the defendant are not evidence, and you must not accept them as evidence in any way; and when the court sustains an objection to a question you must wipe the question from your mind, as well as remember that the answer has not been given, or, if it has been given and stricken out, that you must not regard it in any way. I will not repeat this instruction to you frequently. It may appear proper to do so, and it may be asked; but I am depending upon you as intelligent men to remember it and bear it in mind whenever such instances occur in the future.
> "Mr. Free: Q. What did you mean when you testified that you got the bedding on Tuesday? A. I was there on Tuesday, the 14th, and the children went on Thursday. You get me complicated. I suppose that is your business to do so. You have attacked my character so terrible that you got me so overwrought that I don't know what I am saying sometimes. I want you to understand that I am a good woman. * * * Q. Well, Mrs. Perry, I don't think you know any date that you were there, and I don't think that you know that you were there on the 14th.

"Mr. Blanchard: That is objected to, and I assign the same as misconduct. * * *

"Q. You and Mr. Edgar have been in the house alone for a considerable time on various occasions? A. Yes, sir. Q. And you and your husband have had some words about it?

"Mr. Blanchard: I object to that, on the ground it is immaterial, irrelevant, and incompetent, and I assign the question as misconduct.

"The Court: The objection is sustained.

"Q. You are living with your husband? A. Yes, sir. Q. Have you any other children (evidently referring to a child not previously mentioned)? A. Yes, sir. Q. What is his name? A. William. Q. William Edgar, isn't it? A. Not William Edgar. William Oliver.

"Mr. Blanchard: I assign the statement of the district attorney as an insult to the witness and as misconduct.

"Q. Isn't the child generally known about the community as William Edgar Perry?

"Mr. Blanchard: Just a moment. I object to that as irrelevant, incompetent, and immaterial, and intended by the district attorney as an insult to the witness, and I demand the protection of the court for this lady, and I assign the same as misconduct.

"The Court: The objection is sustained. It is incompetent, Mr. Free.

"Q. What did you say his name is? A. William Oliver. Q. And how old is it? A. Fourteen months old, it will be, the 25th of this month. Q. And after whom was it named?

"Mr. Blanchard: I object again to the question, and I assign the same as misconduct.

"The Court: The objection is sustained."

[1] The misconduct of the district attorney as shown above is apparent; and that it was deliberately pursued, with the intent and purpose of prejudicing the jury against the witness and discrediting her testimony, is equally apparent. It will be conceded that the district attorney was privileged to show, if he could, that the relationship existing between the witness and the defendant was of such a character that she would be likely to color her testimony to suit the needs of the defendant; and with that end in view he would have been justified in asking in good faith questions based upon fact, or what he honestly believed to be the fact, for the purpose of laying a foundation for the impeachment of the witness. Of course, in urging the question in the face of an objection, he would have been justified in stating what he expected to prove by way of impeachment. But to state in the presence of the jury that it was a fact within his knowledge that the visits of the witness to the home of the defendant were not agreeable to her husband, and that the latter would so testify, was manifestly improper and injurious, both to the witness and the defendant. That the questions and statements objected to were not asked or made in good faith is evident, from the fact that the district attorney did not call the husband of the witness, for the purpose of impeachment or any other purpose during the trial, even though he had laid the foundation for impeachment. That he was acting in bad faith, and in so doing was prompted by a desire to badger and discredit the witness, is evidenced by his request, made to counsel for the defendant, to consent that the husband be called as a witness. Surely a man of the ability and extended experience of this particular district attorney in the trial of criminal cases must have known that it was not necessary for such consent to be had before the husband could be called as a witness for the people; and there can be no escape from the conclusion that in making the request it was the purpose of the district attorney to draw an objection from counsel for the defendant, and thereby give the jury the impression that he could substantiate his statement of what he asserted to be the fact, if counsel for the defendant would permit him to do so. In short, the district attorney by this device succeeded in placing before the jury his unsworn statement of a fact which was well calculated to prejudice the witness and the defendant in the eyes of the jury; for, as was said in the case of People v. Fleming, 166 Cal. 357, 380, 136 Pac. 291, 301 (Ann. Cas. 1915B, 881):

> "The plain effect of the statement was that the prosecution had such proofs, but could not make them, because the law of evidence prevented such a course."

The questions of the district attorney, which by innuendo conveyed the impression that the witness' child, William, was the son of the defendant, were wholly unwarranted by anything that had been previously testified to by the witness, and were therefore improper cross-examination. Such a vile, and, in so far as the record shows, unwarranted, insinuation, uttered by one so high in authority as the district attorney—whose sworn duty it is to protect witnesses from unnecessary insult—must have prejudiced the witness and the defendant in the eyes of the jury, for—

> "the prosecuting attorney may well be assumed to be a man of fair standing before the jury, and they may well have thought that he would not have asked the question unless he could have proved what it intimated." People v. Crosby, 17 Cal. App. 524, 120 Pac. 441; People v. Tufts, 167 Cal. 266, 139 Pac. 78.

[2] The district attorney's successful insistence that the witness should swear to the truth of her statements upon a crucifix pressed against her breast was another instance of the badgering to which the witness was subjected; and doubtless was intended as a direct intimation to the jury that she could not be believed while testifying under the ordinary form of oath. This was a flagrant piece of misconduct.

[3] Another instance of misconduct is to be found in the cross-examination of the prosecutrix when, in making an objection to a question which called for the knowledge of the witness as to what would happen to the defendant if he were convicted upon her testimony, the district attorney, after stating the usual grounds of objection, said, "I know what would happen to him if it were my daughter." This statement was wholly unnecessary to the objection, and was plainly intended as an intimation to the jury that if the prosecutrix were his daughter he would kill the defendant because he believed him to be guilty; and the evident purpose of the statement was—and very likely had for its result—to inflame the minds of the jury against the defendant. State v. Robinson, 170 Iowa, 267, 152 N. W. 595.

[4] In his closing argument to the jury the district attorney again resorted to culpable misconduct, which was duly protested by defendant's counsel without any resulting admonition from the court, the trial court evidently being of the opinion that any irregularities occurring during the course of the argument would be corrected by its final charge to the jury. Extracts of the argument complained of follow:

> "Mr. Free: Gentlemen of the jury, Professor Holland and Mr. Lake heard this girl's story, and they believed it. They brought her before the grand jury. Nineteen men of this county, acting upon their oaths as grand jurors, heard her story, and believed it. I heard her story, and I believed it. The deputy sheriffs heard her story, and they believed it; and why shouldn't you believe it? * * * Another thing, gentlemen. If this condition had been caused by any person other than Edgar; if this little girl had been seen with any other man; if she had been in company with any boy—don't you suppose that they would have found it out with * * * detectives scouring the city? Don't you think that, if this had been done by anybody else, * * * they would have found it out and offered that proof? * * * I will not prosecute any man that I do not believe to be guilty for a thing of this kind; but you cannot put enough fraternal orders before me, you cannot put political inducements in my face to stop me, when the fate of a little girl is at stake. * * *"

No justification has been made of this argument, and, in our opinion, none can be made. It was grossly improper, and undoubtedly must have weighed heavily against the defendant. The indictment of the defendant was not any evidence of his guilt; and the personal belief in the guilt of the defendant entertained by the grand jurors, the district attorney, or the persons mentioned in the argument, nor the testimonial of the district attorney to his own integrity, had any proper place in the case, and should not have been presented for the consideration of the jury; for obviously such belief might have been based upon matters and things which were not before the jury in the form of legal evidence. The injection into the case of the district attorney's opinion and the opinion of others as to the guilt of the defendant in all likelihood must have weighed with the jury. State v. Baker, 246 Mo. 357, 152 S. W. 52; Nixon v. State, 14 Ga. App. 261, 80 S. E. 513; Moore v. State, 10 Ga. App. 805, 74 S. E. 318; People v. Dane, 59 Mich. 550, 26 N. W. 781; Commonwealth v. Shoemaker, 240 Pa. 255, 87 Atl. 685.

[5] When the district attorney declared that he would not prosecute any man he did not believe to be guilty, he thereby wrongfully placed his personal opinion of the guilt of the defendant in evidence in the case. He was privileged to argue to the jury that it was his opinion, formed from deductions made from the evidence adduced at the trial, that the defendant was guilty of the crime charged. People v. Rogers, 163 Cal. 476, 126 Pac. 143. But his declaration to the jury that he would not prosecute any man whom he did not believe to be guilty was tantamount to an assertion that he believed in the guilt of the defendant at the very inception of the prosecution; and necessarily such belief must have been founded upon the result of the district attorney's original and independent investigation of the charge, and therefore in all likelihood was based, in part at least, upon facts which did not appear, and which perhaps could not have been shown, in evidence.

In the case of State v. Gunderson, 26 N. D. 294, 144 N. W. 659, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 429, the defendant was convicted of the crime of rape upon the uncorroborated testimony of a 15 year old girl, which the Supreme Court of North Dakota characterized as "inconsistent and vacillating, and in many instances opposed to all human probabilities." In that case counsel for the state in his closing argument to the jury said, "I do not come here to try a case unless the defendant is guilty." This remark was held under all the circumstances of the case to be misconduct of so grievous a character as to necessitate a reversal of the judgment, for, as stated in the opinion:

> "No one who is at all conversant with jury trials can fail to see the possible prejudice of this remark. The scales were hanging in the balance. On one side is the positive denial of the defendant; on the other is the practically uncorroborated testimony of the complaining witness, that testimony being more or less contradictory and inconclusive. In such a juncture the state's attorney himself testifies, and seeks to force into the issue his own personality and his own standing and influence. * * *"

It is universally held that such remarks are not only a breach of professional propriety and professional ethics, but constitute legal error.

[6] We have searched the record in vain for any evidence to support the intimation of the district attorney, made in his argument, to the effect that the influence of fraternal orders and politics had been brought to bear on him to prevent the prosecution of the defendant. Such an argument, therefore, was entirely without the record, and ought not to have been indulged in. That it was intended to be, and was in a measure, prejudicial to the defendant, we have no doubt.

[7, 8] The district attorney placed a burden of proof upon the defendant greater than the law demands when in his argument he in effect told the jury that if the defendant were not guilty he could and should have discovered and shown in evidence whether or not the prosecutrix had had sexual intercourse with other persons. This argument was clearly improper and well calculated to mislead the jury. Obviously the motive of this argument was to impress the jury with the belief that, if the defendant was not guilty, it was incumbent upon him to show in evidence who the guilty party was; and the district attorney must have known as a matter of law that the defendant, in order to secure an acquittal, was not burdened with any such duty. Morris v. State, 9 Okl. Cr. 241, 131 Pac. 734; Brown v. State, 98 Miss. 786, 54 South. 305, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 815.

[9] It is contended upon behalf of the people that, while counsel for the defendant repeatedly protested the misconduct complained of, nevertheless he did not in any instance request the trial court to admonish the jury not to be influenced by the same, and that therefore the defendant will not now be heard to complain. Ordinarily, it is true, an assignment of misconduct will not be considered upon an appeal, in the absence of a showing that it was protested in the court below, coupled with a request that the court remove, if possible, the evil effects thereof by a proper admonition to the jury. It is also true that no such request was made in this case with every assignment of misconduct; but it must be remembered, as shown by the excerpt from the record hereinbefore quoted, that the first assignment of misconduct was accompanied with a request that the jury be admonished not to be influenced thereby, and, whether or not this particular assignment was well taken, the fact remains that the trial court sustained an objection to the question which it was claimed constituted misconduct, and at the same time charged the jury that whenever an objection was sustained they were to disregard the question as well as the answer, and later, when another assignment of misconduct was made, but which was not accompanied by a request for an admonition to the jury, the trial court, to its credit, of its own motion interposed with an admonition, and, as if anticipating what was to come, again told the jury that the sustaining of an objection to a question would suffice to warn them not to be influenced by the question or the answer, and that, while it might appear proper to do so, still no other or more explicit admonition would be frequently given.

Clearly, in view of the trial court's announcement, it was not incumbent upon counsel for the defendant to thereafter request an admonition to the jury when making an assignment of misconduct. Moreover, the learned trial judge, in an endeavor to safeguard the rights of the defendant against unfair attack, and apparently appreciating the gravity of the repeated misconduct of the district attorney, was not content, as he first intimated, to have a mere ruling sustaining an objection as an admonition to the jury; for the record shows that he at times, of his own motion, reprimanded the district attorney, and admonished the jury not to be influenced by certain misconduct. Such reprimands, however, apparently did not avail to deter the district attorney from the commission of subsequent acts of misconduct, which were so pronounced and persistent as to run close to the border line of contempt. And that this is so is evident by the fact that a particular piece of misconduct, occurring just as the trial was drawing to a close, and one which we have not heretofore mentioned, provoked the trial court to say:

> "Now, Mr. Free, one more transgression such as this one will merit a severe penalty from the court."

Thus it will be seen that the paramount point presented here does not involve a waiver of the misconduct complained of by failure to request that its evil effect be offset by an admonition to the jury, but rather presents the question of whether or not the admonitions actually given suffice to remove the prejudice engendered by the misconduct.

[10] While it is the general rule that, if it can fairly be said, from all of the circumstances of the case, considered in conjunction with the nature and extent of the assigned misconduct, that an admonition of the court had the desired effect, there can be no just cause for complaint, nevertheless it is a recognized exception to that rule that where, as here, in a closely balanced criminal case, misconduct is repeated and persisted in, despite the warnings and admonitions of the trial court, and is so pronounced and pernicious that it is not in human nature to forget or disregard its prejudicial effect, then manifestly a mere admonition, or any number of admonitions, will not suffice to right the wrong done, and the only remedy remaining is to be found in a reversal of the judgment.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

ARMSTRONG v. BARCELOUX.
HOSKING v. SAME.

(Civ. 1680.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 15, 1917.)

1. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT ⚷195—FINDINGS—SUFFICIENCY — "OSTENSIBLE AGENCY" — "OSTENSIBLE AUTHORITY."

Under Civ. Code, §§ 2300, 2317, 2334, declaring that agency is ostensible when the principal intentionally, or by want of ordinary care, causes a third person to believe another to be his agent who is not really employed by him, and that an ostensible authority is such as a principal intentionally, or by want of ordinary care, causes or allows a third person to believe an agent possesses, and that a principal is bound by the acts of his agent under a merely ostensible authority, a finding that defendant by his acts and conduct caused plaintiff to believe that another was his agent, and that plaintiff sold and delivered goods to such person upon the faith that defendant was responsible for her acts, is insufficient to show that an ostensible agency was created; not showing any intentional conduct or neglect on defendant's part creating in plaintiff's mind the belief that the agency existed.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Ostensible Agency; Ostensible Authority.]

2. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT 🔑195—FINDINGS—REJECTION.

A finding of fact, in an action for goods sold, that defendant caused plaintiff to believe that another was his agent, and that plaintiff sold and delivered goods to such person upon the faith of defendant, being liable for her acts, may be disregarded as immaterial, not being germane to the theory of the complaint, which was that sale was to defendant direct, and being insufficient to establish an ostensible agency.

3. TRIAL 🔑404(1) — FINDINGS — CONSTRUCTION.

Findings of fact by the trial court should receive such a construction as will uphold, rather than defeat, the judgment.

4. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT 🔑189(4)—AGENCY—PLEADING—VARIANCE.

In an action for goods sold and delivered, proof that they were sold to defendant through his authorized agent will support a judgment against defendant, though the agency was not averred.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑173(6) — ISSUES IN LOWER COURT—MODE OF RAISING.

In an action for goods sold and delivered, defendant on appeal cannot secure reversal of a judgment against him on the ground that the contract was void under the statute of frauds, because not in writing, where the point was not raised by objection to the evidence nor by motion for nonsuit.

6. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑195—AMENDMENTS—OBJECTION BELOW.

Defendant cannot on appeal for the first time object to the allowance of a trial amendment to the complaint.

7. SALES 🔑52(6)—ACTIONS—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In an action for goods sold and delivered, evidence held sufficient to warrant a judgment for plaintiff on the ground that the sale was directly to defendant; credit being extended to him alone.

8. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT 🔑22(1)—AUTHORITY OF AGENT—DECLARATIONS OF AGENT.

An agency cannot be established by the declarations or conduct of the supposed agent.

9. SALES 🔑187 — INTEREST — ALLOWANCE — RIGHT TO.

Interest on an account for goods sold is properly allowed from the time of filing the complaint.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Chas. O. Busick, Judge.

Action by E. C. Armstrong against H. J. Barceloux, doing business under the fictitious name of Hotel St. Francis, and action by W. A. Hosking against the same defendant. There were judgments for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed as to the first-named plaintiff, and reversed with directions as to the last.

Wm. T. Belieu and C. L. Donohoe, both of Willow, for appellant. J. J. Henderson, of Sacramento, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. This is an appeal from the judgment rendered in each of the above-entitled causes, which by stipulation were tried at the same time, the issues and testimony in each being of a similar nature.

The action by E. C. Armstrong, a corporation, consists of a single cause of action. W. A. Hosking sues as assignee for collection of the Golden Poppy Bakery & Confectionery Company, a copartnership; of the Sacramento Laundry, a corporation; of the Meredith Fish Company, a corporation; of the Peerless Ice Cream Company, a copartnership; and of the American Fish Company, a corporation. The claim of the American Fish Company was subsequently dropped.

Both complaints were originally against H. J. Barceloux and Amelia Pratt, also known as Aimee M. Wolf, also known as Mrs. G. M. Pratt, doing business under the firm name and style of Hotel St. Francis, and G. M. Pratt, upon the theory that Barceloux and Amelia Pratt formed a copartnership, but at the close of the case plaintiffs filed complaints to conform to proofs against "H. J. Barceloux, doing business under the fictitious name of Hotel St. Francis," upon the theory that Amelia Pratt was but the ostensible agent of Barceloux.

It appears that the Hotel St. Francis was owned and operated by the Plaza Realty Company, a corporation, the stock of which was owned by one Dr. Tryon and Barceloux, each owning 50 per cent. Up to February, 1915, Dr. Tryon acted as general manager, though in October, 1914, Mrs. Pratt became a sort of partial manager, watching out particularly for the interests of Barceloux. During this period plaintiffs and their assignors had been creditors of the Realty Company, each having an open and running account.

The stockholders being unable to agree, Barceloux, in February, 1915, ousted Dr. Tryon, and himself assumed personal control of the hotel. Dr. Tryon thereupon himself paid what debts were owed by the hotel, and obtained releases from creditors of all claims against the Realty Company. Barceloux, having no authority to act for the Realty Company in order to facilitate his management, opened an account in the Fort Sutter National Bank in his own name, through which the finances of the hotel passed. From this time on Mrs. Pratt was in full control, doing all purchasing, engaging help, making necessary contracts, etc. Down to May 15, 1915, most of the outgoing checks were signed personally by Barceloux, but often checks were signed "H. J. Barceloux, by Aimee M. Pratt." It appears also that upon assuming control, Barceloux, together with Mrs. Pratt, visited different merchants with whom they dealt, among them E. C. Armstrong and Craddoc Meredith. Both Armstrong and Meredith testify that Barceloux there told them that Mrs. Pratt was in charge of the hotel, to let her have what credit she asked and that he would be responsible. Barceloux claims that he forcefully impressed upon their minds that he was merely representing the Realty Company and intended to assume no personal liability.

In May, 1915, the Plaza Realty Company sold their property to the city of Sacramento, and on May 13, 1915, the said city leased the hotel to Mrs. Pratt. In January, 1916, Mrs. Pratt failed financially. It is the relationship that existed between Barceloux and Mrs. Pratt during this period from May to January that is in issue, for it is during this period that the bills sued upon were contracted. Barceloux claims to have notified the creditors through Mrs. Pratt of his withdrawal from the business. It appears, however, that but seven or eight at most, of some fifty creditors, were notified; no balances were struck in the running accounts, nor were any accounts settled as of May 15, 1915. Though the creditors acknowledged some familiarity with the proposed sale to the city through having read the newspapers, they deny having received any notification or intimation of Barceloux's changed relationship. On the other hand the Barceloux account in the bank was changed to "H. J. Barceloux, by Mrs. G. M. Pratt," and hence forward and down to November 4, 1915, all checks in payment of goods sold the hotel were signed "H. J. Barceloux, by Mrs. G. M. Pratt." Mrs. Pratt was permitted to use Barceloux's name to avoid any attachment that might result to a personal account of her own, and she agreed to place the account in her own name as soon as possible. Mrs. Pratt, however, neglected to do so until November 4, 1915, when Barceloux, having learned that the account still existed, insisted upon it. It appears that Barceloux visited the hotel at least once during this period, but registered no protest as to the manner in which the accounts were paid.

Upon these facts the lower court in both cases found, inter alia, "(2) that the said defendant, H. J. Barceloux, by his acts and conduct, caused the said plaintiff to believe that Aimee M. Pratt, also known as Mrs. G. M. Pratt, was the agent of said H. J. Barceloux"; and (3) "that plaintiff sold and delivered goods, wares, and merchandise to said Aimee M. Pratt, also known as Mrs. G. M. Pratt, in good faith and in the exercise of ordinary care, and parted with value, upon the faith of the said defendant, H. J. Barceloux, being responsible for the acts of the said Aimee M. Pratt, also known as Mrs. G. M. Pratt."

Appellant claims that the findings are unsupported by the evidence in either of the two cases, that the findings and judgment are against law, and that the judgment is not supported by the findings in the case.

[1, 2] One particular contention of appellant is that the court erred in that it failed to find as a fact that an agency existed, and found only that Barceloux caused creditors to "believe" that Aimee M. Pratt was his agent, and that creditors reasonably acted upon the faith thereof.

Section 2300 of the Civil Code provides:

> "An agency is ostensible when the principal intentionally, or by want of ordinary care, causes a third person to believe another to be his agent who is not really employed by him."

Section 2317 of the same Code provides:

> "Ostensible authority is such as a principal intentionally, or by want of ordinary care, causes or allows a third person to believe the agent to possess."

Section 2334 of the same Code provides:

> "A principal is bound by acts of his agent, under a merely ostensible authority, to those persons only who have in good faith, and without want of ordinary care, incurred a liability or parted with value, upon the faith thereof."

These sections clearly set forth the two elements that constitute ostensible agency, viz., some intentional conduct or neglect on the part of the alleged principal creating a belief in the minds of third persons that an agency exists, and a reasonable reliance thereon by such third persons. The second finding is indefinite in that it does not designate Barceloux's conduct either as intentional or wanting in ordinary care, one of which is required by the Code. An allegation in the language of said finding if found in the complaint would undoubtedly constitute a demurrable defect, but no such averment is contained therein, the complaint not having been framed upon the theory of ostensible or actual agency, but that the goods were supplied to defendant directly. The case was tried, though, upon the theory, as before suggested, of agency, but it is plain that said finding may be disregarded as immaterial in the case. Eliminating it, there is sufficient support for the judgment in this finding:

> "That said defendant became indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $390.16, being the balance due upon an open account for goods, wares, and merchandise sold and delivered by plaintiff to defendant at the Hotel St. Francis, in the city of Sacramento * * * at his special instance and request within two years next preceding the filing of said complaint."

[3, 4] Indeed, the said defective finding is not directed to the particular subject-matter of this action. It is entirely indefinite as to what goods, wares, and merchandise were sold to Mrs. Pratt "in good faith and in the exercise of ordinary care," and we may treat the finding as irrelevant to any issue made by the pleadings. For aught that appears to the contrary, it relates to different supplies, and we may, therefore, disregard it. Of course, "it is a well-settled rule that the findings of fact made by the trial court are to receive such a construction as will uphold, rather than defeat, its judgment therein."

Breeze v. Brooks, 97 Cal. 77, 31 Pac. 742, 22 L. R. A. 257; Perkins v. West Coast Lumber Co., 129 Cal. 427, 62 Pac. 57; Paine v. San Bernardino, etc., Co., 143 Cal. 654, 77 Pac. 659. In this connection it may be said that it was not necessary for plaintiff to allege that the goods were sold and delivered to defendant through his agent, but under the general count evidence was admissible of either actual or ostensible agency. This was recognized by both parties and no objection was made to the course pursued.

[5] Appellant's point that Barceloux's promise was to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another and, therefore, void because not written, is without merit since he raised the question of the statute of frauds neither by objection to the evidence nor by a motion for a nonsuit. Besides, as we shall see, the liability of defendant, as far as it appears in the record, rests upon a different theory, namely, that the credit was extended to him; that he, in other words, was the real debtor and not a surety or guarantor.

[6] It seems that, after the evidence was submitted, the court permitted an amended complaint to be filed to conform to proof. The original pleading was against Barceloux and Pratt and proceeded, as we have seen, upon the theory that a partnership existed between them, but the amended complaint charged Barceloux with sole liability. It is claimed that this constitutes an entirely different cause of action, and such practice is not to be countenanced. But it is sufficient to say that no such objection was made at the trial, and it cannot be urged for the first time on appeal. Keefe v. Keefe, 19 Cal. App. 310, 125 Pac. 929; Stockton, etc., Wks. v. Glens, etc., I. Co., 121 Cal. 167, 53 Pac. 565.

[7] The objection most seriously urged by appellant is that the evidence is insufficient to show his liability for the debt. It is earnestly contended that the goods were not furnished to Barceloux, and, also, that he cannot be held upon the theory that he is legally responsible for anything that was supplied to Mrs. Pratt.

As to the Armstrong claim herein, it may be said there is evidence that the agreement was directly between plaintiff and defendant. Armstrong testified that he did business, as far as the hotel was concerned, with Mr. H. J. Barceloux, that he met him personally at the hotel after Dr. Tryon left, that "Mr. Barceloux assumed the management of it and made arrangements with me to furnish goods for the hotel, that he would be responsible for it, pay the bills from that time on;" furthermore, that "at the time we arranged for the account he stated that she (Mrs. Pratt) would run the hotel, manage it for him; that he would not be here much of the time and she would do the ordering, looking after the business." We need not quote further from his testimony, as the foregoing is sufficient to show the primary liability of appellant. We may add that it is fair to say that Armstrong relied upon his contract with appellant and that it was not repudiated by the latter until after the goods were all supplied by the former.

The Hosking Case finds much less support in the evidence.

As to the Meredith Fish Company's claim, we find, however, sufficient evidence to support the finding of the court. Mr. Craddoc Meredith testified that he dealt directly with Mr. Barceloux, that the latter told him that he was interested in the hotel and that he would be responsible for supplies that the Fish Company would furnish to Mrs. Pratt. It further appears from his testimony that he was never notified that Mr. Barceloux would not be responsible for the claim. There is, in other words, a sufficient showing of an enforceable contract between the Fish Company and appellant.

[8] The evidence seems entirely insufficient to support the claim of the Peerless Ice Cream Company or of the Golden Poppy Bakery. Neither had any dealings directly with Mr. Barceloux. In fact, he was not known to either of them. There is nothing to show that either firm was misled by the conduct of appellant, and there is no competent evidence that Mrs. Pratt was authorized to represent Mr. Barceloux as to either of these claims. Indeed these claimants base their contention against appellant upon the statement of Mrs. Pratt that "the financial end was a rancher up the river, he would take care of the financial end," and upon the fact that she signed Barceloux's name to the checks. But manifestly a third person cannot be held to accountability by such conduct and declarations of a supposed agent. If such were the law, no one would be safe from the machinations of designing persons. As to the insufficiency of the evidence to support the claim of actual agency, Mitrovich v. Fresno Fruit & Packing Co., 123 Cal. 379, 55 Pac. 1064, is in point, and, bearing upon the failure of the case in material features of ostensible agency, Harris v. San Diego Flume Co., 87 Cal. 526, 25 Pac. 758, may well be consulted.

The claim of the Sacramento Laundry is sought to be upheld upon the ground of ostensible agency. It is doubtful whether the evidence is sufficient to support it. It is indeed quite unsatisfactory, but the question as to whether it is entirely inadequate may be passed, as the showing may be different upon another trial.

[9] It is suggested that the court improperly permitted interest on the amounts due, but the allowance seems to have been made from the filing of the complaint. This appears to be the correct practice in this class of cases. Grangers' Union v. Ashe, 12 Cal. App. 757, 108 Pac. 533; Heald v. Hendy, 89 Cal. 632, 27 Pac. 67.

The judgment in the case of "E. C. Armstrong v. H. J. Barceloux, doing business under the fictitious name of Hotel St. Francis," is affirmed, and in the case of "W. A. Hosking v. H. J. Barceloux, doing business under the fictitious name of Hotel St. Francis," is reversed, with direction to retry the issues as to all the claims except that of the Meredith Fish Company.

TAYLOR v. NORTHWESTERN NAT. INS. CO. (Civ. 1993.)

1. INSURANCE 🔑163(2)—PROPERTY COVERED —"ADDITIONS ADJOINING AND COMMUNICATING."

An insurance policy, under the caption "Country Store Building and Contents Policy Form," provided for insurance on a one-story frame building and its additions adjoining and communicating, occupied as a grocery store, and on the stock of groceries and other merchandise contained in the described building and its additions, and granted permission for mechanics and artisans to make alterations or repairs and to build additions. Insured erected, within a few feet of the one-story building described, a shed in which to store groceries, not connected with the store building otherwise than by a removable board, on which goods were passed from the one building to the other. Held, that this shed was covered by the term "additions adjoining and communicating," though not structurally connected with the store building, as the insurance was intended to cover the store as a store, and the property insured was to be treated as a store, and not as a separate and distinct building or a stock of goods contained in that identical structure.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Addition.]

2. INSURANCE 🔑146(1) — CONSTRUCTON OF POLICY.

The construction of an insurance policy is to be ascertained from the whole instrument, the nature of the property, the purposes for which it is ordinarily to be used, its situation, and the manner in which it is usually kept.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Everett J. Brown, Judge.

Action by Thomas Taylor against the Northwestern National Insurance Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Peter J. Crosby, of Oakland, for appellant. L. D. Manning and L. C. Fish, both of Oakland, for respondent.

BEASLY, Judge pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment for plaintiff upon a policy of insurance written by defendant in favor of plaintiff. At the time the policy was issued the plaintiff owned a grocery store in a one-story frame building in Alameda county. About three months after the date of the policy, a small shed was erected upon the same property with the store covered by the policy. Into this shed a part of the stock of groceries of the store were placed and kept. The shed was subsequently burned.

The trial court found that the shed was an addition to the store, within the meaning of the word "addition" as it was used in the policy. The point made here is that this finding is not supported by the evidence. Under the caption "Country Store Building and Contents Policy Form," the policy, among other things, provided for insurance:

> "On the one-story frame building and its additions, adjoining and communicating, including foundations, piping, plumbing, stationary heating apparatus, electric wiring and fixtures, and all other permanent improvements and fixtures attached to and forming a part of said building, occupied as a grocery store, situate on the southwest corner of Forty-First avenue and Foothill boulevard, Oakland, California.
> "On store and office furniture and fixtures, of every description, including safes, signs, cash registers, typewriting machines, stationery, office supplies, and utensils in use, all contained in or attached to the above-described building and its additions.
> "On stock of groceries and other merchandise, including merchandise held in trust or on commission, or sold, but not delivered, all contained in the above-described building and its additions.
> "Permission is granted for mechanics or artisans to make alterations or repairs to the within-described building for more than fifteen (15) days at any one time, and to build additions, this policy to cover on and in same, under the respective terms hereof."

The court found that the damage by the fire was done to the stock of groceries contained in the shed above referred to; that the building was about 12x14 feet in size, and erected upon the same premises, and at a distance of about 7 feet from the original building mentioned in the policy; that it was erected for the purpose of storing a part of the groceries covered by the policy and a portion of the stock contained in the original store building at the time the policy was issued. The trial court further found that this shed or building was communicating and connected with the one-story frame building described in said policy only in manner as follows:

> "The door of the shed was placed opposite a window in the one-story building, and the groceries were passed from the one-story building to the shed by sliding along a removable board connecting the one-story building with the shed. This shed or building was the only structure erected on the premises after the issuance of the policy, and that this shed or building constituted an addition to the one-story building described in the insurance policy. This shed or building was of the same character of construction as the one-story frame building and did not increase the insurance risk. That none of the groceries in the one-story frame building were damaged by the fire."

[1, 2] If the words "additions, adjoining and communicating," are to be construed as intended to cover only such additions to the store building as are structurally connected therewith, then this case must be reversed, for the evidence does not sustain the finding to which the appellant objects; but it seems to us that in this case this would be too narrow a construction to be placed upon the language of this policy. The construction of a policy of insurance is to be ascertained from the whole instrument, the nature of the property to which the language of the policy is to be applied, the purposes for which property is ordinarily to be used, its situation, and the manner in which it is usually kept (Marsh v. Concord M. F. Ins. Co., 71 N. H. 253, 51 Atl. 898), and in speaking of the manner in which a policy of insurance should be viewed the Supreme Court of California has said in Victoria S. S. Co. v. Western Assurance Co., 167 Cal. 348, 139 Pac. 807, that the rule of law is that policies are to be construed liberally in favor of the insured, and that any uncertainty or ambiguity in a contract of insurance is to be interpreted most strongly against the insurer. In this case the insurance was undoubtedly intended by both the defendant and the insured to cover the store as a store. The caption of that portion of the policy above quoted strongly corroborates this view. In other words, the property insured was to be treated as a store, and not as a separate and distinct building, or a stock of goods contained in that identical single structure. This case seems more rationally classified as belonging to that class where additions to a manufacturing plant, not structurally connected with the original buildings of the plant, are nevertheless held to be covered by insurance, where the policy includes additions as it does in this case. Some flexibility of meaning must be given to the language of standard forms of insurance policies such as this, the rigid language of which must be interpreted in the light of the common understanding of the parties, in order to do justice between them; and, when this is taken in consideration with the court's finding that the risk was not increased by the erection of this small shed, it would seem to be just that the trial court's construction of the language of this policy and of the evidence in the case, resulting in the finding above referred to, should be sustained.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

PEOPLE v. IRISH. (Cr. 689.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Aug. 13, 1917. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 11, 1917.)

CRIMINAL LAW ⟹564(1)—VENUE—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In a prosecution under Pen. Code, § 270, for failing to provide necessary food, etc., for a minor son, evidence held to sustain the finding implied from the verdict that the residence of the mother, to whom the custody of the minor had been awarded in a divorce proceeding, was in M. County, where prosecution was brought.

Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Edgar T. Zook, Judge.

Clarence B. Irish was convicted of failing to provide necessary food, etc., for his minor son, and appeals. Affirmed.

Walter R. Dunn, of Oakland, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. The defendant was charged by information with violation of section 270 of the Penal Code in failing to provide necessary food, clothing, shelter, and medical attendance for his minor son during a period of three years immediately prior to March 1, 1917, and was tried and convicted. The court suspended sentence for the period of five years, and admitted him to probation upon the usual conditions, together with the requirement that he contribute the sum of $150 to his wife for the maintenance and support of the child for six months beginning April 14, 1917, and to again appear before the court October 11, 1917, to furnish security for the further support of the child for the ensuing six months, and thereafter semiannually for the same purpose during the term of probation.

We conceive of no reason for discussing at length the points argued in the briefs. We have read them carefully together with the record of the trial, and all we feel required to say is that the evidence contrary to the appellant's contention, sustains the finding implied from the verdict that the residence of the mother—to whom the custody of the minor was awarded in a divorce proceeding between her and the defendant—was in the county of Marin. She testified that she lived there "off and on," meaning, as was developed later in the trial, that as she earned her living as a nurse she was sometimes out of the county at work in that capacity; but she finally testified that she lived in that county; that her residence was there.

The evidence also abundantly shows that the defendant was able to support the minor, that no one voluntarily undertook to relieve him or the mother of any obligation to support the child, and—if it is important—that the mother was without sufficient means to support it at the time the offense is charged.

The judgment is affirmed.

FERNANDEZ v. WESTERN FUSE & EXPLOSIVES CO. (Civ. 1486.)

1. EXPLOSIVES ⟹8—ACTION—PLEADING AND PROOF—VARIANCE.

In an action for damage by an explosion on the theory that storing powder was a nuisance, it was error to admit testimony showing defective construction of the magazine.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑882(6)—REVIEW—OBJECTIONS—ESTOPPEL TO MAKE.

When the trial court and the parties to an action proceed to trial upon the theory that there is a material issue, and the court upon the evidence addressed to that issue, and received without any or without a sufficient objection, finds in accordance with that evidence, a party will not be allowed, for the first time on appeal, to say that there was no such issue.

3. PLEADING 🔑430(1) — VARIANCE — OBJECTIONS TO EVIDENCE.

Where the complaint was framed on the theory of nuisance in storing powder, a single objection by defendant to the evidence as to defective construction of the magazine as not within the issues was sufficient to apprise plaintiff of the nature of the objection.

4. PLEADING 🔑430(2)—VARIANCE—WAIVER.

Where the complaint was based upon nuisance in maintaining of powder magazine, and plaintiff introduced evidence of negligent construction of the magazine, the mere fact that defendant then introduced evidence in rebuttal thereof did not estop it from claiming that there was a variance between pleading and proof.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; T. W. Harris, Judge.

Action by J. F. Fernandez against the Western Fuse & Explosives Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

John J. Barrett and Alfred Sutro, both of San Francisco (Pillsbury, Madison & Sutro, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant. Reed & Nusbaumer and Chapman & Trefethen, all of Oakland, and A. A. Moore and Stanley Moore, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from a judgment against the defendant for the sum of $925, being the amount of damages claimed to have been suffered by the plaintiff by reason of the destruction of his house and premises at Melrose in Alameda county through the explosion of a powder magazine on the premises of the defendant.

This is one of a series of cases which grew out of that explosion, two of which were Kleebauer v. Western Fuse & Explosives Co., 138 Cal. 497, 71 Pac. 617, 60 L. R. A. 377, 94 Am. St. Rep. 62, and Fisher v. Western Fuse & Explosives Co., 12 Cal. App. 299, 107 Pac. 332. Briefly the facts are that the defendant conducted an establishment at Melrose for the manufacture of fuse, and in connection therewith maintained a powder magazine in which it stored the powder used in the manufacture of its product. On the day of the accident one of its employés, a Chinaman—who had murdered a fellow countryman—sought refuge in the powder magazine, the entrance to which he barricaded. Being pursued by peace officers and threatened with arrest he fired the magazine, thereby causing much damage to surrounding property, including that of the plaintiff.

The amended complaint appears to have been drawn on the theory that the defendant was guilty of negligence in the employment of an unfit and incompetent employé whose act exploded the powder magazine, and also upon the theory that the powder magazine as maintained by the defendant was a nuisance. The act of the Chinaman in firing the magazine is out of the case since the evidence shows without conflict, and the court expressly finds, that the defendant was not responsible for its employé's act in causing the explosion.

As to the nuisance theory, it is obvious that the complaint as amended was drafted upon the theory that the mere keeping of a large quantity of explosive powder in a thickly populated neighborhood, irrespective of the manner in which the magazine in which it was stored was constructed was a nuisance per se. But before the case came on for trial the Supreme Court, in the case of Kleebauer v. Western Fuse & Explosives Co., supra, had held that the magazine of the defendant, constructed and maintained as disclosed by the evidence in that case—and which is similar to the evidence now before the court, leaving out of consideration so much of it as refers to the effect of the presence or absence of an embankment or bulkhead—did not constitute negligence per se. Accordingly in this case, in order apparently to escape the principle laid down in that case, the plaintiff, over objections of the defendant, introduced evidence tending to show that the magazine was improperly constructed; and, based thereon, the court found that the magazine of the defendant was a nuisance because of its improper construction in not being surrounded by a bulkhead or embankment, which would have tended to minimize the effects of the explosion by directing its force upwards.

[1] It thus appears that neither this particular evidence nor the finding of the court based thereon was responsive to any issue in the case. It has been repeatedly held by the Supreme Court that under those circumstances the complaint cannot be looked to in support of the judgment. "Where," says the Supreme Court in Chetwood v. Cal. Nat. Bank, 113 Cal. 414, 424, 55 Pac. 704, 707, "the case made out by the findings is a different case from that presented by the pleadings, the judgment will be reversed; for the relief decreed must be the relief sought, and the variance, even if it be such as could have been cured by amendment, is fatal to the validity of the judgment (Bryan v. Tormey, 84 Cal. 126 [24 Pac. 319]), and the point may be raised on appeal from the judgment (Putman v. Lamphier, 36 Cal. 151)."

[2] But it is also well settled that when the trial court and the parties to an action proceed to trial upon the theory that there is a material issue, and the court upon the evidence addressed to that issue, and received without any or without a sufficient objection, finds in accordance with that evidence, a party will not be allowed for the first time on appeal, to say that there was no such issue. Schroeder v. Mauzy, 16 Cal. App. 443, 118 Pac. 459.

[3] It is the contention of the plaintiff that under this rule the defendant is estopped to assert that no issue was framed as to the negligent construction of the magazine, for the reason that when testimony upon that point was offered the defendant failed to make its objection thereto sufficiently specific to apprise him of its nature and scope, and for the further reason that the defendant itself introduced testimony as to the construction of the magazine in rebuttal of plaintiff's testimony on that subject. With regard to this contention the record discloses that the defendant several times objected to this character of testimony, but only once included in the objection that the evidence was not responsive to any issue in the case, and that in a motion for nonsuit made by the defendant, it did not include as a ground thereof the insufficiency of the complaint to cover this aspect of the nuisance theory. We do not think that the defendant intended to conceal the real nature of its objection to this testimony, especially as the rule in the Kleebauer Case, apparently responsible for the offer of this testimony, had been announced prior to the trial of the case at bar, and must have been in the mind of counsel both in the offer of testimony and the making of objections thereto. We think under these circumstances the plaintiff was sufficiently apprised of the nature of the objection, and could, if he so desired, have requested leave to amend his pleading, which he failed to do. In the state of the pleadings and in the face of the objection made, the evidence as to the alleged improper construction of the magazine should have been excluded by the court.

[4] The fact that the defendant introduced testimony in rebuttal upon this same point does not now estop it from claiming that the testimony was erroneously admitted over its objection. In Washington Tp. F. C. & G. v. McCormick, 19 Ind. App. 663, at page 667, 49 N. E. 1085, at page 1086, the court said:

> "Appellant, in rebuttal, introduced some evidence of the same general character as that objected to. But this cannot be said to be a waiver of the objections to the evidence introduced by appellee. It was not invited error. It does not fall within the rule that a party who calls out incompetent evidence thus precludes himself from successfully objecting to evidence of like character introduced by his adversary. * * * The error was committed at the instance of the opposite party, and appellant did all it could * * * to prevent the error. After the court had held, over appellant's objection, that the evidence was competent, and had permitted appellee, who had the burden, to introduce such evidence to maintain his case, appellant, in seeking to overcome the case made by appellee, could follow the theory laid down by the court without impliedly admitting the court's theory to be right, and without waiving his right to question the court's action. * * *"

The judgment is reversed.

MACDONALD et al. v. BERNAL et al. (Civ. 2127.)

PARTITION ⚷94(3)—REFEREE—REPORT.

Where a partition suit is referred, the report of the referee as to the value of the lands is merely advisory, and the court may disregard it and determine the value on another basis.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thos. F. Graham, Judge.

Action by D. B. MacDonald and others against Jose Cornelio Bernal, as executor, and others, and William B. McKinnon, as administrator, and others. From the judgment, the last-named defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Theo. J. Savage and Burke Corbet, both of San Francisco, and Corbet & Selby, of San Francisco, for appellants. Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo. J. Roche, Norman A. Eisner, and Heller, Powers & Ehrman, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiffs in an action for the partition of certain premises consisting of 25 acres, known as the Bernal tract, in the city and county of San Francisco.

Upon the trial of the cause an interlocutory decree of partition was entered, by the terms of which one Frank A. Dwyer was appointed sole referee to make partition of the property. Said referee proceeded with his work, and presently filed his report, wherein he made certain valuations of the lands embraced in the tract, and recommended the partition of the property among the parties to the action in accordance with such valuations. The appellants filed their objections to the said report of the referee, and the court set the same for hearing and took evidence thereon, after which the court filed its final decree, in which the referee's proposed partition of the premises was not approved or adopted in full, but was modified to conform to the views of the court arrived at upon the hearing thereon; and the court in its final decree made a different award and partition of the property than that recommended by the referee.

The only contention of the appellants which the court is in a position to consider upon the record before us is that the court erred in awarding to the appellants less land in valuation than that to which they would have been entitled upon the basis of the calculations contained in the referee's report. It is a sufficient answer to this contention to say that the report of the referee in an action for partition is merely advisory to the court, which is not bound to adopt the basis used by the referee for his calculation as to the values of the property involved, but may, in its final decree, make its own findings with respect to such matters. The court did this in the instant case, and there is no evidence before us to show that it committed any error in so doing.

The appeal not having been taken within 60 days after the judgment, there is no evidence before us by reference to which the findings and final decree of the trial court could be assailed.

Judgment affirmed.

Ex parte CLARK et al. (Cr. 414.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 20, 1917.)

1. Criminal Law 🔑238—Preliminary Examination—Probable Cause—Evidence—Larceny.

Evidence held sufficient to establish reasonable or probable cause to believe that the defendants had committed the crime of larceny, so as to authorize their commitment by the examining magistrate.

2. Larceny 🔑14(2) — Borrowing Money with Intent to Steal the Same—Title.

Where confidence men procure money upon the pretext that it is a loan, with the intent to steal the same, the crime is larceny; the owner of the money not having parted with the title thereto.

J. H. Clark and Adolph Lyons were arrested and committed for trial in the superior court, and they apply for a writ of habeas corpus. Petition denied.

Ralph H. Lewis and Martin I. Welsh, both of Sacramento, for petitioners.

HART, J. The petitioners were charged with, and preliminarily examined before and committed for trial in the superior court by the police judge of the city of Sacramento, sitting as a committing magistrate, for the crime of grand larceny. It is claimed by the petitioners that the magistrate was without legal authority or jurisdiction to order them committed for the crime of grand larceny, inasmuch as the evidence taken in support of the charge is wholly insufficient to establish reasonable or probable cause that said or any crime had been committed by them.

[1] It is unnecessary to recite the facts of the transaction from which the charge preferred against the prisoners arose. It is sufficient to say that the evidence taken before the magistrate discloses that the case involves the oft-told story of a bucolic and guileless individual, who, while waiting for a train at the Sacramento railroad station to convey him to his home in a northern town, after a brief sojourn in the central portion of the state, accommodatingly handed over to a brace of oily-tongued strangers $120 of his available cash, as a loan, after the latter had insidiously crept into and gained his confidence and were suddenly awakened to a realization that the freightage on certain freight, which they represented that one of them had previously put on board of a freight train, had to be prepaid, and that they were without sufficient funds to pay the bill, exhibiting to the aforesaid guileless gentleman, as evidence of their "good faith," a document purporting to be a draft on an Eastern bank for a sum greatly in excess of the amount necessary for their purpose. The case, as made by the proofs, is in all respects of such striking resemblance to the case of People v. Rae, 66 Cal. 423, 6 Pac. 1, 56 Am. Rep. 102, that it may well be said that the relationship between the two is not merely one of affinity, but one of consanguinity. The salient facts of the two cases are so near alike that it would be difficult to differentiate them. If the petitioners, assuming that the evidence taken before the magistrate correctly reveals the circumstances under which they obtained the money of the prosecuting witness, are not guilty of larceny, they are guilty of no public offense whatever.

[2] We are satisfied that the inference is fairly and reasonably justified by the evidence taken before the magistrate that the petitioners, acting in confederation for that purpose, designedly and deliberately, by the artful and crafty methods in which so-called "confidence men" are adepts, obtained possession of the money of the prosecuting witness, upon the pretext that it was to be a mere loan, with the intent to steal the same. The owner of the money not having parted with the title hereto, the crime, if any, is larceny. People v. Rae, supra; People v. Delbos, 146 Cal. 737, 81 Pac. 131; People v. Arnold, 17 Cal. App. 68, 118 Pac. 729; People v. Schenone, 19 Cal. App. 280, 282, 125 Pac. 758; People v. Ballo, 19 Cal. App. 370, 125 Pac. 1081.

The petition for the alternative writ must be denied; and it is so ordered.

RANSOME CONST. CO. v. VON SCHROEDER et al. (Civ. 2061.)

1. CONTRACTS ⚷229(1)—CONSTRUCTION.

Plaintiff, who had offered to remove débris from defendants' property for a fixed price of $16,076, or to do it for actual cost plus 10 per cent. on a specified scale of wages for labor, entered into a written contract providing that the work should be paid for upon cost charges plus 10 per cent. for superintendence, that in case any increase of wages demanded for labor above the amount specified plaintiff's charges should thereafter be based upon such increased cost of labor, but that, if defendants should deem the increase excessive, they should have the privilege of stopping all further work, and that the total of the work should not exceed the sum of $16,076, except as specified. The specification related to increased cost of labor. Held, that the contract limited plaintiff's charge for the entire work, except for increases in the cost of labor to the sum of $16,076.

2. CONTRACTS ⚷170(2)—OFFER—ACCEPTANCE.

Where plaintiff contractor, after work had been stopped because of the increases demanded by laborers, resumed work in response to letters written by defendants setting forth their interpretation of the contract, plaintiff must be deemed to have acceded to defendants' interpretation, though not expressly assenting.

3. CONTRACTS ⚷322(3), 350(3) — ACTIONS — EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In an action on a contract for the removal of débris from land, evidence held insufficient to show that plaintiff did not repudiate the contract, or that defendants' refusal to make further payments on account amounted to a breach on their part.

4. WORK AND LABOR ⚷14(1) — ACTIONS — QUANTUM MERUIT.

Where defendants' refusal to make further payments on account of a contract for the removal of débris from land was warranted, and the contractor himself repudiated the contract, he cannot maintain an action on the quantum meruit for sums claimed to be due.

Action by the Ransome Construction Company, a corporation, against Mary E. Von Schroeder and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying new trial, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Bishop, Hoefler, Cook & Harwood and A. J. Harwood, all of San Francisco, for appellant Von Schroeder. Felix T. Smith, of San Francisco, for appellant Sprague. Garret W. McEnerney and Walter Rothchild, both of San Francisco, for appellants Martin and others. Pringle & Robbins, of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff, a contractor, for the value of work and labor performed upon the property of the defendants situate in the city of San Francisco, in an effort to clear said property from débris resulting from the fire of 1906. There is also an appeal from an order denying the defendants' motion for a new trial.

The facts of the case—concerning which there is little dispute—are as follows: The defendants, prior to the date of their contract with the plaintiff, had been joint owners of the property in question, but subsequent to the fire had partitioned it among themselves in severalty. The débris occasioned by the fire covered the entire premises, including the basement. In the month of July, 1906, the owners of the property called for bids for the removal of the débris and clearance of the lot. The Ransome Construction Company responded with a written bid, offering to do the work within 30 days, and submitting two alternative propositions as to the price. One of these was an offer to do the entire work for $16,076; the other was to do it for the actual cost to it plus 10 per cent. on a specified scale of wages for labor. A written contract was finally entered into between the owners and the contractor on July 27, 1906, wherein it was provided that the work was to be done within 40 days of the date of the contract, save delays caused by strikes, accident, and other causes beyond the control of the parties, and was to be paid for upon cost charges, plus 10 per cent. for superintendence and certain other items specified in the agreement, payment for the work done during the preceding week to be made on Monday of each week while it was in progress, upon statements to be rendered by the contractor and certified by the timekeeper of the owners, the amount of said weekly payments to cover the actual cost of the work done during the preceding week plus 5 per cent. of the amount to be added for superintendence, etc., the balance of 5 per cent. of these latter charges to be paid on full completion of the work. It was provided in the contract that, in case of any increase in wages demanded for labor above the amounts specified in the agreement, the charges of the contractor should thereafter be based upon such increased cost of labor, but that, if the owners should deem such increase excessive, they should have the privilege of refusing to accede to the same and of stopping all further work upon the contract, in which case they should immediately pay the amount in full due upon the contract up to the time of such stoppage, and the contract should thereupon cease. There was a further agreement in the contract:

> "That the total cost of the work * * * should not exceed the sum of $16,076, except as hereinabove specified."

The contractor began work under this agreement on July 30, 1906. On August 6, 1906, the teamsters demanded an increase in wages of 50 cents a day, and the laborers demanded an increase of 25 cents a day. The contractor at once notified the owners of these demands, and paid the increase demanded until August 10, 1906, when the owners ordered the work suspended, and notified the contractor that they did not approve of the demands of the teamsters or laborers and were unwilling to meet such demands at that time. The strike of teamsters and laborers was general throughout the city, and was followed by conferences between the contractors and the strikers, which resulted in the former yielding to the latter's demands for increased wages after about two weeks of negotiation. This result being reported to Mr. Martin, the agent of the owners, he wrote on August 23, 1906, a letter to the contractor, undertaking to state what his understanding of the terms upon which the contractor would resume work upon the premises was, as a result of a recent conversation between himself and the contractor's officers, in which the proposed increase of wages and consequent increase in the fixed cost to the owners, viz. the sum of $16,076, were discussed, together with an extension of time required on account of the delay, and also certain other matters of detail connected with the progress of the work. In this first letter of Mr. Martin he requested the contractor to confirm his understanding of the various matters referred to therein as soon as possible, in order that he might submit the matter to the owners and obtain their sanction before giving instruction to proceed with the work. The contractor did not reply to this letter with any written confirmation of its terms, but its officers responded to repeated requests on the part of Mr. Martin for such confirmation with the assurance that a written confirmation would be sent, and in one instance at least with a statement that it had been sent. Not having received such confirmation up to September 6, 1906, Mr. Martin wrote another letter to the contractor on that date, calling its attention to the fact that he had on several occasions endeavored to ascertain when and under what conditions it would resume work, and restating in detail the substance of his former letter, and concluding with these words:

> "If this understanding is correct, kindly confirm the same in writing as soon as possible, and you can take this letter as our consent to proceed with the operations, these terms being satisfactory."

The contractor made no written reply to either of these letters, but on September 7, 1906, resumed work upon the property. From time to time thereafter Mr. Martin and Mr. Wallis, agents of the owners, requested written confirmation of Mr. Martin's letters, and were told on each occasion that a letter to that effect would be, or even had been, sent. Between September 7th and October 24th the work went on. Weekly bills for progress payments according to the new labor schedule were presented, and these were regularly paid up to October 5th, during which time the contractor received a sum in excess of $7,000 on account of the work since its resumption. During the period between September 20th and October 18th Mr. Martin—who chiefly acted for the owners in respect of this matter—was absent from the state; but shortly after his return, and on October 22d, he caused a letter to be written to the contractor, requesting an interview with its officials before any more bills were paid. Mr. Crummey, representing the contractor, called at Mr. Martin's office on October 24th, when a heated interview ensued; Mr. Crummey demanding the payment of the bills, and Mr. Martin insisting upon a written confirmation of the terms of the contract as embodied in his letters. The result of this conference was an immediate cessation of work by the contractor and the later institution of the present action.

[1, 2] The first and the controlling proposition presented upon these appeals relates to the construction to be placed upon the written contract between the parties, with special reference to the question as to whether it provides by its terms that the contractor shall complete the specified work for a price within the maximum sum of $16,076, or such further sum as these figures might be increased by acceding to labor demands for increased wages. On the part of the respondent it is earnestly contended that the contract is not susceptible of this construction, for the reason, chiefly, that the contractor, in the performance of its portions of the contract, was subject to the direction of the agents of the owners in certain particulars, which are claimed to essentially affect the amount and detail of the work to be done and the manner of doing it, and to also affect its cost and the time within which it was to be performed. The owners, on the other hand, contend that the contract, construed in the light of the circumstances attending its creation, clearly contemplates that the work of clearing the premises of such of the material and débris as the owners should direct to be removed was to be completed at a cost to them within the maximum figure stated in the contract, which amount was only to be increased to an extent necessitated by their accession to demands involving the increased cost of labor.

We are constrained to adopt this latter conclusion. The admitted facts of the case show that prior to the making of the agreement in question the owners advertised for bids for the removal of débris and clearing of the lot in question, and that in response to this advertisement the plaintiff in this action presented a written proposal, embracing the clearance of the débris, of all walls to the sidewalk level, and the removal of everything to the basement floor, for the sum of $16,076, and offering to do the work within 30 days of the acceptance of its bid. There was also an alternative proposition to do the work upon a specified percentage basis. The contract, which within a few days followed this bid, is the one under construction here. It enters more into detail as to what work the contractor was to do, and leaves with the owners of the property a certain amount of discretion in the matter of directing how much of the brick and iron débris the contractor was to remove; but this discretion, when exercised, could clearly have had no other effect than to lessen, rather than increase, the amount of work which the contractor was to perform in the clearance of the lot, and hence cannot be construed as changing the original intent of the parties that the work of clearing the lot of its débris was to be completed under the terms of the contract within the limiting specified cost to the owners. The fact that the contract also contained substantially the alternative proposition submitted by the contractor in his bid can only be construed as so included for the purpose of giving the owners the benefit of a possible completion of the work within the maximum sum specified in the contract, and expressly therein agreed to be the amount which was to cover the total cost of the work, except as the same might be increased by the enforced increase in labor charges. Under the contract as thus to be construed, the work of clearance began, and continued until interrupted by the demands of the teamsters and laborers for an increase in wages, and by their strike to enforce such increase. This caused a cessation of the work for about a fortnight; but this was regarded by neither party as an adandonment of the contract. When the labor troubles were adjusted upon the basis of a specified increase in wages, the contractor notified the agent of the owners of the amount of such increase, and desired to learn the wishes of the owners as to resumption of the work. A few days thereafter Mr. Martin wrote the contractor his first letter above referred to, stating his understanding of what the increase in labor charges was to be, and also undertaking to set forth his interpretation of the terms of the contract with respect to the effect of such increase upon the total contract price for the completion of the work. Not receiving a written reply to this letter, Mr. Martin about two weeks later wrote another letter to the contractor, repeating the interpretation of the contract as set forth in his former letter, and requesting a written confirmation of the correctness of such interpretation. This latter letter informed the contractor that it was to constitute the owners' consent to the resumption of the work upon its specified terms. The contractor did not respond with the required confirmation in writing, but he at once resumed work upon the property. The appellants herein lay too much stress upon the necessity of a confirmation in writing of Mr. Martin's two letters. The conduct of the contractor in assuring Mr. Martin that such confirmation would be forthcoming, coupled with its prompt renewal of the work upon receipt of his last letter, would in our opinion amount in effect to such confirmation of Mr. Martin's interpretation of the contract, if such were requisite; but, since his interpretation of the contract as to the maximum cost to the owners of completing the specified work was in accord with our construction of the original agreement between the parties, it was sufficient for the contractor to resume the work upon receipt of Mr. Martin's letter to constitute an acceptance of its terms.

[3] Having recommenced the work upon the property in response to the owners' directions so to do, both parties were bound to live up to the letter and spirit of their original agreement, as modified by the accepted increase in the cost of labor. During the period between September 7 and October 24, 1906, the contractor went ahead with the work, and regularly rendered weekly bills to the owners in accordance with the terms of the contract, but upon the basis of the increased cost of labor. These bills were regularly paid up to October 8th; but the bills rendered upon that date and for the two following weeks were not paid. The total amount paid the contractor from the inception of the work up to and including October 1, 1906, amounted to $9,548.36. The bills presented for the three weeks' work thereafter amounted to $7,265.25. These two amounts of payments made and due upon the work since its inception aggregated on October 22, 1906, the sum of $16,813.61, a sum considerably in excess of that originally contemplated and agreed to between the parties as the entire cost of the completed work, and a sum also perilously near the total sum to be paid under the contract upon the basis of the increase in the cost of labor, which increase, according to the findings of the court, would up to that date have amounted to $1,153.09. Upon any view of the evidence before us the work was still far from completion; and it was both natural and proper that the owners of the property should insist upon a conference with the contractor before the payment of bills which would thus almost exceed the total allowance for the completed work while said work was but little more than half completed. Such a conference was requested and held between the officials of the contractor and the agents of the owners on October 24, 1906, by which date the claims of the contractor had been still further increased by approximately $2,000. The evidence is somewhat conflicting as to what occurred at this conference; but the proofs are practically undisputed that the owners then and there offered to pay the back bills of the contractor to date, conditioned upon the latter's acceptance of the owners' interpretation of the terms of the original contract as embodied in the letters of Martin, and that the representatives of the contractor at that conference, not only refused to do this, but expressly asserted that said contract was no longer in effect. This asseveration was in exact accord with a letter of the contractor to the owners under date of September 26, 1906, which amounted to a substantial repudiation of the contract, and which, while written and signed by its officials, was never delivered to the owners, and only came to light upon the trial of the case. The undisputed proofs are further to the effect that the contractor did on that day or the following day, cease and never thereafter resumed work upon the premises. The undisputed evidence also discloses that the owners some time later completed the work of clearing the lot at a cost in excess of $10,000. Notwithstanding these facts, the trial court has found that the contractor did not, on October 24, 1906, repudiate the contract under which the work had thus far proceeded.

Upon the foregoing state of the evidence we are of the opinion that this finding of the trial court cannot be sustained; and for a like reason we are satisfied that the conclusion of the trial court that the defendants' qualified refusal to pay any more of the plaintiff's bills on October 24, 1906, amounted to an actionable breach of the agreement upon their part is not justified by the proofs in the case.

[4] It follows from these conclusions that the plaintiff was not entitled to begin and maintain an action upon quantum meruit at the time this suit was instituted. This view obviates the necessity of a consideration of the asserted errors of law committed by the trial court during the trial of the action, and also insisted upon by the defendants upon these appeals.

The judgment and order are reversed.

1. CONTRACTS ⟹233—CONSTRUCTION—"HARVESTING EXPENSES."

Where a note given in payment of the purchase price of an interest in a growing crop contained a condition that the payee should look for payment solely to the proceeds of the crop after any and all harvesting expenses shall have been fully paid, the term "harvesting expenses" is not limited to expenses incurred in the cutting and threshing of the crop, but includes expenses for repairs of machinery used in harvesting the crop, the rent of live stock, implements, and the cost of labor.

2. CONTRACTS ⟹169—CONSTRUCTION—EXTRINSIC CIRCUMSTANCES—STATUTE.

Under Civ. Code, § 1636, declaring that contracts are to be interpreted so as to give effect to the mutual intention of the parties, circumstances surrounding the making of the contract cannot be considered, unless it is doubtful, uncertain, or ambiguous.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kings County; M. L. Short, Judge.

Action by Irvin H. Betts against C. N. Orton. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Frank B. Graves, of Hanford, for appellant. Robt. W. Green, of Lemoore, and J. L. C. Irwin, of Hanford, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an action which partakes of the nature of a demand for an accounting, wherein plaintiff asks to have a certain note given by him to defendant canceled, and also seeks to recover a balance alleged to be due him from defendant. Judgment went for plaintiff from which, and an order denying his motion for a new trial, defendant appeals.

The material facts, as appear from findings made by the court, are as follows: Plaintiff and defendant were joint owners of a four-fifths interest in a growing crop of grain. On May 27, 1914, plaintiff bought defendant's interest therein, giving in payment for the purchase price of $2,500 his promissory note secured by a mortgage on the growing crop. On the back of the note was indorsed an agreement executed at the time by defendant to the effect that the payee thereof should look for payment solely and alone to the proceeds of the sale of the crop "after any and all harvesting expenses in the harvesting of said crop have been fully paid out of the proceeds realized from the sale of said crops." The crops were harvested and sold for the sum of $5,770.90, of which sum defendant received $3,772.95, out of which he paid on account of harvesting $1,376.28, leaving a balance of $2,396.67 which he applied in payment of the note. In addition to the amount so paid by defendant towards the expenses of harvesting, plaintiff received direct from the purchaser of the grain certain moneys which, when added to the sum so paid by defendant, left a balance, as found by the court, of $835 still due plaintiff out of the proceeds of the sale for the expense of harvesting. Upon this last sum the court found he had received from defendant $249.45, leaving a balance of $585.59 due him from the amount so received by defendant, for which judgment was rendered. These findings, which are material to the issues joined, find ample support in the evidence. Other findings attacked by appellant, even conceding insufficiency of evidence, as claimed, to support them, are, from our point of view, deemed immaterial. Among such facts the court found that plaintiff tended, took care of, harvested, and threshed the said crops and delivered the same to defendant prior to October 31, 1914, in accordance with the terms of the mortgage, and that defendant sold the same to the Chinn Warehouse Company, receiving therefor the sum of $5,770.90. There was testimony on the part of defendant that some 90 acres of the crop was overripe or burned, as a result of which it was damaged some 30 per cent. But there is no evidence tending to show that such fact was due to any negligence on the part of plaintiff; nor can it be ascertained from such testimony what the amount of such alleged loss or damage was, since it is not made to appear what the production would have been had it been harvested as defendant claims it should have been. It also appears that physical delivery of the grain was not made direct to defendant, but to the Chinn Warehouse Company, purchaser thereof, and that plaintiff received directly from the purchaser a certain sum of money, which, however, was insufficient to pay the harvesting expenses; the balance being paid by the purchaser to defendant. Hence, conceding that the grain was not delivered directly to defendant, as found by the court, and that defendant did not receive all of the proceeds of the sale thereof, such facts, under the circumstances, are immaterial.

[1] The chief ground for the controversy appears to have been a dispute between the parties as to the meaning of the agreement indorsed upon the back of the note and as to what constituted "harvesting expenses"; defendant insisting that the agreement should be read, not in accordance with the plain import of the language used therein, but that the term "harvesting expenses" referred only to such expenses as plaintiff might have incurred in the cutting and threshing of the crop. We find no error in the ruling of the court in this regard. The meaning of the agreement appears to be clear and unambiguous, namely, that out of the proceeds of the sale of the grain plaintiff should be entitled to a sufficient sum to meet the expenses of harvesting the same. The disputed claim of several hundred dollars was made up of many items, such as the cost of making repairs to machinery used in harvesting the crop, rent of live stock and implements likewise required for such purpose, cost of labor, board of men, all of which the court upon sufficient evidence found were proper charges under the terms of the agreement. Upon the record we are unable to perceive any reason why plaintiff was not entitled to reasonable compensation in the way of hire or rent for the use of mules owned by himself and which were worked in the harvest field.

[2] Contracts are to be interpreted so as to give effect to the mutual intention of the parties (Civ. Code, § 1636), which intent, where the language is clear and explicit and does not involve an absurdity, is to be ascertained from the language thereof. It is only where it is doubtful, uncertain, or ambiguous that the circumstances surrounding the making of the contract become important in ascertaining the intent of the parties. No such uncertainty exists in this case.

As disclosed by the record, defendant appropriated and applied in payment of the note the sum of $585.59 in excess of that to which he was entitled. Plaintiff was entitled to judgment for such excess.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. SILVAS. (Cr. 686.)

1. Criminal Law 🔑112(9)—Venue—Receiving Stolen Goods.

Where a person delivered a suit case containing stolen property to an express company for shipment, having the shipping receipt issued in defendant's name, and delivered the receipt to defendant with a key to the suit case, there was a constructive delivery of the property to defendant in the county where such receipt and key were delivered, so as to give the superior court of that county jurisdiction of a prosecution for receiving stolen goods.

2. Witnesses 🔑277(4) — Cross-Examination of Accused—Limitation to Subjects of Direct Examination.

Where on a trial for receiving stolen property defendant in his examination upon his own behalf testified that he had known the person from whom the property was received prior to the transaction, this warranted his cross-examination as to the extent of his previous acquaintance with such person and as to the details of a previous transaction between them of a suspicious nature.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; George E. Church, Judge.

Joe Silvas was convicted of receiving stolen property, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Thomas F. Lopez, of Fresno, and Henry Brickley, of Merced, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. The defendant was convicted of the offense of receiving stolen property knowing the same to have been stolen, and appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The evidence discloses that the defendant met one Demas, with whom he had some prior acquaintance, in a poolroom in Fresno, and in conversation with him learned that Demas intended to make a visit to Stockton for the purpose of selling some "stuff." The defendant thereupon, without inquiry as to the nature or value of the articles to be disposed of, stated that he was going to Stockton, and would save Demas the trouble of journeying to that place by undertaking to sell them himself. The property, consisting of cameras and inexpensive jewelry recently stolen from a local store, was contained in a suit case. Demas took it to a transportation company for shipment to Stockton, had the shipping receipt issued in the name of the defendant, delivered it to him, together with the key to the suit case. The defendant went to Stockton, and when there he employed a messenger boy to procure the suit case from the office of the carrier, who in the course of the execution of his commission was confronted by peace officers on the lookout for the claimant of the suit case, and the arrest of the defendant followed. It also appears from the record somewhat vaguely that the defendant and Demas had been engaged in a somewhat similar transaction in another part of the state.

[1] Four points are presented upon this appeal. The first is that the evidence does not show such a delivery of the property to the defendant in the county of Fresno as to bring the case within the jurisdiction of the superior court of that county. We are, however, satisfied that the proof presented on behalf of the prosecution to the effect that Demas delivered to the defendant the shipping receipt which had been obtained by him from Wells Fargo & Co., the carrier, and at the same time delivered to the defendant the key to the suit case, was sufficient to show a constructive delivery of the property to the defendant in the county of Fresno, and thus to give the superior court of that county jurisdiction of the case.

The second point relates to the instruction of the court bearing upon the same question; and of course it follows that if the evidence was sufficient to show a constructive delivery of the property to the defendant, the instruction of the court to the jury to that effect correctly stated the law.

The third point is that the evidence is insufficient to show that the defendant received the property knowing the same to have been stolen. Upon this point the evidence is circumstantial, but is, on the whole, we think, sufficient to have warranted the jury in finding that the defendant either knew the goods to have been stolen at the time he received same, or that the circumstances under which he received them and agreed to dispose of them were so suspicious as to have required the defendant to inquire into the source of Demas' possession of the same before receiving from him and undertaking to dispose of them in a distant city.

[2] The final point made by the defendant is that the court erred in permitting the cross-examination of the defendant as to his previous acquaintance with Demas, and particularly as to the details of a transaction between him and Demas of a suspicious nature in the city of Oakland upon a prior occasion. It is sufficient to say that the defendant in his examination upon his own behalf testified that he had known Demas prior to this transaction, and that this would be sufficient to have warranted his examination as to the extent of that acquaintance and of the past transactions between the pair.

Finding no merit, therefore, in these four contentions, the judgment and order are affirmed.

NORTON v. TITLE GUARANTY & SURETY CO. (S. F. 8328.)

1. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS ⚷100(7)—ACCRUAL OF CAUSE OF ACTION—DISCOVERY OF FRAUD.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subds. 1, 4, providing that an action upon a liability created by statute other than a penalty or forfeiture must be brought within three years, and that an action for relief on the ground of fraud must be brought within the same period, but that the cause of action in such case shall not be deemed to have accrued until the discovery by the aggrieved party of the facts constituting the fraud, an action on the bond of a notary public, who affixed a false certificate of acknowledgment to a mortgage forged by him and delivered to a client who had placed money with him for investment, was barred in three years from the date of the wrongful act, regardless of the time of its discovery, though the action was based upon fraud, as the form of the action cannot change the liability of the sureties.

2. PRINCIPAL AND SURETY ⚷66(1)—LIABILITY OF SURETY—SCOPE.

Sureties are never held beyond the strict terms of their agreements.

3. NOTARIES ⚷11—LIABILITY OF OFFICIAL BONDS.

The bond of a notary public, who was also a practicing attorney and acted as agent in loaning money for his clients, was collateral security for his official conduct only, and not for his general course of action as the agent and legal adviser of a client.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; W. A. Beasly, Judge.

Action by Elmira Norton against the Title Guaranty & Surety Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Geo. F. Hatton and Hartley F. Peart, both of San Francisco (Gus L. Baraty, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant. J. C. Black, of San Jose, for respondent. N. E. Wretman, E. M. Rea, and A. A. Caldwell, all of San Jose, amicus curiæ.

MELVIN, J. Defendant appeals from the judgment against it and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

The action was upon the bond of a notary public executed by defendant as a surety for the faithful performance of official duty by the said notary public, one Frank L. Dreischmeyer.

It appears from the evidence that Dreischmeyer was not only a notary public, but that he also acted as an agent in matters relating to property, and that he was a practitioner at the bar. In November, 1909, plaintiff delivered to Dreischmeyer $600 to be used in making an investment for her in a mortgage on real property. A few days later, Dreischmeyer informed her that he had loaned the money, and had taken a mortgage upon a piece of real property in San Jose owned by G. A. and Josephine Mancuso. As a matter of fact he had appropriated his client's money, and in the furtherance of the fraud he exhibited to her certain forged papers, including a purported mortgage to which he had, as notary public, affixed a false certificate that Mr. and Mrs. Mancuso had appeared before him and had duly acknowledged their respective signatures. A fabricated note accompanying the forged mortgage provided for the quarterly payment of interest upon the loan, and Dreischmeyer undertook to collect the interest for plaintiff. To avoid discovery of his crime by his victim Dreischmeyer regularly paid her the amounts apparently due on the note as interest. Finally, however, she learned of his crime, and this action was commenced, more than three years after the breach by Dreischmeyer of his official duty as a notary public in making the false certificate of acknowledgment, but within four years of that date, and likewise within three years of plaintiff's discovery of the fraud practiced by her agent. Both the discovery of the crime and the inauguration of the suit occurred after the expiration of Dreischmeyer's term as notary public.

[1] Among the many defenses urged by demurrer and otherwise the surety company presented the contention that the period of three years provided by subdivision 1 of section 338 of the Code of Civil Procedure ran from the date of the malfeasance, and not from the time of the discovery by plaintiff of the crimes which Dreischmeyer had committed. Respondent insists that while, ordinarily, a suit upon a bond of a public officer for breach of official duty is "upon a liability created by statute," and therefore is governed by the first subdivision of section 338 of the Code of Civil Procedure, this is an action based upon the fraud of the public officer, and that therefore the fourth subdivision of the section, giving to plaintiff three years after the discovery of the fraud for the commencement of the action, is the only statute of limitations which may be applied in such a litigation. Both theories seem to be supported by adjudications in different jurisdictions, but in California, under the reasoning in County of Sonoma v. Hall, 132 Cal. 589, 62 Pac. 257, 312, 65 Pac. 12, 459, and the authorities cited therein, we are constrained to hold that, without regard to the form of action, a surety sued upon the bond of a public officer may successfully plead the first subdivision of section 338 of the Code of Civil Procedure if the action shall have been commenced after the lapse of three years following, not the discovery, but the misfeasance or malfeasance itself. That was an action upon the bond of a county recorder who had collected and failed to return certain fees. The court held that such a suit is "upon a liability created by statute, other than a penalty or forfeiture," and that the period of three years was the proper time of limitation to be applied. The question of continuing fraud resulting in concealment of the breach of duty was not directly presented in that case, but it was there squarely decided that the form of action did not change the liability of the sureties. In the course of the opinion the case of State v. Conway, 18 Ohio, 234, is cited with approval. That was a suit against the sureties of a sheriff who, as was alleged, had levied upon property under a writ of execution, and by means of false returns to that and subsequent writs, had prevented the satisfaction of the judgment, and by his conduct had permitted the property to be squandered. It was sought to apply the statute of limitations relating to promises in writing founded upon a specialty or any agreement, contract, or promise, but the court held that the proper law for that purpose was the one prescribing the period within which actions against officers for nonfeasance and misfeasance in office might be commenced, the court saying, among other things:

> "So far as actions of this character are concerned, the limitation acts upon the cause, not the form of action. And the effect of the statute cannot be evaded by any change of the form of action."

In the later case of County of Calaveras v. Poe, 167 Cal. 519, 140 Pac. 23, this court approved County of Sonoma v Hall, holding that a cause of action for violation by a public officer of his statutory duty is governed by subdivision 1 of section 338, Code of Civil Procedure, as to the time within which it must be commenced. It is not necessary, therefore, to consider what statute of limitations might apply to an action against Dreischmeyer on account of his fraud and his breach of duty as attorney and agent, in carrying out a general rascally scheme of which the false acknowledgment was but a part.

[2, 3] Sureties are never held beyond the strict terms of their agreements, and it would seem illogical to bind this defendant, not only for the violation by Dreischmeyer of his official duty, but for other and subsequent frauds against which it did not promise to indemnify persons doing business with the notary public, and without which the plaintiff must have discovered the illegal nature of the forged acknowledgment. The bond was collateral security for Dreischmeyer's official conduct, not for his general course of action as plaintiff's agent and legal adviser. Clearly the gist of the action was the breach of official duty, and not fraud. It therefore becomes unnecessary to determine whether or not plaintiff was excused by Dreischmeyer's conduct from making such investigations as would have discovered the frauds sooner.

The judgment and order are reversed.

TALLAC CO. v. PILLSBURY et al., Industrial Acc. Commission. (S. F. 7584.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 4, 1917.)

MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑368—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT—CONTRACT TO BE PERFORMED IN FOREIGN COUNTRY.

A contract under which the employé was to act as second mate in a voyage from San Francisco to New Westminster, British Columbia, and return was a maritime contract relating to foreign commerce within the exclusive jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, and the Industrial Accident Commission had no jurisdiction under Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act (St. 1913, p. 318) § 84, to make an award for injuries sustained by the mate at the latter city.

In Bank. Application for a writ of review by the Tallac Company against A. J. Pillsbury and others, constituting the Industrial Accident Commission of the state. Award of Commission annulled.

McCutchen, Olney & Willard and Ira A. Campbell, all of San Francisco, for petitioner. Chris. M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondents.

SHAW, J. Proceeding in review, under section 84 of the Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act of 1913. Henry G. Classen was second mate of the steamer Tallac, which was owned in part and entirely managed by the Tallac Company, the petitioner herein. The home port of the steamer was San Francisco, Cal. Classen was hired in San Francisco by said company as second mate of the Tallac for the voyage from San Francisco to New Westminster, British Columbia, and return. While at the port of New Westminster, engaged in loading poles upon the steamer on October 8, 1914, he was injured by accident in the course of his employment. On reaching San Francisco in April, 1915, he applied to the Industrial Accident Commission for relief under the aforesaid act. The case was heard and the commission made him an award against the Tallac Company for the payment of $627.84 in cash, and $1,308 in weekly installments of $17.44 each for 75 weeks. The Tallac Company applies to this court to annul said award, claiming that the Industrial Accident Commission had no jurisdiction. This presents the sole question for our consideration.

The contract of service in the performance of which Classen was injured was clearly a maritime contract relating to foreign commerce, and was of a character which brings the case within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction given by the Constitution of the United States to the courts of the United States. When the case was first submitted to this court it was discovered that the question whether or not it was within the power of a state, by means of such laws as the Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act of this state, to impose additional burdens upon such commerce, was involved in a case then pending in the Supreme Court of the United States. Thereupon the submission was set aside and consideration of the case postponed to await decision of the question by the court of paramount authority.

On May 21, 1917, in Southern Pac. Co. v. Jensen, 244 U. S. 205, 37 Sup. Ct. 524, 61 L. Ed. 1086, the Supreme Court of the United States decided that the Workmen's Compensation Act of New York, which, in all respects material to the question, is similar to that of this state, could not be extended to workmen injured while assisting in unloading a steamer in navigable waters in New York, if such steamer was then engaged in commerce between the states, or in foreign commerce. The court said:

> "Exclusive jurisdiction of all civil cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction is vested in the federal district courts, 'saving to suitors in all cases the right of a common-law remedy where the common law is competent to give it.' The remedy which the compensation statute attempts to give is of a character wholly unknown to the common law, incapable of enforcement by the ordinary processes of any court, and is not saved to suitors from the grant of exclusive jurisdiction."

This decision is conclusive of the case at bar. The Industrial Accident Commission was without jurisdiction to make any award for the injury complained of, and its adjudication is invalid.

The award is annulled.

In re MORAN'S ESTATE.

HYNES v. PEAKE.

(S. F. 8334.)

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS ⟹17(1)—RIGHT TO ADMINISTER ESTATE—PUBLIC ADMINISTRATOR.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1365, fixing priorities in right to administer the estates of intestates after naming husband, wife, etc., and next of kin, names the public administrator prior to creditors or any other person legally competent. Section 1350a declares that, if all the executors named in a will are incompetent or renounce or fail to appear or qualify, letters of administration with will annexed must be issued as provided for in granting letters in case of intestacy. Section 1323, relating to proceedings on production of a foreign will, declares that, when a copy of the will and the probate thereof, duly authenticated, shall be produced by the executor or by any other person interested in the will, the same must be filed, and the clerk must appoint a time for hearing, etc.; while section 1299 declares that any executor, devisee, or legatee named in any will, or any other person interested, may at any time after the death of the testator, petition to have the will proved, etc. Executors named by a testator, who were his sole legatees and lived in a foreign state, renounced and assigned their interest in the estate to respondent. Respondent applied for letters of administration, being opposed by the public administrator. Held that, as the respondent was a stranger to the estate, and the public administrator was preferred to him in case of intestacy, the fact that the will had been executed and that the entire estate had been assigned to respondent does not entitle him to letters of administration in preference to the public administrator.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Thomas Moran, deceased. William A. Peake applied for letters of administration with the will annexed, and W. J. Hynes, public administrator, opposed the application. From an order appointing Peake as administrator, Hynes appeals. Reversed.

Cullinan & Hickey, of San Francisco, for appellant. Tobin & Tobin, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Moran died testate, a resident of the city and county of San Francisco, where he left estate. The legatees, a brother and sister of the decedent, both reside in Illinois. The will appoints them as executors of the estate. Both of them have failed to apply for letters testamentary upon the estate, or for the probate of the will. They duly assigned their interest in the estate to Peake, who thereupon filed the will for probate and applied for letters of administration with the will annexed. Hynes, as public administrator, contested the application for letters. The court below appointed Peake as administrator, he being a stranger to the estate, having no other interest. Hynes appeals from the order.

The sole question is whether, under the circumstances stated, the assignee of the interests of nonresident legatees under a domestic will, claiming solely by virtue of the assignment, is entitled to letters of administration with the will annexed, upon the estate, in preference to the public administrator.

Being a stranger, the public administrator is preferred to him by section 1365, Code of Civil Procedure, unless the fact that the decedent died testate makes a difference. Section 1350a, Code of Civil Procedure, taken in connection with section 1365, covers the case, and declares that the public administrator is entitled. Estate of Crites, 155 Cal. 392, 101

Respondents refer to section 1323, Code of Civil Procedure, relating to foreign wills, and to the decisions holding that in the case of a foreign will any person interested in the will is entitled to letters of administration with the will annexed. They contend that under the same rule of construction section 1299 should be held to entitle any person interested in the estate to receive letters of administration with the will annexed in case the executor fails to apply. Section 1299 does not authorize any person to obtain letters testamentary, or letters of administration with the will annexed. It merely authorizes any person interested in the estate to file a petition for the probate of the will, but it in no wise changes the rule regarding the persons entitled to letters of administration upon a domestic will, where the executor named therein is dead, incompetent, renounces or fails to apply for letters, or where there is no executor named. Those cases are provided for in section 1350a, which refers to section 1365 as a source of authority for the grant of such letters. The court erred in refusing to appoint the public administrator.

The order is reversed.

The provision of St. 1917, p. 221, that "any person who attempts to use, or who with intent to use the same unlawfully against another, carries or possesses," etc., the weapon described, is a valid exercise of the legislative power.

2. Statutes 🔑64(2)—Partial Invalidity—Effect.

Where petitioner was prosecuted under the first sentence of St. 1917, p. 221, the question of the invalidity of the second sentence as to presumptive evidence cannot be considered on application for habeas corpus as its invalidity would not render void the first provision.

In Bank. Application by R. C. Dare for a writ of habeas corpus. Denied.

Wm. M. Abbott, Wm. M. Cannon, and James F. Sheehan, all of San Francisco, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. [1, 2] We are of the opinion that the first sentence of section 5 of the act of May 4, 1917 (Stats. 1917, p. 221), providing that "any person who attempts to use, or who with intent to use the same unlawfully against another, carries or possesses," etc., the weapon described, is a valid exercise of legislative power, and that none of the objections urged to the validity of the act is good in so far at least as this provision is concerned. This is the provision under which petitioner is charged by the indictment. The question of the invalidity of the second sentence of section 5, the sentence as to the effect of certain facts as presumptive evidence, cannot be considered on this application for a writ of habeas corpus. If this provision be invalid, its invalidity does not render void the provision first referred to.

The application for a writ of habeas corpus is denied.

WILLIAMS v. WILLIAMS. (S. F. 8508.)

Appeal and Error 🔑623 — Transcript — Time for Filing.

Under rule 2 (119 Pac. ix), providing that the transcript must be filed within 40 days after an appeal is perfected, but that where a transcript is prepared under Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, the time for filing shall not begin to run until the proceeding to obtain the same has been terminated, where on the day the appeal was perfected appellant's motion for a phonographic report for use on appeal was dismissed, the time for filing a transcript began to run with such dismissal, and an appeal from the order of dismissal did not prevent the running of the time for filing a transcript.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County.

Action by Florence E. Williams against Hugh D. Williams. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. On motion to dismiss appeal. Motion granted.

R. E. Hewitt, of Oakland, for appellant.

Wm. S. Cox and Walter R. Dunn, both of Oakland, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is a motion to dismiss an appeal from a judgment denying a divorce, on the ground that the appellant has failed to file in this court a transcript on appeal within the time provided by our rules. The appeal here was perfected June 22, 1917, and no transcript has been filed herein. Rule 2 (119 Pac. ix) provides that the transcript must be filed "within 40 days after an appeal is perfected," except as otherwise stated in the rule. The only other provision material here is one reading as follows:

> "If the transcript for use on appeal is prepared under the provisions of section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure and a notice is filed by the appellant requesting a transcript of the phonographic report, the time for filing the transcript of the record on appeal shall not begin to run until such phonographic report is approved and certified by the judge or until the proceeding to obtain the same has been terminated in the court below by dismissal or otherwise."

In this case such a notice requesting a transcript was filed in the court below on June 22, 1917, but on July 27, 1917, the proceeding to obtain such a record was dismissed by the court below on motion duly made by respondent.

According to the provisions of our rule the time for filing the transcript on appeal apparently began to run with such dismissal, July 27, 1917, expiring September 5, 1917. Appellant, however, appealed from said order of dismissal on August 30, 1917, by filing a notice of appeal, and urges the existence of this latter appeal as a sufficient excuse for failure to file the transcript on the appeal from the judgment. The rule granting extensions in certain cases does not so provide. According to that rule it is the dismissal by the lower court that starts the time running, and an appeal from the order of dismissal does not ipso facto operate to prevent the running of the time. It may be that if it was made to appear to this court on a motion to dismiss an appeal that there had been an arbitrary disregard by the lower court of the rights of the appellant in the dismissal of his or her proceeding for a record and a gross abuse of the discretion committed to it to determine whether the appellant had proceeded in good faith and with due diligence, with the result that the pending appeal from the order of dismissal had real merit and the order should be reversed, we would accept such showing as a sufficient excuse for the failure to file the transcript pending a diligent prosecution of the appeal from the order of dismissal. But after an examination of the papers submitted on this motion we are constrained to hold that no such showing of merit in the appeal from the order is here made.

The appeal is dismissed.

In re HILLS' ESTATE.

HILLS v. HANSEN. (S. F. 8002.)

1. Descent and Distribution ⊂⊃4 — What Law Governs—Real Estate.

With regard to real property, the law of the state in which it is situated as it exists at the date of the death of the owner controls the descent.

2. Descent and Distribution ⊂⊃4 — What Law Governs — Land of Ancestor Not Sold.

Where at the time of the daughter's death her intestate father's land in Colorado had not been sold, title to one-half of the daughter's share immediately passed to her husband as real estate, and could not be divested, except for some purpose of administration, by subsequent sale of the father's land under an order of the court and transmission of the money to California.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Wm. S. Wells, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Leonora May Hills, deceased. From an order of distribution in favor of Charlotte Hills Hansen, Winford Grant Hills appeals. Reversed.

Marguerite Ogden, of San Francisco, for appellant. Eugene W. Roland, of Oakland, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The appeal is from an order distributing the estate of said decedent. Leonora May Hills died intestate on June 4, 1914, being then a resident of the state of California. She left as her heirs at law her surviving husband, Winford Grant Hills, one son, and two daughters. On January 7, 1908, her father, George Raugh, had died intestate in Colorado, seised of a tract of land in that state. There was no administration in Colorado or elsewhere of his estate until December 22, 1914, which was after the death of Leonora May Hills. In the administration of his estate in the Colorado court, on May 3, 1915, all his real property was sold at probate sale. After paying out of the proceeds the debts and expenses of administration of his estate the share thereof which had descended to Leonora May Hills amounted to $4,795.44. The final distribution of his estate was had, whereby said sum was ordered to be distributed according to the law of descent of real property in that state to the heirs of said Leonora May Hills, that is to say, one-half of her said share to her said husband, and the other one-half, share and share alike, to her three children. Her husband, in the meantime had been appointed by the superior court of Alameda county administrator of the estate of his said wife. The sum of money belonging to the heirs of his said wife in Colorado was paid over to an ancillary administratrix of her estate in Colorado, and by that administratrix was transmitted to and received by her said husband as administrator in California. It is this money so received that is the subject of the decree of distribution appealed from.

The court below was of the opinion that it should be treated as personal property of the decedent, and should be distributed according to the law of descent of this state. The appellant contends that this money was the proceeds of the sale of real estate owned by the decedent, at the time of her death, situated in Colorado; that it descended at the time of her death according to the law of Colorado regulating the descent of real estate, and that it should be distributed here in accordance with the law of descent of real estate by which it had originally vested in her heirs at the time of her death. By the law of Colorado the surviving husband of a married woman inherited one-half of her real estate, and the surviving children the remaining one-half. By the law of California, if a decedent leaves a surviving husband and more than one child living, the husband takes by descent only one-third of her estate, and the remainder goes in equal shares to her children.

Appellant's counsel states the case of the appellant as follows:

(a) At the date of the death of Leonora May Hills she was the owner of real property situated in Colorado.

(b) The title to this real property then immediately vested in her heirs.

(c) With regard to real property, the law of the state in which it is situated as it exists at the date of the death of the owner controls the descent.

(d) The sale of this real property in administration proceedings in the state where the land is situated does not work a conversion of the proceeds into personal property, so as to make the share of one of the heirs who had died after the death of the original owner and before said sale personal property of the estate of such heirs, descendible according to the law relating to personal property.

[1, 2] These propositions are sound and should have controlled the court below in making the distribution. The decision in Brenham v. Story, 39 Cal. 179, and many other cases following and confirming it, supports proposition (b). Proposition (c) is too well established to require the citation of authority in its support. Proposition (d) is in principle supported by the decisions in Estate of Garrity, 108 Cal. 472, 38 Pac. 628, 41 Pac. 485, Estate of Packer, 125 Cal. 396, 58 Pac. 59, 73 Am. St. Rep. 58, and Martinovich v. Marsicano, 137 Cal. 354, 70 Pac. 459. In point of fact, the title to one-half of the interest of the decedent in the land in Colorado had vested in the husband prior to its sale by the Colorado administrator in the administration of the ancestor's estate. The title of the husband to one-half the proceeds being then vested could not become divested by the subsequent transmission of the money to California for administration there as a part of the estate of Leonora May Hills, except as it might have been divested for some legitimate purpose in the administration of her estate. For purposes of distribution the title remained as it was when the property was passed to the California administrator.

The cases cited by the respondent in opposition to this conclusion are not in point. In Pennell's Appeal, 20 Pa. 515, a minor child had inherited certain real estate, and during his minority his guardian had sold the same under order of the orphans' court, for the use of the minor. Thereafter the minor died. The court held that the proceeds of the real estate so converted into money in his lifetime for his use descended according to the law of descent of personal property, and not according to the law of descent of real estate. The reason is plainly apparent. It had been converted into money for his use during his lifetime, and was part of his personal estate at the time of his death. Its character was precisely the same as if, after arriving at majority, he had sold the property, received the money, and had then died, leaving the money as part of his estate. The distinction between that case and the present one is obvious. Here the property at the death of the decedent, Mrs. Hills, was real estate. Its subsequent conversion into personalty did not change the title which vested at her death.

The other case cited is Muus v. Muus, 29 Minn. 115, 12 N. W. 343. In that case a husband and wife were resident in Minnesota. The father of the wife died in Norway, leaving property there, an interest in which descended to the wife. By the laws of Norway relating to husband and wife, property acquired by the wife in that manner became the common property of herself and her husband, with the sole control in the husband. By the law regulating the marriage relation in Minnesota, where the husband and wife resided, such property became and remained the separate property of the wife, free from the control of the husband. The Minnesota court decided that while the property descended to the wife according to the law of Norway, its character as the separate property of the wife, or the common property of the two, was determined by the law of their domicile regulating the marriage relation, and that it was therefore the separate property of the wife. It is scarcely necessary to say that this decision has no bearing upon the question involved in this case.

The order is reversed.

In re FRIEDMAN'S ESTATE.

Appeal of HEBREW HOME FOR AGED DISABLED.

(S. F. 8271.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 2, 1917. Rehearing Denied Oct. 29, 1917.)

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS 🔑111(1)—PROCEEDINGS TO DETERMINE SUCCESSION—ATTORNEY'S FEES.

As it was no part of the duty of the executor to participate in a proceeding under Code Civ. Proc. § 1664, to determine succession to the estate of deceased, he had no power to engage attorneys for either claimant to the estate, and the court had no power to allow compensation out of the estate for services rendered in assisting one of the parties to the proceedings in establishing his claim, although the executor employed them to render such services.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thomas F. Graham, Judge.

Proceeding under Code Civ. Proc. § 1664, in the matter of the estate of Julius Friedman, deceased. From an order allowing attorney's fees to Marshall B. Woodworth and another, the Hebrew Home for Aged Disabled appeals. Reversed.

See, also, 171 Cal. 431, 153 Pac. 918; 173 Cal. 411, 160 Pac. 237.

Charles W. Slack and Lucius L. Solomons, both of San Francisco, for appellant. Edmund Tauszky and Marshall B. Woodworth, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal from an order of the superior court allowing to Marshall B. Woodworth and Edmund Tauszky, each respectively, the sum of $5,000 out of the funds of the estate of said decedent, for certain services found to have been rendered by them as attorneys.

Julius Friedman died prior to April, 1900. His will was duly admitted to probate, and the estate has been in the course of administration for many years. Edward R. Lande and I. M. Friedberg have, during all that time, been the executors of said estate. By the terms of the will the residue of the estate was given to the Hebrew Home for Aged Disabled, an eleemosynary corporation. The said disposition was for charitable purposes, and was therefore invalid as to two-thirds of the estate, with respect to the legal heirs of Friedman, if he had any. In course of time numerous sets of persons appeared and claimed to be the heirs of the estate. The Hebrew Home for Aged Disabled thereupon began a proceeding, under section 1664 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to obtain a decree determining the rights of all persons to the estate and to whom the distribution thereof should be made. The several persons who claimed to be the heirs of Friedman appeared and filed their answers therein, the cause proceeded to trial, and findings and judgment were regularly made and entered, declaring that the deceased left no heirs at law entitled to his estate, and that the entire estate should be distributed to said Hebrew Home for Aged Disabled. An appeal from this judgment was taken by one set of claimants, which appeal is now pending for decision. The services for which the compensation in question was allowed were rendered during the period from May 31, 1913, to September 30, 1915. Ever since the administration of the estate began, Woodworth has been employed by the executor, Lande, as his attorney to conduct the proceedings in the administration of the estate, and Tauszky has been employed for the same purpose by the executor, Friedberg. The allowances made by the court were almost entirely for services rendered by the two attorneys, respectively, in the proceeding to determine the succession to the estate, begun by the said Hebrew Home for Aged Disabled. It is claimed that they were rendered at the request, or at least for the benefit, of the said Hebrew Home, the successful claimant in the proceeding.

The court in probate has power to allow to the executor all necessary expenses incurred by him in the settlement of the estate, including the reasonable value of the services of attorneys employed by him to advise him in the matter, and conduct the proceedings in administration. An attorney who has rendered such services to the executor may, during the administration, apply to the court for an allowance to himself for compensation therefor, and it is the duty of the court to allow him the reasonable value of the services rendered. Code Civ. Proc., § 1616. These services may include fees for conducting the ordinary probate proceedings, and such further allowance as the court may deem just and reasonable for "extraordinary services such as sales or mortgages of real estate, contested or litigated claims against the estate, litigation in regard to the property of the estate, and such other litigation as may be necessary for the executor or administrator to prosecute or defend." Civ. Code, § 1619.

It is no part of the duty of the executor to participate actively in a proceeding under section 1664 to ascertain and determine the succession to the estate. That proceeding may be begun by any person claiming to be entitled to distribution of all or any part of such estate. All opposing claimants must be made parties to the proceeding. The executor or administrator is required to be named in the petition, and process must accordingly be served upon him; but he has no interest in the question to be determined. No answer is required to be filed by him. He has no claim which he can set up in opposition to those of the rival claimants for the estate, and his name is inserted as a party solely for the purpose of giving him information of the proceeding, so that he may be advised as to the judgment therein given, and of the pendency of the proceeding itself. As far as he is concerned, it is in the nature of a notice of lis pendens. It follows, therefore, that he has no authority as executor to engage attorneys for either claimant to the estate, or to bind the estate in any manner to pay for services rendered in that behalf. These principles are thoroughly settled by many decisions, among which may be named the following: Estate of Parsons, 65 Cal. 240, 3 Pac. 817; Estate of Jessup, 80 Cal. 625, 22 Pac. 260; Estate of Healy, 137 Cal. 477, 70 Pac. 455; McCabe v. Healy, 138 Cal. 89, 70 Pac. 1008; Estate of Hite, 155 Cal. 456, 101 Pac. 448. It is unnecessary to quote from the decisions or to elaborate upon the matter further.

The necessary result is that the court has no power to allow compensation out of the estate for services rendered in assisting one of the parties to the succession proceedings in establishing its claim even if the executors employed them to render such service. If they have any lawful claim against the successful party therefor, it will be necessary for them to establish the same by action against the party in whose behalf the services were rendered. They cannot obtain an allowance out of the property of the estate for such services. Their duty, and that of the executors, also, was to stand indifferent to all claimants, and not to favor one above the other. This duty does not change upon the decision in the court below in favor of one claimant, but continues until that decision becomes final.

It is claimed, and there was some evidence to show, that the attorney for said Hebrew Home requested the performance of the services for which compensation is claimed by respondents, and that as it was successful, and the services have inured to its benefit, it is estopped from taking an appeal from the allowance, and, further, that if the appeal in the succession proceeding is successful they will not be harmed, because in that event the property will go to the successful claimants, and they alone have a right to object to the allowance to these attorneys. With respect to the alleged estoppel by reason of the alleged request of the attorneys regularly employed by the Hebrew Home to conduct the proceeding, it is sufficient to say that there is no showing that that corporation ever authorized such employment, or ratified the same, even if in any event there could be an estoppel of that character. Furthermore, as above indicated, the probate court is not the proper forum in which to assert such estoppel. The Hebrew Home is entitled to have the question tried in an ordinary action. The suggestion that, if the other appeal is successful, the successful claimant, and not the present appellant, will be the loser, is not supported by the facts. In any event, the present appellant will be entitled to one-third of the estate, and it has not yet received that proportion thereof. Consequently the payment of these services will diminish the entire estate, and one-third of such diminution will fall upon appellant. As the major part of the allowance is for services for which the court had no power to order payment from the estate, and we have no means of apportioning the allowance, the order must be reversed as a whole.

The order is reversed.

CITY OF OAKLAND v. WHEELER et al.

(Civ. 1699.)

1. EMINENT DOMAIN 🔑191(6)—PROCEEDINGS—COMPLAINT—DESCRIPTION OF PROPERTY—"SHIP CHANNEL."

In a proceeding by the city of Oakland to condemn lands on the water front, the southerly boundary of the property was described as the northerly boundary of the ship channel in the harbor which was the line of ordinary low tide of May 4, 1852, and which northerly boundary line of ship channel was the southerly boundary line of the lands granted and released to the town of Oakland by Act May 4, 1852 (St. 1852, p. 180). By the act referred to all the land within the limits of the town between high tide and ship channel was granted to the town with the right in the town to wharf out on the entire water front. The property was conveyed by the town, title finally vesting in defendants. Held, that the words "ship channel," as employed in the complaint and statute, meant the line of low tide on May 4, 1852, and hence the description was sufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Ship Channel.]

2. EMINENT DOMAIN 🔑195—PROCEEDINGS—DESCRIPTION OF PROPERTY SOUGHT TO BE CONDEMNED.

While the description of property sought to be condemned must be such that the property or interest to be acquired can be ascertained from the description itself without reference to extraneous facts, the description of water front property as bounded by ship channel, which was the low tide of May 4, 1852, is sufficient, so that evidence of the location of the line is admissible notwithstanding the accumulation of débris rendered it impossible to ascertain the line by observation, and the parties were unable to agree as to where the line was located on the ground.

3. EMINENT DOMAIN 🔑201—PROCEEDINGS—EVIDENCE.

Where defendants and their predecessors accumulated débris on the line of their water front property which was sought to be condemned, evidence as to the location of the line cannot be excluded for that reason.

4. EMINENT DOMAIN 🔑262(2)—REVIEW—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

In a proceeding to condemn water front property, the boundary line of property was described as the ship channel, which was the low tide line of a fixed year. Débris had accumulated, so that the line could not be ascertained from observation. Plaintiff, after proof of its charter power to condemn, the filing of a lis pendens, and the passage of an ordinance authorizing condemnation, rested. Defendants then introduced testimony as to the location of the boundary line, and upon a witness testifying that he could not locate the line without other data, moved the court to require plaintiff to specify the tract sought to be condemned. The motion was denied in terms, but was in effect complied with by plaintiff. Held that, though defendant subsequently claimed that its evidence was offered not to establish the boundary, but to show that it could not be located, defendant cannot object to the admission of testimony as to its location on the ground.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑992 — QUESTION PRELIMINARY TO ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE—MAPS—ACCURACY.

In a proceeding to condemn water front property, evidence as to the coast survey chart made by United States engineers of the coast and geodetic survey cannot be excluded on the ground of inaccuracy, where the evidence as to the accuracy of the map which was introduced subsequently conflicted.

6. EVIDENCE 🔑333(5)—EMINENT DOMAIN—COAST SURVEY CHART.

A coast survey chart of United States engineers of the coast and geodetic survey is competent in a proceeding to condemn land under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1920, 1926, providing for the admission of evidence of entries in official books, and that entries made by officers shall be prima facie evidence; the map being an original record of the United States.

7. EVIDENCE 🔑506 — OPINION EVIDENCE—JURY QUESTION.

In a proceeding to condemn water front property, where a coast survey map made by United States engineers was introduced, testimony by experts as to their opinion concerning the accuracy of the map is inadmissible, that being a question for the jury, though they might testify to specific inaccuracies.

8. EMINENT DOMAIN 🔑71—PROCEEDINGS—DAMAGES.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1249, declaring that for the purpose of assessing compensation the right shall be deemed to have accrued at the date of the issuance of the summons and the actual value of the property at that date shall be the measure of compensation, is constitutional.

9. NAVIGABLE WATERS 🔑39(3) — RIPARIAN PROPRIETORS — WHARFING-OUT PRIVILEGE.

Owners of land upon the littoral of a navigable bay have no right of access to deep water over intervening tide lands; hence in a suit to condemn water front property an instruction that if defendants had a wharfing-out right it could be considered an assessing damage was more favorable to defendants than they were entitled to.

10. WHARVES 🔑9—EXERCISE OF RIGHT—ADVERSE USES.

Where defendants and their predecessors in ownership of water front property were by reason of a lease entitled to a wharfing-out privilege, their exercise of such privilege cannot ripen into adverse title.

11. NAVIGABLE WATERS 🔑39(3) — TIDE LANDS—ADVERSE POSSESSION.

Where the title to tide lands was withheld from sale by Const. 1879, art. 15, § 3, no wharfing-out right by an owner of water front property can be acquired by adverse possession.

12. EMINENT DOMAIN 🔑222(1) — PROCEEDINGS—INSTRUCTIONS.

In a suit to condemn water front property described as extending to a tide line of May 4, 1852, where the city did not attempt to condemn any land added by accretion, an instruction on the subject of accretion was properly denied, though there was testimony that the tide line had been extended from the shore by accretion; such testimony being material to the location of the line.

13. TRIAL 🔑255(14)—EMINENT DOMAIN—INSTRUCTIONS—NECESSITY OF REQUEST.

In a proceeding to condemn land, defendants cannot complain of the failure of the court to instruct on a particular element of damage, where no such instruction was requested.

14. EMINENT DOMAIN 🔑262(2) — REVIEW — INVITED ERROR.

A proceeding to condemn water front property was disposed of on the theory that the jury could not only assess the damage, but could determine all questions of fact by a general verdict. Such theory appeared from defendants' own requests. Held, that defendant could not for the first time on appeal complain that the court failed to make findings on the issue of fact, such as the boundaries other than the question of damages.

15. EMINENT DOMAIN 🔑262(5)—REVIEW — HARMLESS ERROR—FAILURE TO MAKE FINDING.

In an eminent domain suit, where the jury were allowed to render a general verdict, but there were no seriously disputed issues of fact requiring findings by the court, the failure of the court to make findings was harmless if erroneous.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; John Ellsworth, Judge.

Action by the City of Oakland, a municipal corporation, against Peter L. Wheeler and others. From a judgment for plaintiff and orders allowing plaintiff to take possession, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Chapman & Trefethen, of Oakland, and Wm. B. Bosley, of San Francisco (Goodfellow, Eells, Moore & Orrick, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellants. Paul C. Morf, City Atty., of Oakland (Charles A. Beardsley, of Oakland, of counsel), for respondent.

BEASLY, Judge pro tem. The appeals in this case are taken by defendants, trustees of the Samuel Merritt Hospital, from a judgment of the superior court of Alameda county, condemning for public purposes certain lands owned and held by said trustees on the Oakland water front of San Francisco bay, from a final order of condemnation of these lands, and from an order authorizing plaintiff to take possession thereof.

[1] The facts in this case naturally group themselves about the questions of law which are presented on this appeal, and they will therefore be stated so far as they are material in connection with the discussion of these questions.

(1) The first contention of the appellants is that the property sought to be condemned was not described by plaintiff in the pleadings with definiteness, nor so that it could be located with certainty. This question was presented in varying forms to the trial court, for example, by a demurrer to plaintiff's amended complaint, by objection to the introduction of evidence of the disputed boundary, and by instructions which the court was requested to give the jury "that if the location of the southern boundary of the property could be ascertained only by taking the testimony of witnesses they should render a verdict in favor of the defendants," and by a motion that the court require the location of the disputed southern boundary of the property to be fixed. On all these points the trial court ruled against the defendants.

The southern boundary of the property sought to be condemned is alone in dispute. The description of this line as found in the amended complaint on which the judgment rests, with so much of the remainder of the boundaries of the property as is necessary to understand the objections urged by defendants, is as follows:

> "* * * Thence southerly along said center line of Washington street extended southerly on its present course to the northerly boundary line of ship channel in Oakland Harbor, which northerly boundary line of ship channel is the line of ordinary low tide of May 4, 1852, and which northerly boundary line of ship channel is the southerly boundary line of the lands granted and released to the town of Oakland by an act of the Legislature of the state of California en- titled 'An act to incorporate the town of Oakland and to provide for the construction of wharves thereat,' approved May 4, 1852; thence westerly along the said northerly boundary line of ship channel to the center line of Clay street. * * *"

The italicized portions of the description indicate the disputed southerly boundary line. The three criticisms of the description of this line in the complaint, as stated by defendants, are: (a) That the description of this boundary line is on its face uncertain; (b) that the southerly boundary cannot therefrom be located on the ground at all; and (c) that if it can be so located the location can only be made by the aid of evidence outside the description in the complaint and in addition thereto. These questions are stated and presented at great length and, as has been said, in varying form; but this statement sets them forth so that they can be clearly understood, and whether presented by special demurrer or in the form of the various motions, objections to evidence, and requests made to the court at various stages of the trial, present identical questions so far as this phase of the case is concerned.

This description is sufficient under a decision of the Supreme Court passing upon this same question arising out of this very description. A brief history of the defendants' title will assist in understanding that this is a correct conclusion. The town of Oakland was incorporated under an act of the Legislature in effect May 4, 1852, which is the act referred to in the description above quoted, and which is entitled as therein set forth. Stats. 1852, p. 180. By this act all the land within the limits of the town between high tide and "ship channel" was granted to the town, with the right in the town to wharf out upon the entire water front from said lands. Within one month of the taking effect of this act the town of Oakland conveyed all the land so granted to it to one Horace W. Carpentier, and also in the same instrument granted to him a wharfing-out privilege on the entire water front of the town for a period of 37 years; and in 1868 Carpentier in turn conveyed all this property and the accompanying wharfing-out privilege to the Oakland Water Front Company. In this same year (1868) Samuel Merritt, then mayor of the city of Oakland, which had meanwhile become the municipal successor of the town of Oakland by legislative act in 1854 (Stats. 1854, p. 183), made an arrangement with the Oakland Water Front Company pursuant to which he established a lumber yard on this property, and built a wharf out to deep water thereon. Of course he acquired by this arrangement no rights beyond those which had already been granted to Carpentier and conveyed by him to the Oakland Water Front Company. From Merritt this property came in time into the hands of these defendants. The exact description of the water side boundary of the Oakland water front so far as here involved contained in the act of 1852, under which the town of Oakland was incorporated and acquired these lands, is as follows:

> "The lands lying within the limits aforesaid (i. e., the corporate limits of the town as defined in the first section of the act) between high tide and ship channel."

It will be seen that the term "ship channel" employed in this act is the exact term used in plaintiff's amended complaint to describe the southerly boundary of the property sought to be condemned in this proceeding. It is about the meaning of the words "ship channel" that this controversy is waged. This description is both precise and definite, for it is held in Oakland v. Oakland Water Front Co., 118 Cal. 160, 50 Pac. 277, that the words "ship channel" as employed in this statute mean the line of low tide of the date of the statute, namely, May 4, 1852, and in that case (118 Cal. 177, 50 Pac. 283), in the court's opinion, the Supreme Court of this state, in determining the meaning to be given to the words "ship channel" in this very act of 1852, says:

> "The next term of the description which requires construction is 'thence to ship channel.' What did the Legislature mean by 'ship channel'? * * * It is certain some meaning must be ascribed to the term 'ship channel' in order to give effect to the act, and it must be some precise and definite meaning; for the law abhors want of definition in matters of boundary as nature abhors a vacuum. Especially is this true with respect to the boundaries of a municipal corporation invested with power and authority to make and enforce local laws, civil and criminal. It is not to be supposed that the Legislature, in conferring the municipal franchise upon the inhabitants of a local district, will purposely leave its boundaries in any respect uncertain. On the contrary, it must be assumed that the intention was to mark the boundary so exactly and definitely that no question could arise as to whether a particular spot was within or without the local jurisdiction. * * * And when we are required to locate its boundaries with precision, and no artificial boundary has been established by competent authority, we are driven to seek a definite natural boundary, if any such may be found, and here we do find such a boundary at the line of low tide. This is a definite line, and the only definite line beyond the line of high tide, and my conclusion is," said the learned Chief Justice Beatty in his opinion in the case, "that the line of low tide as it existed on the 4th of May, 1852, was the western boundary of the town of Oakland intended by the original act of incorporation."

In summing up the result of his discussion on this topic the late Chief Justice says:

> "The boundary of the town of Oakland, as defined by the act of May 4, 1852, commencing at the intersection of the northeast line with the line of low tide on the eastern side of the northern branch of the estuary, follows the line of low tide on said branch to the mouth of the eastern basin, crosses said mouth and continues along the line of low tide on the southern side of the estuary to its mouth in the bay, and thence follows the line of low tide northerly and easterly till it intersects the northeast boundary line, as to the location of which there seems to be no dispute."

The quoted language used by the court was employed in considering the exact line in dispute in this case; and the language of the court leaves nothing to be decided when it is applied to the case now under discussion. Indeed, the description above quoted from the complaint herein is the description contained in the act of 1852, supra, construed with and supplemented by the definition of the words "ship channel" as given in the Oakland Water Front Case, where the words "ship channel" are held to have a precise and definite meaning. Under this authority it must be held that the description used in the amended complaint in this case is definite and certain. As a matter of law it is as definite and certain as if it were a line of rock or the thread of a stream or any other natural boundary.

[2] (2) Counsel for defendants also claim that it was error for the trial court to permit evidence to be introduced at the trial as to the location of this southerly boundary upon the ground, because of what they claim is the uncertainty of this description. The low tide line had been covered by débris placed over it by the defendants' predecessors in ownership; and it seems to be claimed now that the line of low tide had receded during the intervening years between 1852 and the beginning of this action. The contentions of counsel on these points can be stated largely in their own language thus:

> "In order to locate the line in question the position of the line of low water on the north side of the estuary as it existed on May 4, 1852, must first be determined."

And it is contended that the rule of law governing descriptions in condemnation proceedings under the power of eminent domain is this:

> That "the property or interest to be acquired must be ascertainable from the description thereof in the petition itself without reference to extraneous facts."

If by this is meant that the description must be a boundary the location of which can be found by any person looking for the location of the line unaided by anything but the data contained in the description itself, the proposition is too broadly stated; for a section line running over a brushy hillside would hardly be challenged, nor would it be seriously argued that it is not a sufficient description in a condemnation proceeding, although it might require the services of a land surveyor to ascertain its actual location, and the line of a stone wall covered by the débris of years would be a sufficient description, even though excavations were necessary to uncover it and show it to the officer executing the judgment of condemnation. Thompson v. Trowe, 82 Minn. 471, 85 N. W. 169. And the fact that the parties are not able to agree as to where the lines of location run upon the ground, or as to what property is included within them, does not make a description insufficient in condemnation proceedings under the power of eminent domain. Coe v. Aiken (C. C.) 61 Fed. 24. Counsel cite many cases as sustaining their position on this point; but the distinction drawn in at least one of these cases, and which seems applicable here is, in the language of the court in the case of Coe v. Aiken, supra, that:

> If the description is "uncertain in law, not merely in fact but in law, it could not stand; but that it is uncertain in fact that individuals may differ in regard to its construction, and that it must go to the courts to ultimately settle its boundaries, do not make it uncertain in law, as the law says that what can be made certain is certain."

This is only another manner of saying that such a description may be sufficient in a pleading, although its exact location on the ground might require some search or investigation outside the data contained in the description itself. This description being certain in law, as was held in the Oakland Water Front Case, supra, its exact location under the débris with which it was covered could be and was shown by the introduction of evidence at the trial. In fact there is no way by which such a line can be made certain and its definite location made binding upon the defendants if they choose to dispute the fact, except by settling the question in a proceeding or trial where there are adversary claims as to the line to be settled between the parties; and the law provides no means for obtaining a judgment adjusting or fixing boundaries between parties in contemplation of condemnation proceedings.

[3, 4] The defendants for another reason should not be allowed to complain of this, for they were at all times in possession of the land and in a position to ascertain the line by uncovering it, and by the other means which, as appeared at the trial, were adopted by the witnesses for ascertaining its location. The plaintiff was not in as good a position as the defendants, if in a position at all, to do this before the complaint was filed. The débris which covered the line and hid it was placed upon it by the defendants' predecessors in interest, who filled in the land over it without regard to whether or not they obliterated or obscured their boundaries. Besides this, in their amended and supplemental answer upon which the action first went to trial and under which the trial continued for eight days, the defendants averred that their southern boundary (the one in dispute) was the present low tide line, that the land sought to be condemned "is the very parcel described by the plaintiff and bounded on the south by the low tide line of 1852," and that this "present low tide line" is "identical with the ordinary low tide line on the northerly shore of the estuary of San Antonio or Oakland harbor in front of said parcel of land on the 4th day of May, 1852"; and they do not deny the allegations of plaintiff's amended complaint filed during the trial that the property described therein was the whole of the parcel of land owned by them. Further, the manner in which the trial proceeded precludes defendants from now objecting to the evidence locating this line upon the ground, which was introduced in behalf of the plaintiff, for at the opening of the trial the plaintiff introduced in evidence a lis pendens properly recorded, the charter of the city of Oakland approved by the Legislature in the year 1889, and the so-called new charter of the city of Oakland approved by the Legislature in the year 1911, an ordinance determining that the public interest and necessity demanded the construction of certain permanent public municipal improvements for which the condemnation of this land was necessary, a resolution of the city council authorizing the city attorney to commence this action as required by the charter, and thereupon the plaintiff rested its case without offering any evidence as to the location of this boundary. The defendants then took the oar, and called witness after witness to prove the location of this southern boundary line of their property upon the ground. They accepted the case made by the plaintiff, and themselves assumed the burden of introducing evidence to show the location of their boundary. In the face of all this it must be held that plaintiff's evidence as to the location of the southerly boundary of the defendants' property on the ground was properly admitted by the trial court.

It is true that some of the witnesses called, as above stated, on behalf of the defendants, to testify as to the location of this boundary, said that by the description in the complaint they could not locate it; one of them said he would have to hunt up evidence outside the courtroom to enable him to locate it; and the defendants then and not before moved the court to require plaintiff to specify—presumably by measurements in feet and inches, although they did not say so—the tract sought to be condemned, to the end, as they claimed, that they might be enabled to know what questions to ask witnesses as to value. This motion was denied in terms by the court, but in effect it was complied with by the attorneys for the city, for during weeks of the trial thereafter they produced evidence as to the location of this line. Under these circumstances and facts it cannot be held, as is the contention of the defendants, that the boundary cannot be located on the ground, nor that evidence tending to locate it was improperly admitted, for they themselves invited and precipitated this method of proceeding under which the court permitted evidence to be introduced upon this subject.

The defendants now claim, however, that their evidence on the subject of location of the southerly line was not offered to establish the boundary, but to show that it could not be located. Before insisting upon this construction of their case, however, the defendants offered evidence of the length of their boundary lines, of the location of a certain stone wall on their property, of the area of their wharf, of the location of the present low tide line alleged by them to be the same as the line of May 4, 1852, and other evidence of the same purport. It is impossible to read this evidence without coming to the conclusion that it was introduced in an attempt to locate this boundary. The trial court certainly so understood it, as is evident from the context; and this being so, the competent evidence on the same point subsequently offered by plaintiff was properly admitted. To sum up this phase of the case, we must hold that the description of this boundary line is not uncertain; that while the boundary line could not be located upon the ground by simple inspection without the aid of evidence outside of and in addition to the description in the complaint itself, it could be and was so located by the aid of competent evidence outside the description contained in the complaint and in addition thereto. All rulings adverse to defendants involving these contentions as to boundary were therefore correct.

(3) This disposes of the questions arising directly from the claim that the description of the southerly boundary of the property sought to be condemned is uncertain, except that in dealing with the sufficiency of the description the exceptions to instructions given and refused on this subject seem to merit special mention in addition to what has already been said on that topic.

Complaint is made of an instruction in which the jury were told that the description was not uncertain in law. As may be gathered from what has been said, this was a correct statement of the law. The court left the question whether under the evidence the boundary could be located as a matter of fact to the jury, and by its instructions left to the jury the question of the location of the boundary on the ground and of the area of the land embraced within the parcel sought to be taken in the proceeding. From what has been said it will be seen that this instruction to the jury was not in conflict with the instruction that the description was not as a matter of law insufficient or uncertain.

[5, 6] (4) The evidence introduced by the plaintiff to establish the location of the southerly or waterside boundary included the coast survey chart of 1855, made by the engineers of the United States coast and geodetic survey. The introduction of this map was objected to for many reasons, only two of which are sufficiently serious to require attention here. These are: First, inaccuracy; and, second, that it is not an official record such as is evidence under sections 1920 and 1926 of the Code of Civil Procedure—it being claimed that the map was made solely for the purpose of aiding navigation, and hence cannot be used to establish a boundary.

The most that can be said in support of the first objection is that the evidence as to the accuracy of the map was conflicting. The evidence of the inaccuracy was introduced subsequent to the admission of the map in evidence. Besides, this map is an original record of the United States coast and geodetic survey, and as such is admissible in evidence under sections 1920 and 1926 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Merryman v. Kirby, 13 Cal. App. 344, 109 Pac. 635. With this ruling admitting the map under these conditions we cannot interfere. On the second point the witness Von Geldern testified that it was an original map and record of the United States coast and geodetic survey, and it appeared upon its face to be such a record. Under sections 1920 and 1926 of the Code of Civil Procedure it is provided that such records are prima facie evidence of the facts stated therein. This map is a record of the United States coast and geodetic survey, made in the performance of their duties by federal officers, as appears from the record. Nor does this map appear to have been made solely for purposes of navigation. It was properly admitted in evidence. The same rule applies for similar reasons to the coast and geodetic survey map of 1859. The court instructed the jury that these maps were prima facie evidence of the location of the lines shown thereon. To this instruction defendants objected. The disputed boundary appears on these maps. The instruction was therefore a correct statement of the rule of law embodied in sections 1920 and 1926 of the Code of Civil Procedure above quoted. See 5 Cyc. 950, 955; Breen v. Donnelly, 74 Cal. 301, 15 Pac. 845; Goodwin v. McCabe, 75 Cal. 584, 17 Pac. 705. Whatever the rule may be elsewhere than in California, in this state these sections of the Code cited settle the competency of these maps and their character as prima facie evidence of the facts sought to be established by them.

[7] (5) Defendants asked certain questions of the engineers who were witnesses on their behalf, which called for the opinions of these gentlemen concerning the accuracy and reliability of the coast and geodetic survey maps heretofore referred to, for the purpose of defining boundaries in private ownership which by deed or statute is defined to be the low tide line. Objections to these questions were sustained, and properly so. These questions called for opinions of the witnesses as to the weight to be given by the jury to these maps as evidence. If any inaccuracies existed in the maps themselves these experts, if qualified to do so, could have been permitted to point them out, and they were permitted to do exactly this; but they could not be permitted to give their general opinions as to the value of these maps for the purpose of defining boundaries, nor as to the weight to be given them as evidence. These were questions for the jury, whose province it was to determine the weight and value of the maps as evidence. These same experts were permitted to spend much time pointing out the incompleteness of these maps, and this is as far as they should have been permitted to go. This answers also the exception to the court's ruling in excluding certain questions of similar import asked of the witness Davidson at the taking of his deposition.

[8] (6) The trial court properly instructed the jury that the value of the property should be fixed as of the date of the issuance of the summons, as is provided in the Code of Civil Procdeure, section 1249. The question of the constitutionality of this section of the Code raised by defendants is no longer an open one in this state. Los Angeles v. Gager, 10 Cal. App. 378, 102 Pac. 17; Cal. S. Ry. Co. v. Kimball, 61 Cal. 90; San Jose, etc., Co. v. Mayne, 83 Cal. 566, 23 Pac. 522; Tehama Co. v. Bryan, 68 Cal. 57, 8 Pac. 673; Sacramento Co. v. McDougall, 19 Cal. App. 562, 126 Pac. 503. The section is constitutional.

[9] (8) Complaint is made because the trial court refused to give certain instructions to the effect that defendants had a wharfing-out right on their property to deep water, and that this right must be considered by the jury in fixing their damages. Defendants requested several instructions along this line. The court gave one of these instructions, namely, that if the defendants had such right it should be considered in fixing their compensation for lands taken. It refused to instruct as a matter of law that the defendants had such wharfing-out right. It might have instructed that they had at the time of the issuance of the summons no such right, for it has been settled in Dalton v. Oakland, 168 Cal. 463, 143 Pac. 721, that owners of land upon the littoral of a navigable bay have no right of access to deep water over intervening tide lands. Western Pacific v. Southern Pacific Co., 151 Fed. 376, 80 C. C. A. 606. The instruction given was therefore more favorable to the defendants than it should have been, and they cannot complain of it.

[10, 11] (9) But the defendants also claim a wharfing-out right acquired by adverse possession, and this claim will be considered. Appellants and their predecessors in ownership of this property exercised for 37 years, from some time in June, 1852, until a corresponding date in 1889, the wharfing-out privilege granted by the town of Oakland to Carpentier in his deed of the former date. The exercise of the right conferred by this instrument, whether it be termed a lease or by whatever designation it be characterized, estopped the defendants and their predecessors so exercising it from claiming title to or right or easement in the land below low tide on which the wharf stood as against the city of Oakland from whom they derived the right so exercised during those years. Assuming that it was possible for the defendants to have acquired title to this land below low tide, or any privilege to use it for wharfing out, by adverse possession under any circumstances—which we do not concede to have been possible in this instance—still they did not so acquire either title or wharfing-out privilege, because before the termination of their privilege or lease under the Carpentier deed this land was withdrawn from sale by the Constitution of 1879 (Const. 1879, art. 15, § 3), and it has been held that the title to tide lands withheld from sale cannot be acquired by adverse possession (Patton v. City of Los Angeles, 169 Cal. 521, 147 Pac. 141; People v. Southern Pacific Co., 169 Cal. 537, 147 Pac. 274). So that having no deed to this property, and having acquired no title thereto or privilege of using this land, or user thereof, below the low tide line by adverse possession, the defendants show no wharfing-out rights belonging to them at the time this summons was issued upon which they could stand in a claim for damages to or compensation for the taking of land below the low tide line, for the defendants had no right of access to navigable water from their property.

[12] (10) The exception to the refusal of the trial court to instruct the jury upon the subject of accretion is not tenable, even if it be conceded, in view of what has already been said, that the defendants could have acquired additional land below the low tide line of May 4, 1852, by reason of accretions thereto; still under the pleadings in this case there was no attempt to condemn any land added to defendants' land by accretion, nor any land whatever below said low tide line. It is straining and misconstruing both the evidence on the subject of accretion and the claims of plaintiff's brief to attribute to it an attempt to condemn any land added by accretion. The defendants contended that the evidence of the witness Hewer was introduced for the purpose of supporting a claim by the plaintiff to the right to take land so added to their holdings by accretion; but the evidence of this witness was material upon the question of the location on the ground of the tide line of 1852, and it is not necessary to refer its introduction to an issue as to accretion at all. Hewer testified—and to this testimony the objection is directed—that soil held in solution in water such as the Oakland estuary would be deposited by the water if the current were retarded by improvements such as wharves built on piles; a fact which must be obvious to any person of intelligence who has had opportunities to observe flowing water carrying débris in solution. This case, therefore, should not be reversed on account of this evidence, even if it found no support in any other issue than that of accretion. The line to which the plaintiff desired to condemn was the definite low tide line of May 4, 1852, and the city sought nothing beyond this, and could take nothing beyond this, under its pleadings. Hence if any land had been added by accretion below this line, and if the defendants had any claim to it, a separate proceeding would be necessary to acquire it; and it was stated in the briefs and at the oral argument, and not denied, that such separate proceeding has been instituted by the city and prosecuted to judgment.

[13] (11) No just complaint can be made by defendants of the failure of the court to instruct the jury on the subject of damages by severance, because no such instruction was requested. Trial courts cannot be expected to guard the rights of parties where they are represented by able and distinguished counsel, as was the case here.

[14] (12) Finally, the most serious contention urged by defendants is this: That no question except that of the amount of the compensation to be paid for the property should have been submitted to the jury, and that the question of boundary and location thereof on the ground, and the area of the land sought to be taken, should have been decided by the court. The court left all these questions to the jury. On the request of the defendants the court instructed the jury that if they should find that the disputed southern boundary was unascertainable their verdict must be for the defendants. During the entire trial after the first eight days thereof the defendants contended that under the pleadings the court had no authority to hear evidence upon the question of the location of the southern boundary of this land. They did indeed, after four days consumed in introducing evidence directed to the location of their southerly boundary, make certain requests of and directed certain motions on the subject to the court. These requests and motions were "that the plaintiff be required to amend its complaint and specifically describe the property"; that the court "direct them as to the particular property which should be valued by them"; that "plaintiff be required to first establish the line before defendants were required to introduce any evidence of value"; that the "southern boundary be definitely established either by a verdict of the jury, or by the determination of the court." This last request is instructive of the attitude of court and counsel in the trial of this case. The case was tried from the beginning on the theory that all questions in issue could be properly submitted to the jury. Let it be borne in mind that this trial took place in the year 1911, which was three years before the decisions of the Supreme Court which counsel claim hold that the only question proper for the jury in condemnation cases in eminent domain is that of the amount of compensation to be paid for the property. Vallejo, etc., v. Reed Orchard Co., 169 Cal. 545, 147 Pac. 238; City of Oakland v. Pacific Coast Lumber Co., 171 Cal. 392, 153 Pac. 705; San Joaquin, etc., Irrigation Co. v. Stevenson, 26 Cal. App. 274, 147 Pac. 254, 258. These cases were all decided in the year 1915. The trial court was never in this case asked in plain language to take the issues as to the boundaries from the jury. Before the time when the motions above referred to were made the defendants had, as heretofore stated, introduced much evidence upon the subject of boundary and its location. Not having asked the court in definite terms to take these issues from the jury, but knowing the theory upon which the court and counsel were proceeding, namely, that the solution of all issues was for the jury, counsel for the defendants cannot now be heard to complain of the method pursued by the trial court in the conduct of this case, for the theory of all the counsel in the case, as plainly appears from the entire record, was that all issues should be submitted to the jury, and that upon them they might return a general verdict. Nor can counsel now complain because the court, without plain and unequivocal notice of their contention that these questions must be tried and decided by the court, failed to make findings upon these issues, but entered its judgment upon the verdict of the jury alone, for no one of the counsel in this case during the trial extending over months of time ever asserted that these issues other than compensation and damages must be decided by the judge, nor that findings should be made in addition to the verdict upon these questions, and no one can read this record without being convinced that court and counsel for all parties assumed from beginning to end of the trial that all the issues should be submitted to the jury, that they could bring in a general verdict thereon, and that their verdict was final.

When a case has been tried upon a well-defined theory, accepted by all parties and the court as well, counsel cannot after years have elapsed raise for the first time in this court the question of the correctness of this theory. Many cases announce such to be the general rule of practice. In most of them it is true the party appealing complained of some finding outside the issues, or of the reception of some evidence on some question not raised by the pleadings. But there seems to be no reason why the same rule should not apply where all parties have assumed that issues were to be tried by the jury, or have assumed and tried the case upon the theory that the jury's verdict was absolute and final rather than advisory. Lestrade v. Barth, 19 Cal. 660; Moore v. Copp, 119 Cal. 429, 51 Pac. 630. And in any event it does not appear from the record that findings were not waived, and nonwaiver thereof will not be presumed. Cushing-Wetmore Co. v. Gray, 152 Cal. 118, 92 Pac. 70, 125 Am. St. Rep. 47; Baker v. Baker, 139 Cal. 626, 73 Pac. 469; Leadbetter v. Lake, 118 Cal. 515, 50 Pac. 686; Tomlinson v. Ayres, 117 Cal. 568, 49 Pac. 717; Richardson v. Eureka, 110 Cal. 441, 42 Pac. 965; Kritzer v. Tracy, 16 Cal. App. 287, 116 Pac. 700.

The difference of view of counsel in this case was never as to whether court or jury should try the issues. It does not seem to have occurred to any of the eminent counsel in the case that all the issues should not be submitted to the jury. The difference between them was as to what the issues were—not as to who should try them. Counsel are bound by a theory in which they plainly acquiesced until the subsequent decision of cases in the Supreme Court of California, which the trial court did not at the time of the trial have as guides, indicated that this theory was incorrect. To reverse this case now upon such a contention would be a great injustice to the plaintiff.

[15] In addition to this it may be said that there was no seriously disputed issue of fact in this case requiring findings by the court. A recital of the issues made by the pleadings is instructive on this point. The plaintiff alleges that the defendants were trustees and owners of the property, and that the plaintiff was a municipal corporation empowered to condemn the property for certain specific public uses, that the object of this proceeding was to condemn the property for these uses, and further alleges the passage of a resolution determining the necessity for the acquisition of the property and the creation of a bonded indebtedness to bear the expenses of the condemnation, and that the same was not now devoted to public use, but was held and used for private purposes. None of these allegations of the complaint was seriously disputed, nor was any of them denied by defendants' final answer to plaintiff's amended complaint, and even if issues such as these had been made by the pleadings there was no evidence whatever upon which the court could predicate a finding that would stand in this court contradicting any of these allegations. The defendants in their turn allege their right of access to navigable water from their property. As we have seen, they had no such right. There is no dispute of the allegations of the defendants as to their improvements or as to certain leases and possession by the lessees. There was therefore no disputed issue of the class which defendants contend the court must try, and hence no necessity for findings.

The judgment and orders appealed from are affirmed.

NORTH PACIFIC S. S. CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION et al. (Civ. 2213.)

MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑417(4½) — WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT—REVIEW.

The statute, providing that a petition for writ of review of an award of the Industrial Commission must be made within 30 days of the award, must be regarded as a statute of limitations, and a petition made after that time will be dismissed.

Proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 279) by William T. Soley to obtain compensation for personal injuries, opposed by the North Pacific Steamship Company, employer. Compensation was awarded, and the employer applies for a writ of review. Writ dismissed.

Glensor & Clewe, of San Francisco, for petitioner. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondent Industrial Acc. Commission. Herbert N. Ellis, of San Diego, for respondent Soley.

PER CURIAM. Conceding that the record upon this application for a writ of review directed to the Industrial Accident Commission shows that the award of the commission on its face was beyond and in excess of the jurisdiction of the commission, nevertheless it also appears that the petition for the writ to this court was not made within the 30 days after the award of the commission as prescribed by the statute. That statute, we think, must be regarded as a statute of limitations in so far as the right of the petitioner to apply for the writ is concerned, and the application has not been made within the statutory time. We are compelled therefore to dismiss the writ, and that will be the order.

FOLSOM et al. v. MONROE. (S. F. 8304.)

BASTARDS ⟹100 — OMITTED CHILDREN — "HEIRS."

Within Civ. Code, § 1307, providing that when testator omits to provide in his will for any of his children, unless it appears such omission was intentional, the omitted children shall share in his estate as if he had died intestate, where a will gives all testator's property to his wife, stating that he does so because he knows that she will provide for their son C., and then provides that, should any other person or persons claim to be "heirs" of him, he gives to them $5, there is a provision for any illegitimate children, acknowledged in writing, and under section 1387 having right of inheritance, as, if his wife and the child mentioned should survive him no one else except some other children, or the issue of deceased children, could, under section 1386, be his heirs; and testator, being presumed to know the law, when speaking of persons claiming to be "heirs," must have had in mind only persons claiming to be children or their issue.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Heirs.]

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Wm. S. Wells, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of David Lindsay, deceased. From an adverse decree, Josephine Folsom and another appeal; C. A. Monroe, administrator with the will annexed of deceased, being the respondent. Affirmed.

Jos. P. Lucey and James G. Conlan, both of San Francisco, and Louis B. Diavila, of Oakland, for appellants. W. B. Rinehart and H. S. Craig, both of Oakland, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. David Lindsay died, leaving a will which contained the following provisions:

"First:—I give, devise and bequeath all my property, of every kind and nature, and wheresoever situated, to my wife, Permelia Lindsay.

* * * * * * * *

"Fourth:—I purposely bequeath all my property to my wife, Permelia Lindsay, knowing that she is a kind and loving mother and will provide for our son Clyde Lindsay.

"Fifth:—Should any other person or persons present themselves claiming to be heirs of mine, I give and bequeath to such person or persons the sum of five dollars ($5.00)."

The will was admitted to probate, and letters of administration with the will annexed were issued to C. A. Monroe. In due time the administrator filed his final account, with a petition for distribution. The appellants herein, Josephine Folsom and Louise Kamps, appeared, alleging that they were illegitimate children of the testator, and that he had, in his lifetime, made a written acknowledgment sufficient, by the terms of section 1387 of the Civil Code, to give them the rights of inheritance which they would have had if born in lawful wedlock. Their contention was that the testator had omitted in his will to provide for them, and that it did not appear that such omission was intentional. Accordingly, they claimed, under section 1307 of the Civil Code, to have succeeded to the same share of Lindsay's estate as if he had died intestate.

It was stipulated in the court below, for the purposes of the hearing, that said claimants were the illegitimate children of David Lindsay, and that he had made the written acknowledgment as asserted. The court concluded, however, that, by paragraph fifth of the will, the testator had made provision for them, and that they were not entitled to any part of the estate, except the sum of $5 each. A decree was made, distributing this sum to each of them, and the rest of the estate to the widow. The claimants appeal from this decree.

We think the court below took the right view. The case is, in its essence, not distinguishable from Estate of Hassell, 168 Cal. 287, 142 Pac. 838. There the testator had made a will which contained a provision for one of his children only. The will contained this clause: "Those of my heirs not herein mentioned has been omitted by me with full knowledge thereof." Three children, not named as beneficiaries in the will, sought to share in the testator's estate as pretermitted heirs. It was held that they were excluded by the clause above quoted. While recognizing that the right of children to share "in the inheritance of their immediate ancestors" will not be taken away unless the intent that they shall not so share clearly appears upon the face of the will (In re Stevens, 83 Cal. 322, 330, 23 Pac. 379, 17 Am. St. Rep. 252; Rhoton v. Blevin, 99 Cal. 645, 34 Pac. 513; In re Salmon, 107 Cal. 614, 40 Pac. 1030, 48 Am. St. Rep. 164) the court decided that the intent to exclude the complaining children did so appear. It was pointed out that the word "heirs" necessarily included children, and that the declaration that "heirs" not mentioned had been intentionally omitted conclusively showed that any children not named had been excluded by design.

Under section 1307 of the Civil Code, two conditions must concur to entitle a child to succeed as in case of intestacy. There must be an omission to provide for the child in the will, and the will must fail to show that the omission was intentional. In the Hassell Case there was no provision, but it appeared that the omission was intentional. Here there is a provision for any person claiming to be an heir. If the use of the general word "heirs" in Hassell's will was sufficient to show the intentional character of the failure to provide for the children not named, it must be equally operative to cover children in a clause bequeathing a legacy to any persons claiming to be heirs. The will showed that, at the time of its execution, the testator had a wife and one child. In the event that such wife and child should survive him, his heirs could not include any one else, except other children, or the issue of deceased children. Civ. Code, § 1386. It must be presumed that the testator knew the law, and when, therefore, he spoke of persons claiming to be heirs, he could have had in mind only such persons as might claim to be children or their issue. The will, read in the light of the law of succession, shows on its face that the testator had in mind the persons, or the very class of persons, here asserting a right to succeed to a portion of his estate. He did make provision for all such persons, and the appellants, accordingly, do not bring themselves within the terms of section 1307, which is operative only where the testator "omits to provide in his will for any of his children. * * *"

In Boman v. Boman, 49 Fed. 329, 1 C. C. A. 274, the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, in considering a somewhat similar question under a Washington statute, took the view that the word "heirs" was not to be given the effect attributed to it in the Hassell Case. But that decision cannot, of course, have controlling force as against the later ruling by our own court in a case arising under the statute of this state.

The decree is affirmed.

PRINGLE et al. v. FASSLER et al.
(S. F. 7570.)

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT 🔑230(1) — ACTIONS FOR RENT—PLEADING.

A complaint alleging execution of lease, that defendant took possession, has remained in possession, failed to pay rents due and that the same remain unpaid, sufficiently alleges that plaintiff had performed all conditions precedent, where there were no conditions in the lease, other than to deliver possession to the lessee, and enjoyment thereof by the lessee.

2. COSTS 🔑260(1) — APPEAL FOR DELAY—DAMAGES.

In an action involving rent money, where an appeal appeared to be solely for delay and vexation, the court will add to the costs under Code Civ. Proc. § 957, providing, in appeals for delay, the court may add such damages to the costs as may be just.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by S. J. Pringle and E. C. Pringle against Joseph Fassler and Thomas Horn. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant Joseph Fassler appeals. Affirmed.

Jas. P. Sweeney, of San Francisco, for appellant. James M. Shields, of San Francisco, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The defendant Joseph Fassler appealed from the judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, taken upon the default of the defendants. The action is to recover rents alleged to be due from the defendant Fassler to the plaintiffs, upon a lease executed by the plaintiffs to Fassler of certain property in San Francisco, and upon a bond executed by the two defendants to secure the rents accruing upon said lease. The complaint alleges the execution of the lease; that the defendant Fassler immediately went into possession of the property and has ever since remained in possession; that the defendant Fassler failed to pay the rents due upon the lease, amounting to $2,937.52 and that the same remain unpaid. A copy of the lease was made a part of the complaint, and is set forth in the record.

[1] The only point alleged in support of the appeal is that the complaint is insufficient in its statement of facts, because it does not allege that the plaintiff had performed all the conditions precedent imposed by the lease upon himself. There were no conditions precedent to be performed by the lessors in order to impose upon the lessee the obligation to pay the rent, except the delivery of possession of the property in pursuance of the lease, and the enjoyment thereof by the lessee during the time for which the rent sued for accrued. These conditions are specifically and expressly alleged.

[2] There is no merit whatever in the point presented, nor in the appeal. It could have had no object other than vexation and delay, and the case calls for the exercise of the power of this court to add to the costs such damages as may be just. Code Civ. Proc. § 957.

The judgment is affirmed, and it is ordered that the plaintiff recover of the defendant Fassler, as a part of the costs of appeal, the sum of $100.

GREEN v. FRAHM. (S. F. 7301.)

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT 🔑184(2) — BREACH OF LEASE—LIQUIDATED DAMAGES—VALIDITY OF CONTRACT.

Where the lessee deposited $3,000 to secure performance of the lease, and payment of the rent to be forfeited on default in any covenants of the lease, regardless of whether the deposit was liquidated damages or a penalty, the provision for forfeiture was void under Civ. Code, § 1670, as an attempt to fix by contract the amount of damage to be paid or other compensation to be made for breach of an obligation, unless it was shown that the damages could not easily have been ascertained.

2. DAMAGES 🔑163(3) — LIQUIDATED DAMAGES—WHEN VALID.

The difficulty of ascertaining damages where there is a provision for liquidated damages is not to be presumed.

3. LANDLORD AND TENANT 🔑184(2)—BREACH OF LEASE—LIQUIDATED DAMAGES—VALIDITY OF CONTRACT.

Where the lessee was required to deposit $3,000 to secure payment of rent, and he failed to pay, and the landlord secured possession of the premises and obtained judgment for the rent due, canceling the lease, the landlord was not entitled to retain the deposit, but he held it as bailee for the tenant.

4. Landlord and Tenant 🔑184(2)—Validity—Public Policy.

That the premises were leased to a lessee who intended to use them for immoral purposes, though contrary to public policy, did not establish that the action of the lessee to recover a deposit made to secure payment of the rent after a breach and cancellation of the lease could not be upheld, on the ground that it was against public policy.

5. Contracts 🔑138(3) — Validity — Public Policy.

Where a contract for an illegal purpose was abandoned, there could be recovery of the money deposited under the contract, provided that the recovery itself did not accomplish the illegal purpose or require a resort to the illegal portion thereof for its support.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action by L. M. Green against Henry Frahm. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying motion for new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Jos. E. O'Donnell and Costello & Costello, all of San Francisco (E. R. Hoerchner, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant. Jas. P. Sweeney and Jos. P. Lucey, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The defendant appeals from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, as assignee of Myer Cohn, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

The plaintiff sued to recover of the defendant the sum of $3,000, alleged to be due from the defendant to the plaintiff, upon the following facts:

On May 24, 1911, Frahm and Cohn executed an agreement whereby Frahm leased to Cohn for the term of ten years, beginning July 1, 1911, certain premises in San Francisco, and agreed to erect thereon for the use of Cohn a building according to the plans agreed upon between the parties within 90 days thereafter. If the building was not ready for occupancy until after that time, Cohn was to be released from the payment of the rent accruing prior to its completion. The rent for the first year was $500 a month, payable monthly in advance, and for subsequent years it was a larger sum. The controversy arises over the following clause in the lease. In copying it we substitute the name of the party for the phrases "party of the first part," and "party of the second part," where they occur:

"Cohn hereby deposits with Frahm the sum of $3,000, receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, said sum of $3,000 to be retained by Frahm as a guarantee that Cohn will pay the rent as herein provided, and in the manner herein specified, and will keep and perform each and every covenant herein contained to be performed by Cohn, and in the event of the failure of Cohn to pay the rent or to keep or perform any of the covenants herein contained to be performed by Cohn, then and in that event the said sum of $3,000 shall become forfeited unto Frahm. On the other hand, should Cohn pay the rent herein reserved, then and in that event the said sum of $3,000 shall be returned to Cohn at the end of the term hereinbefore created, or at any sooner determination thereof. Frahm agrees to pay Cohn 4 per cent. interest on the sum of $3,000 to be paid annually."

Another clause provided that in case of any termination of the lease through no fault or neglect of Cohn, then the $3,000 reserved should be repaid to him, with interest.

The building was not finished until December, 1911. Thereupon possession was delivered to Cohn, and he paid one month's rent upon the lease, which was accepted as payment of rent up to the 1st day of February, 1912. Cohn refused to pay rent for the following month. Frahm instituted proceedings in unlawful detainer against him, wherein, on March 1, 1912, judgment was given in his favor for the restitution of the premises, for $500 rent, and for the cancellation of the lease. In pursuance of said judgment, Frahm was immediately put in possession of the property. Cohn thereupon assigned his claim to the plaintiff herein, who began this action against Frahm to recover the $3,000, which, in pursuance of the terms of said lease, had been deposited by Cohn with Frahm at the time of the execution thereof. The defendant in his answer denied the assignment of the claim from Cohn to Green, and the indebtedness alleged. For an affirmative defense he averred that although the lease provided that the building was to be used solely for a lodging house, in reality it was intended to be used by Cohn as a house of prostitution, and that this intent was known to and consented to by Frahm.

The court found in favor of the plaintiff, and particularly, that while the building to be erected by Frahm for the use of Cohn was ostensibly to be used as a lodging house, in reality it was intended to be used by Cohn as a house of prostitution "with the knowledge and consent of the defendant," but that in fact the said premises never were used for that purpose, or for any immoral or illegal purpose, and that the intention to use the same in that manner was abandoned by Cohn, and was never consummated.

1. The contention that the evidence does not support the finding that the demand of Cohn against Frahm was assigned to Green before the beginning of the action is without merit. The assignment itself was introduced in evidence, and its execution proven.

[1, 2] 2. The first paragraph of the above-quoted provisions of the lease naturally divides itself into two parts: One, a provision that the $3,000 deposit with Frahm was to be a guarantee for the performance by Cohn of the covenants of the lease, including the payment of rents; the other, that in the event of the failure of Cohn to perform any of said covenants, the said money should become forfeited to Frahm. The provision for a forfeiture upon the failure of Cohn to pay the rent was either a penalty or a provision that the $3,000 should be liquidated damages for the breach of the covenants. In either aspect, the provision was void. Whether as liquidated damages, or as a penalty, it comes within the terms of section 1670 of the Civil Code, that is, it is an attempt to fix by contract "the amount of damage to be paid, or other compensation to be made, for a breach of an obligation," in anticipation thereof, and by that section it is declared to be void, unless the case is of such a nature that "it would be impracticable or extremely difficult to fix the actual damage," as provided in section 1671 of the Civil Code. Jack v. Sinsheimer, 125 Cal. 563, 58 Pac. 130. Calling it a penalty instead of liquidated damages does not change its nature. The case cited also declares that the fixing of damages for breach of an obligation to pay rent is not impracticable or extremely difficult. There was no evidence in the case showing any peculiar circumstance which would make such damages more difficult to fix in this case than in the ordinary case. Such difficulty is not to be presumed. Long Beach v. Dodge, 135 Cal. 404, 67 Pac. 499. This part of the clause must therefore be treated as a void provision, and disregarded entirely.

[3] The other part of the clause, providing for the deposit of $3,000 as a guarantee for the payment of rent, was for a legal purpose, and was in all respects valid and enforceable. In virtue of that clause, Frahm had the legal right, in case of the failure of Cohn to pay rent, to retain the $3,000 and apply it on the rent until the same was exhausted. He did not choose to do this, but on the contrary, he immediately began proceedings for the restitution of the premises, and the recovery of the rent due, and succeeded in obtaining judgment for both, and also for the cancellation of the lease. He is, of course, bound by his own judgment, and therefore the lease must be considered as having been terminated on March 1, 1912. The complaint alleged that Frahm refused to return any portion of the $3,000 to Cohn, or to apply any portion thereof to the rent due. The answer admits this to be true, and alleges that by the terms of the contract it was to be retained by Frahm as a guarantee for the payment of the rent, as it came due. Frahm did not ask that he be allowed to retain $500 of the money in satisfaction of his judgment for rent. He defended on the ground that the whole sum had become absolutely forfeited to his use and was his own property, by reason of the failure of Cohn to pay the rent, and notwithstanding the early termination of the lease at his own request. Under these circumstances, the conduct of Frahm must be deemed to be a repudiation of the security and a waiver of the right to retain the $3,000 as security for the payment of rent subsequently accruing, and of his right to apply any portion thereof to the rent due. The fund deposited is therefore to be considered as money held by Frahm, as bailee, for the use of Cohn, and due demand having been made for its return, the plaintiff was entitled to recover it.

[4, 5] 3. The defense sought to be made on the ground of illegality was not established. In the first place, the plaintiff is not suing on any contract embodied in the lease. His right of action arises from the termination of the lease, whereby the purpose for which his money was deposited was defeated and he has become entitled to its return. Frahm, being only a bailee, held the fund in trust for Cohn for the purposes stated in the lease, and when the trust ceased the title and right to the money reverted to the original owner, Cohn. The asserted illegality was in the lease, not in the rights growing out of its premature termination by the judgment. The doctrine that one cannot recover upon a contract that is against public policy does not apply. In the second place, the alleged illegal purpose was never accomplished, but was abandoned, and the contract therefor, assuming that there was one, was never executed. In such cases there may be a recovery on the contract, provided such recovery does not, of itself, accomplish the illegal purpose, or require a resort to the illegal part of the contract for its support. De Leonis v. Walsh, 140 Cal. 182, 73 Pac. 813; Wassermann v. Sloss, 117 Cal. 431, 49 Pac. 566, 38 L. R. A. 176, 59 Am. St. Rep. 209; Johnston v. Russell, 37 Cal. 670; Teachout v. Bogy, 166 Pac. 321, 322. We are not to be understood as holding that there was any contract to use the leased property for immoral purposes. The lease expresses no such contract, and all the court finds is that Cohn intended to so use it, and that said intent was "with the knowledge and consent of the defendant." But as the intent was abandoned before its execution was begun, we need not discuss the question further.

CRAYCROFT v. McSWAIN.

(S. F. 8138.)

1. Guardian and Ward 🔑10—Nomination of Guardian by Ward—Duty of Court.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1748, providing that if the minor is 14 years of age he may nominate his own guardian, which, if approved by the court, must be appointed, where a child over 16 years of age nominated a guardian of her person and estate, and the court approved the nomination, the appointment of the nominee as guardian of the estate was imperative.

2. Appeal and Error 🔑781(2) — Moot Questions.

Where after the appeal from the order appointing a guardian and before it was submitted the child became of age, whether the order was properly made is a moot question, which will not be considered.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; George E. Church, Judge.

In the matter of the guardianship of the estate of Annie Irene McSwain, a minor. From an order appointing Harry J. Craycroft as guardian of the estate and person of said minor over 16 years of age, Susie McSwain, the mother of the child, appeals. Appeal dismissed, without costs.

See, also, 168 Pac. 117.

Short & Sutherland, of Fresno (Carl E. Lindsay, of Fresno, of counsel), for appellant. Everts & Ewing, of Fresno, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Harry J. Craycroft filed a petition for letters of guardianship of the estate and person of Annie Irene McSwain, a minor then over the age of 16 years. The application was opposed by Susie McSwain, the mother of the child. The court overruled the objections and made the appointment as prayed for. From this order, the mother appeals.

[1] There is no dispute in this court, and there was none in the court below, as to the propriety of the order appointing a guardian of the estate of the minor. She was the owner of an undivided one-half interest in property of the value of some $30,000, which required the attention of a guardian and made such appointment proper, if not necessary. Being over 16 years of age, the minor had the right to nominate her guardian, and such nominee, if approved by the court, must be appointed. Code Civ. Proc. § 1748. The minor nominated Craycroft to be the guardian of her person and estate, and the court approved the nomination. His appointment as guardian of the estate was therefore imperative. In re Kirkman, 168 Cal. 688, 144 Pac. 745; Estate of Meiklejohn, 171 Cal. 247, 152 Pac. 734.

The only objection here made is that there was no showing, either in the petition or in the evidence, to the effect that the mother was not a suitable and fit person to have the care and custody of the child's person during her minority, and hence that it does not appear that it was either necessary or convenient that a guardian of the person should be appointed. Section 1747 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that the superior court, "when it appears necessary or convenient, may appoint guardians for the persons and estates, or either of them, of minors who have no guardian legally appointed by will or deed, and who are inhabitants or residents of the county, or who reside without the state and have estate within the county." The child had left her mother and gone to reside with another person. The mother was not an unfit person to have the custody of the child, and the child had requested the appointment of Craycroft. It is not contended that the person with whom she was living was an unfit person for her to associate with. No other facts appeared relating to the subject.

[2] We do not deem it necessary to decide the question thus presented. After the appeal was taken on the order, and before it was submitted, the child became of age, and the guardianship, and the right to guardianship, of her person terminated. It is not claimed that any prejudice has been suffered by any one by reason of the fact that the order included the guardianship of her person as well as of the estate. The question whether the order was properly made or not is of no further importance. It is a moot question which the court will not take time to consider. To avoid any hardship to anybody we deem it proper to refuse any allowance for the costs of appeal. The proper proceeding in such a case is to dismiss the appeal.

It is ordered that the appeal be dismissed, and that neither party recover costs on appeal.

In re McSWAIN'S ESTATE.

McSWAIN v. CRAYCROFT et al.

(S. F. 8178.)

1. Executors and Administrators 🔑194(2) — Allowance for Support — Common-Law Rule.

At common law a court had no power to direct the payment of money out of the estate of a deceased person for the support and education of his family to the exclusion of his creditors or heirs at law.

2. Executors and Administrators 🔑180—Allowance for Support—Who Entitled.

Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1465, 1466, were enacted to make provision for the family of deceased prior to distribution, and no one who is not a member of family at the death of decedent is entitled to an allowance for maintenance and support.

3. Executors and Administrators 🔑180—Family Allowance—Statute—Construction—"Family."

Code Civ. Proc. § 1465, providing that the court may "set apart for the use of the surviving husband or wife, or, in case of his or her death, to the minor children of the decedent, all the property exempt from execution, including the homestead selected, designated and recorded," and if no proper homestead has been selected the court must set apart "a homestead for the use of the surviving husband or wife and the minor children; or if there be no surviving husband or wife, then for the use of the minor children," and section 1466, providing that "if the property set apart is insufficient for the support of the widow and children, or either, the court or a judge thereof must take such reasonable allowance out of the estate as shall be necessary for the maintenance of the family, according to their circumstances, during the progress of the settlement of the estate," should be construed together; and, when so construed, it is obvious that the "family" referred to in the latter section consists of the same persons as those expressly mentioned in the first; that is, the surviving husband or wife, if any, and the minor children, if any, of the decedent.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Family.]

4. Executors and Administrators 🔑196—Allowance Pending Administration—Separate Allowance to Child.

Where the court had made an allowance of $200 a month to the widow for the support and maintenance of the family, it was improper to make an additional allowance for the child, unless the widow was not applying the same for the benefit of the child; the mother under all ordinary circumstances being the proper person to receive the allowance and supervise its expenditure.

5. Executors and Administrators 🔑196—Allowance Pending Administration—Separate Allowance to Child.

Where an allowance presumably sufficient had been made to the widow for the support of the family, if the minor daughter left the family home and went to live with others without cause, the persons with whom she lived or her guardian would have to look to the mother for the support of the child, and would not be entitled to an allowance by the court out of the estate for that purpose, at all events not unless the mother was at fault in the matter.

6. Executors and Administrators 🔑180—Family Allowance—Presumption.

In the absence of evidence to the contrary, the presumption would be that the widow was the proper person to receive the family allowance, and that she would be entitled to have the care, custody, and education of her child.

7. Executors and Administrators 🔑194(5)—Family Allowance—Evidence Admissible.

On an application by the guardian for a separate allowance for the child, it was wrong for the court to refuse to allow the widow, to whom a family allowance had been made, to testify that she was willing and able to properly support the child.

8. Executors and Administrators 🔑194(1)—Family Allowance—Province of Court.

It is not within the province of the probate court to determine that the parent of the child, who is a fit person to control its custody and education, is not educating such child so as to fit it for a calling for which the court may believe it has a natural talent; the court in the administration of an estate not being empowered to substitute its judgment for that of the parent on such matters.

9. Executors and Administrators 🔑196—Family Allowance—Province of Court.

The court had no power to direct the payment of an additional allowance to the aunt of the child, without proof that the mother was unfit to care for the child or that she was neglecting her duty in that regard.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Geo. E. Church, Judge.

In the Matter of the Estate of Walter S. McSwain, deceased. From an order directing the payment by Susie McSwain, administratrix, out of the funds of said estate, of the sum of $125 each month for the maintenance and education and support of Annie I. McSwain during her minority or until the administration was closed, Susie McSwain appeals. Order reversed.

See, also, 168 Pac. 117.

Frank Kauke, of Fresno, for appellant. Everts & Ewing, of Fresno (M. G. Gallaher, of Fresno, of counsel), for respondents.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal by Susie McSwain, as the administratrix of the estate of Walter S. McSwain, and also as the widow and heir at law of said deceased, from an order made by the superior court in the course of administration of said estate, directing the payment, by said administratrix out of the funds of said estate, of the sum of $125 each month for the maintenance, education, and support of Annie I. McSwain during her minority or until the said administration was closed.

Walter S. McSwain died intestate on December 6, 1915, leaving surviving as his only heirs at law his widow, Susie McSwain, and his daughter, Annie I. McSwain, then above the age of 16 years. Prior to his death he and his wife and daughter were living together as a family in his home in Fresno. On January 5, 1916, Susie McSwain duly qualified, and has ever since been acting as the administratrix of said estate. The property of the estate has been appraised at the value of over $39,000. On February 28, 1916, the court duly made an order setting apart to Susie McSwain, as surviving wife of said deceased, the personal property exempt from execution, and directing a family allowance to her in the sum of $200 per month out of said estate, for the support and maintenance of the family of said deceased during the administration of said estate.

On November 23, 1916, the court made an order appointing Harry J. Craycroft guardian of the person and estate of Annie I. McSwain. On December 5, 1916, Susie McSwain duly appealed from said order. On December 1, 1916, Craycroft, as such guardian, filed the petition upon which the order herein appealed from was made, asking an allowance out of the estate of the decedent to be paid to him for the maintenance, support, and education of said minor, in the sum of $125 a month during the pendency of the administration.

The only grounds upon which Craycroft based his petition for an allowance were that soon after the death of the decedent, said child began to reside with her aunt, Mrs. Thorne, and had not received any money from said estate, but had been maintained and supported by said aunt; that the child was contemplating a course in a conservatory of music, and that the petitioner intended to have her enter the same; that it would be necessary to have the sum of money asked, to defray the expenses thereof, and maintain and support her, and that the administratrix had contributed nothing out of said estate to the maintenance and support of said child, and refused to do so.

Susie McSwain, in her triple capacity as administratrix of said estate, as surviving wife, and as heir of said deceased, filed an answer opposing the petition for an allowance to Annie I. McSwain. She alleged that she was the mother of said Annie I. McSwain, and had ever since the death of said decedent maintained a good and sufficient home for her, and was during all of said time, and ever since has been ready, able and willing to care for, maintain, and support said child, in a fit and proper manner, in accordance with her station in life, and to provide for and educate her, and had repeatedly sought and requested that she be permitted to do so.

A few weeks after the death of her father the child, without good cause, so far as appears, went to live with her aunt, and has ever since resided there. There is no pretense that the mother is not a wholly fit and proper person to have the care, custody, and education of her child. There was evidence to the effect that the sum of money allowed would be necessary for the expenses of her proposed musical education and for her support, and that the administratrix had paid nothing to the child or to Mrs. Thorne towards such support or education. Upon the trial the widow testified that she had the home in which she, her husband and child, had been living prior to his death, and had been maintaining it ever since that time. She then offered to prove that she was able and willing to provide for her daughter and educate her, and that she was still keeping up the home. The respondent objected to this proof, on the ground that it was immaterial and irrelevant. The court sustained the objection, and refused to allow any evidence to that effect. Thereupon it made the order appealed from.

[1] At common law the court had no power to direct the payment of money out of the estate of a deceased person for the support and education of his family, to the exclusion of his creditors or heirs at law. Such power to do so as the court now has comes entirely from the statute. Estate of Noah, 73 Cal. 588, 15 Pac. 287, 2 Am. St. Rep. 829; Estate of Heywood, 149 Cal. 130, 84 Pac. 834. On this subject Mr. Woerner says:

> "The common law secures to the widow her dower, and to the widow and children their pars rationalibus (corresponding to dower and distribution under American statutes), but no provision whatever is found therein to meet the exigencies arising immediately upon the death of the head of the family, save, perhaps, the clause in Magna Charta securing to the widow the right to remain in her husband's capital mansion for 40 days after his death, within which time her dower was to be assigned."

Our statute provides that the court may "set apart for the use of the surviving husband or wife, or, in case of his or her death, to the minor children of the decedent, all the property exempt from execution, including the homestead selected, designated and recorded," and that if no proper homestead has been selected, then the court must set apart "a homestead for the use of the surviving husband or wife and the minor children, or if there be no surviving husband or wife, then for the use of the minor children" (Code Civ. Proc. § 1465); and, further, that:

> "If the property set apart is insufficient for the support of the widow and children, or either, the court, or a judge thereof must take such reasonable allowance out of the estate as shall be necessary for the maintenance of the family, according to their circumstances, during the progress of the settlement of the estate." Code Civ. Proc. § 1466.

[2, 3] These statutes were enacted in order to make a provision for the family of the deceased prior to the time when the estate could be finally distributed to them. No one who is not a member of such family at the time of the death of the decedent is entitled to any allowance from the estate for support or maintenance. It is well settled that a surviving widow who had separated from her husband and had ceased to be a member of his family, or to be entitled to his support at the time of his death, is not entitled to an allowance as a member of the family under these provisions. In re Noah, supra; Wickersham v. Comerford, 96 Cal. 438, 31 Pac. 358; Estate of Yoell, 164 Cal. 540, 129 Pac. 999. So, also, the authorities declare that adult children who had left the family home and were providing for themselves at the death of the decedent are entitled to no support out of the estate, pending administration. Wood v. Wood, 63 Conn. 327, 28 Atl. 520; Weber v. Short, 55 Ala. 311; Hoffman v. Neuhaus, 30 Tex. 633, 98 Am. Dec. 492. And a child who was a minor at the death of the decedent cannot have a probate homestead set apart out of his estate if the application is made after she arrives of age. Estate of Heywood, supra. The reason of the decision in the Heywood Case was that the statute makes provision only for minor children, and has no application to those who have become of age, and that the daughter in that case waived her right to the homestead by failing to apply therefor during her minority. Sections 1465 and 1466 relate to the same subject. The latter obviously refers to the conditions described in the former. They should be construed together, and, so construed, it is obvious that the family referred to in the latter section consists of the same persons as those expressly mentioned in the former section, that is, the surviving husband and wife, if any, and the minor children, if any, of the decedent.

[4] Prior to the application of Craycroft, the court had made an allowance of $200 a month to the widow for the support and maintenance of the family. This would include the daughter, in whose behalf the present application is made. Unless there were circumstances which required an additional allowance to be made expressly for the child, as, for example, if the widow was not properly applying the same for the benefit of the child, the court should not make a separate allowance, but should require the child to be supported out of the allowance already made. Under all ordinary circumstances, the mother, as the head of the family, would be the proper person to receive the allowance and to supervise its expenditure. It was said in Estate of Moore, 72 Cal. 342, 13 Pac. 883:

> "It must be, however, in the power of the court to direct the expenditure of the allowance in such manner as will insure the maintenance of the family, and it may happen in some cases that the mother would not be a suitable person to be intrusted with it."

In that case a family allowance of $250 a month had been made for the support of the widow and five minor children of the decedent. Afterward the widow and one child left the home of the decedent, in which the family had been living, and there was a dispute over the question whether she had done so voluntarily, or had been forcibly excluded therefrom by other persons interfering in behalf of the other children. Believing that she had done so voluntarily, the administrator thereafter refused to pay her more than $50 per month of the allowance, and had expended money of the estate in the maintenance of the other children who had remained in the homestead. The widow offered to prove that she had been expelled forcibly, and that she was ready and willing to care for, educate, and support all the children. The court below refused to permit this testimony, and allowed the administrator for the expenses incurred by him in supporting the other children separate and apart from the mother. The court said:

> "The administrator does not, however, by virtue of his office, become charged with the care of the family, and had no right, arbitrarily, to remove the children from the mother. Nor were the disbursements here in question proper charges against the estate."

It was held that the evidence excluded was material and proper, and should have been admitted, but that if, upon investigation, the conduct of the administrator was justifiable, and his expenditures for the other members of the family necessary, a reasonable allowance could be made for the support of that portion of the family.

[5-7] This decision seems to be applicable to the case in hand. An allowance of $200 a month, presumably sufficient, was made to the widow for the support of the family. If the minor daughter left the family home and went to live with others, without cause, the persons with whom she lived, or her guardian, if some one other than her mother were appointed guardian, would have to look to the mother for the support of the child, and would not be entitled to an allowance by the court out of the estate, for that purpose, at all events not unless the mother was at fault in the matter. In the absence of evidence to the contrary, the presumption would be that the widow was the proper person to receive the family allowance, and that, as the parent, she would be entitled to have the care, custody, and education of her child. She is by law charged with that duty. There was nothing to indicate, in fact no assertion, that she was not in all respects competent, fit, and worthy. It would not be necessary for her to prove the fact, for it would be presumed in the absence of evidence. It was clearly wrong for the court to refuse to allow her to testify that she was able and willing to support her child as she, in her discretion, believed was proper and necessary.

[8] It is not within the province of the probate court to determine that the parent of a child, who is a fit person to control its custody and education, is not educating such child so as to fit it for a calling for which the court may believe it has a natural talent. The probate court, in the administration of an estate, is not empowered to substitute its judgment for that of the parent on such matters.

[9] Upon like grounds it must be considered that the court had no power to direct the payment of an additional allowance to the aunt of the child, without proof that the mother was unfit to care for her child, or that she was neglecting her duty in that regard. And if all this was shown, and the allowance already made was sufficient, in view of the condition of the estate, the needs of the parties, and their station in life, the court should not have made an additional allowance, but should have directed that a part of the allowance already made should be applied to the benefit of the daughter.

The order is reversed.

BECKLEY v. THE TOPO et al. (S. F. 7482.)

1. Master and Servant 🔑289(36)—Injury—Contributory Negligence—Evidence.

Evidence in a servant's action for injury in fastening a boom to a mast held to support finding that his injury was caused by his contributory negligence.

2. Appeal and Error 🔑867(1) — Appeal from Denial of New Trial — Questions Reviewable.

The point that findings are contradictory and conflicting, and so do not support the judgment, cannot be raised on appeal from denial of new trial, but only on appeal from judgment.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thos. F. Graham, Judge.

Action by H. O. Beckley against the gasoline steamer Topo, and another. From an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

H. W. Hutton, of San Francisco (Edward Lande, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant. Wright, Wright & Stetson, of San Francisco, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The plaintiff has appealed from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The object of the action was to recover damages sustained by the plaintiff from a personal injury alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendants. The answers alleged facts showing that the plaintiff was himself guilty of negligence, and that his injury was at least proximately caused by his own negligence. They also alleged directly that the injury was caused in part by the contributory negligence of the plaintiff. The court below found in favor of the defendant upon the issue of contributory negligence, and rendered judgment accordingly.

The plaintiff was the mate of the steamer Topo, employed as such by its owners, the Bay Development Company. The vessel was not yet completed by the builders, but was ready for its trial trip, and the owner was in charge for that purpose. Upon the deck, lengthwise of the vessel, lay a boom, a timber 57 feet long, weighing about 1,800 pounds. The forward end rested upon the forecastle, and the after end upon a plank extending across the vessel from side to side; each end resting upon the side rail of the vessel, and supported in the middle upon a bulkhead. The plank was about 4½ feet above the deck of the vessel. The plaintiff was engaged in preparing to fasten this boom to the mast. The after end of the boom lay about the middle of the vessel, and it was necessary that it should be moved over near to the rail on one side thereof. The plaintiff and three other men at his command undertook to slide the boom along the plank to the side of the vessel. The boom, being very heavy, did not slide along the plank easily, and the friction was so great that it carried the plank with it, until one end slipped off the supporting rail at one side and off the bulkhead in the center, causing the boom to fall upon the plaintiff, whereby he was injured in the manner complained of. The day before the accident plaintiff was on the vessel, and his attention was called to the fact that the boom should be fastened, so that it would not slip. For that purpose the builders bored two holes through the plank, one on each end, just inside the rail of the vessel, so that a bolt could be slipped through the hole and project down through the plank below the tops of the respective railings, and thus prevent the plank from slipping in either direction. After boring the holes, the bolts to be slipped through them were procured and laid upon the deck of the vessel, ready for insertion in the holes at any time. This occurred the day before the injury. The plaintiff knew of this preparation; but, so far as appears, he was not informed that the bolts had not been inserted in the holes, or that they lay upon the deck of the vessel ready to be so inserted. He testified, however, that he knew that the plank should be in some manner fastened so as to prevent its slipping from side to side. The evidence shows that, when they began pushing the boom toward one side of the vessel, one of the men assisting the plaintiff called to him that the plank was slipping, to which plaintiff paid no attention. Another push was given to the boom, and the man again called to him that the plank was slipping, and to this also he paid no attention, but proceeded to push a third and fourth time, with the result that the plank slipped off the railing and his injury resulted.

[1] That this evidence supports the finding of the court that the plaintiff's injury was caused by his contributory negligence is a proposition that is so obvious that argument is unnecessary. The order denying the new trial is sufficiently supported by this finding. Inasmuch as the plaintiff's injury was caused by his own negligence contributing thereto, he is not entitled to recover of the defendants, although they also may have been negligent in the matter either of furnishing a safe place for the plaintiff to work, or of seeing that the appliances furnished him were suitable and proper for that purpose, and in a safe condition for use.

[2] Plaintiff also argues that the findings are contradictory and conflicting, and that for that reason they do not support the judgment. This is a question that can be raised only upon an appeal upon the judgment. It cannot be decided upon appeal from an order denying a new trial. Hunter v. Milam, 133 Cal. 601, 65 Pac. 1079; Durfee v. Seale, 139 Cal. 603, 73 Pac. 435; Holmes v. Warren, 145 Cal. 457, 78 Pac. 954; Green v. Duvergey, 146 Cal. 384, 80 Pac. 234.

The appellant also contends that other findings are not supported by the evidence. We find it unnecessary to consider these questions, for, if the finding above mentioned is sustained, as it unquestionably is, there could be no recovery by the plaintiff in any event.

The order is affirmed.

EVARTS v. WEISE. (S. F. 8466.)

1. ELECTIONS 🔑305(6)—CONTESTS—APPEAL—PRESUMPTIONS—CUSTODY OF BALLOTS.

In an election contest where the ballots were counted in court, and the contrary does not appear in the record, it will be presumed that they were thereafter placed in custody of the clerk, and the contestant had the burden of showing the contrary, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 15, making it a rebuttable presumption that an official duty has been regularly performed.

2. ELECTIONS 🔑299(1)—CONTESTS—POWERS OF COURT—RECOUNT.

If the trial court hearing an election contest is not satisfied with a count of the ballots before it, it may order that such ballots be again counted before it.

3. ELECTIONS 🔑194(11)—BALLOTS—DISTINGUISHING MARKS.

Where marks upon ballots might have been made with a defective stamp furnished by the election board, the impression being slightly smeared or indistinct, but clearly showing the choice of the voter, the ballots should be counted, and could not be rejected, as containing a distinguishing mark, in view of Pol. Code, § 1211, subd. 4, providing that no mark upon a ballot which is unauthorized by this act shall be held to invalidate such ballot, unless it shall appear that such mark was placed thereon by the voter for the purpose of identifying such ballot.

4. ELECTIONS 🔑194(10)—BALLOTS—DISTINGUISHING MARKS.

Where a ballot indicated that the voter had stamped the cross in the proper space and in folding the ballot had caused an offset in the form of half a cross, the vote could not be rejected as bearing a distinguishing mark.

5. ELECTIONS 🔑180(4) — BALLOTS — REJECTION.

A ballot containing a cross distinctly stamped in the space after the names of two candidates for the same office was properly rejected.

6. ELECTIONS 🔑180(4) — BALLOTS — REJECTION.

That a ballot contained a distinct impression of a stamped cross opposite the name of one candidate, and a slight impression after the name of another for the same office, which the crease in the ballot showed could have been made by folding the ballot so as to cause an offset, the ballot was properly counted according to the distinct mark.

7. ELECTIONS 🔑194(6) — BALLOTS — DISTINGUISHING MARKS.

A ballot could not be rejected merely because it contained a cross in the name space and in the voting space, in the absence of showing that the two marks were intended as identifying the ballot.

8. ELECTIONS 🔑305(8)—CONTESTS—COUNT OF BALLOTS—ERROR—OFFSET.

Where the refusal of the court to count a ballot for contestant was offset by its refusal to count a ballot identically marked for contestee, possible error in refusal to count the ballots need not be considered.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Emmet Seawell, Judge.

Election contest by William Evarts against J. H. Weise. From the judgment rendered, Evarts appealed to the District Court of Appeal, which affirmed the judgment. On rehearing in Supreme Court. Affirmed.

The following is the opinion of Hart, J., in the District Court of Appeal (concurred in by Chipman, P. J., and Burnett, J.):

Evarts and Weise were rival candidates for the office of supervisor for the First supervisorial district of Sonoma county at the general election held in the month of November, 1916. The board of supervisors of said county, acting as a canvassing board, upon canvassing the returns, ascertained that Weise had received 1,286 votes and Evarts 1,281 votes at said election for said office, and thereupon and accordingly officially declared that the former had been elected thereto, and issued to him a certificate of election. The appellant thereupon instituted this action for the purpose of contesting the purported election of the respondent and, upon a trial thereof, in which a recount of the ballots was had, the trial court rendered judgment that the contestant and contestee each received at the election an equal and the highest number of legal votes cast thereat for supervisor for said supervisorial district, "and that the contestant take nothing by his action and proceeding, and the same is hereby dismissed, and each party hereto is directed to pay his own costs herein incurred."

This appeal is by Evarts from said judgment, his general contention being that the court erroneously rejected certain ballots which should properly have been counted for him, and that certain ballots which should have been rejected were likewise ordered counted for Weise. Evarts further contends that the court committed error and transcended its jurisdiction in again canvassing the returns and counting the ballots of a certain precinct after a count thereof had already once been had at the trial.

It is deemed the more orderly, although not in the order in which the alleged error involved therein occurred at the trial, first to consider the point last above stated. After the canvassing of the returns and the counting of the ballots had been completed, whereby it was made to appear that Evarts had received 1,286 and Weise 1,284 votes, thus showing that the former had received the highest number of votes and had therefore been elected, Mr. Early, of counsel for the respondent (Weise), addressing the court, called attention to the fact that, in counting the ballots of Elmore precinct before the court on the preceding day, "Weise went from 71 to 69, and Mr. Evarts went from 101 to 103, and that that must have been due to some irregularity in the count here. We have had a great amount of doubt about it. It is a small precinct. We are all here now. We would feel better if we could go through and count it again." The court thereupon declared that "if there is any doubt about the count, bring them [the ballots] in, and we will count them again." After considerable discussion over the objections of counsel for Evarts against a recount of said ballots, the court overruled said objections, and ordered and caused the ballots of said precinct to be recounted, the result being the same as was shown by the original count before the court. On the following morning the court ordered another recount of the ballots of said precinct. The result of the last recount disclosed that Evarts had received 101, instead of 103, as shown by the previous counts, and Weise 71, in lieu of 69, as likewise shown. The specific objections to the recounting of said ballots were: That said ballots "are not sealed in the original sealed package; that they have been open since being officially counted, and out from under the jurisdiction of the court; that there was no objection to the registering of that vote as shown by the official count, and that all of the objections to this official count were made after the count has been made and accepted by the attorneys for the plaintiff and the defendant without any objection on the part of either."

[1] So far as the record shows to the contrary, the contestant made no attempt to support the objection that the ballots recounted were not resealed immediately after they were first counted in court, or that they were in any manner tampered with after that event. Necessarily, in order to count them in this proceeding, the ballots had to be removed from their original sealed package; and so, having necessarily been made a part of the record of the contest, presumptively they were, after being counted in court, committed to the custody of the clerk of the court, where then they properly belonged, and presumptively that officer properly safeguarded and preserved them intact, or in the same condition in which they were found by the court when first taken out of their sealed package to be counted in this proceeding. Section 1963, subd. 15, Code Civ. Proc. The appellant having objected to the recounting of the ballots on the ground stated, the burden was upon him to dispel such presumptions. He made no attempt to do so.

[2] Counsel have directed our attention to no law, legislative or judicial, which interdicts the counting of ballots in an election contest before a court after such ballots have therein once before been counted. We can perceive no objection to such a procedure. If the trial court by which the contest is heard is not satisfied with a count of the ballots before it, we can see no reason why it may not cause such ballots to be again counted so as to satisfy itself that there has been made before it no mistake in the counting. In this case the original and second counts of the ballots of Elmore precinct disclosed a discrepancy between those counts and the result of the canvass of the board of supervisors as against Weise and in favor of Evarts, the former losing 2 and the latter gaining a like number of votes as against the result shown in each case by the official count by the board of supervisors. The court was authorized to make such an investigation as would satisfy and convince it of either one of the two propositions suggested by the situation so presented, viz.: Whether, in counting the Elmore votes, a mistake had been made by the court, or whether, in totaling the returns from said precinct, the supervisors had made a mistake whereby Weise had been given more and Evarts fewer votes than each was entitled to.

The ballots, the counting or rejection of which constitutes the general ground of the several specific objections pressed upon us by the appellant, are classified into three groups, and are so considered in the briefs. We find it convenient to follow that course in our review of the objections to said ballots.

Group No. 1.

[3] This group consists of five ballots which contain a cross in the proper space opposite the name of the candidate appearing on the said ballots voted for by the persons casting the ballots. Three of these ballots were ordered by the court to be counted for Weise and 2 for Evarts, and the ground of objection to all of them was the same, to wit: That the mark in the square opposite the name of the supervisorial candidate so sought to be voted for was not made with the voting stamp provided by law. These objections were made by both the contestant and contestee; that is to say, where the mark was placed in the space opposite the name of Weise, the contestant objected to the ballot, and where made in the space opposite the name of Evarts, the contestee objected. We cannot say that the court erred in ordering the said ballots to be counted as indicated. The ballots are marked with a cross, but the cross is larger than that which is made by the stamp ordinarily seen in use at elections. In nearly every instance, the cross on the ballots objected to appears as though it might have been made with the blunt end of some article, as the butt end of a pencil or penholder, and the ink is more or less smeared in the voting space. Yet we cannot say, from the mere appearance of the ballots, and in the absence of evidence de hors the ballots themselves, showing or tending to show by what means the marks were made, that said marks or crosses were not produced by means of a stamp furnished by the officers charged with the duty of furnishing voting stamps and other supplies necessary to be used in election booths at elections. Pol. Code, § 1205. There is no evidence in the record disclosing the size or character of the stamps used in the several precincts in which the ballots in question were cast. So far as we are otherwise advised by the record, the stamp actually furnished by said officers and used in marking each of said ballots might have been larger than the stamp which we may assume is usually put to such a use; and it may be, so far as we can know or say to the contrary, there being no evidence as to the kind of stamps, if any, used in marking these ballots, that such stamps were old and had been worn down from use so that smooth and unbesmeared impressions could not be produced by them. At any rate, as stated, the mark made in the spaces of the ballots is plainly a cross, and we do not see how we can say on the record as it appears before us that it was not made with a voting stamp regularly furnished by the proper officer to be used in the booth by the voters for the purpose of marking their ballots. Nor can we hold that the cross or mark as it appears upon the ballots and as it is above described constitutes a distinguishing mark. All the marks upon the five ballots, it should be explained, are substantially the same or of the same general character. In other words, each voter marked or stamped his ballot in the same general manner, and all the ballots are substantially alike in the character of the stamp used or the means employed in marking them.

Subdivision 4 of section 1211 of the Political Code provides: "No mark upon a ballot which is unauthorized by this act shall be held to invalidate such ballot, unless it shall appear that such mark was placed thereon by the voter for the purpose of identifying such ballot." In construing the above provision, which was, by amendment added to section 1211 by the Legislature of 1903, the Supreme Court has said: "The effect of the amendment is that, where there is no evidence whatever before the trial court, other than the ballot itself, unless such ballot is so marked as to warrant an inference by the trial court that the marking was designedly made by the voter for the purpose of identifying his ballot, the ballot must not be rejected on the ground that it bears a distinguishing mark." Turner v. Wilson, 171 Cal. 600, 603, 604, 154 Pac. 2, 4. See, also, Sweetser v. Pacheco, 172 Cal. 137, 155 Pac. 639.

There was in this case no evidence produced before the trial court, extrinsic to the ballots themselves, showing or tending to show that the manner of marking the ballots or of making the cross thereon was intended by the voters as means of facilitating an identification of the ballots as those voted by the voters voting them. As before stated, the markings on the respective ballots were substantially or approximately uniform in form and style, the ink spreading a little more in some of the voting spaces than in others, but each representing a cross.

We cannot say from the record so far as it bears upon the ballots in question that the rulings of the court below that said ballots were entitled to be counted are erroneous.

Group No. 2.

[4] 1. Plaintiff's exception No. 3 involves an objection to a ballot counted for Weise and which, in addition to a cross stamped in a voting space opposite Weise's name, bears a mark in the large space on the ballot just below the names of Weise and Evarts, and which has the appearance of being the upper half of the cross on the voting stamp, thus: V. The objection to this ballot was that the mark as indicated constituted an identifying or distinguishing mark. The trial court held that the said mark was an offset, and overruled the objection. Although the particular point on the ballot where the said mark was made or is to be found does not, when the ballot is folded, precisely correspond or come in contact with any of the marks properly in the voting spaces above it, we think it is very clear that the said mark or impression must have been made while the voter was in the act of folding the ballot. This could easily occur in the act of folding by sliding one half of the ballot over the other half in the first fold, thus causing, before the ends of the two parts of the ballot had been adjusted evenly, the lower part, where the mark complained of is located, to come in contact with the upper part, where the cross in the voting spaces was stamped, the ink used in stamping not then being entirely dry. We think this ballot was properly counted for Weise.

[5] 2. Plaintiff's exception No. 6 is addressed to a ballot whereby the voter seemingly attempted to vote for both the appellant and the respondent, there having been stamped a voting cross in each of the voting spaces opposite the names of the said parties, one opposite that of the appellant and the other opposite that of the respondent. The impression of the cross or stamp in each space is clear and distinct. The court rejected the ballot and refused to order it counted for either candidate, and properly so, as obviously it cannot be told therefrom for which of the two candidates the voter intended to vote, if, indeed, he really intended to vote for either.

[6] 3. Plaintiff's exception No. 7 relates to a ballot on which there is a distinct impression of the cross opposite the name of Weise and a slight impression thereof opposite that of Evarts. By folding the said ballot according to the crease therein which was undoubtedly caused by the first fold of the ballot by the voter, the stamp opposite the name of Weise strikes or comes in contact with the voting space opposite the name of Evarts and precisely where the slight impression of the cross is located in the latter space. The court below held the mark opposite the name of Evarts to be an offset, and accordingly the ballot was counted for Weise. The physical appearance of the ballot seems to sustain that conclusion. At any rate, we cannot say that the ruling is erroneous.

Group No. 3.

[7] 1. Plaintiff's exception No. 2: On this ballot appears the impression of the voting stamp or cross both in the space in which the name of Weise is printed and in the voting space directly opposite the name of Weise. There is nothing to indicate that the mark in the space in which Weise's name is printed was intended as an identifying mark. The ballot was therefore properly counted for Weise. Turner v. Wilson, supra; Sweetser v. Pacheco, supra.

2. Plaintiff's exception No. 5 refers to a ballot on which the voter made a cross with a lead pencil and also a cross with the voting stamp in the voting space opposite the name of Evarts. The two marks are distinct. The ballot was rejected, and properly so under the ruling in the cases above cited.

Several other ballots were sent up with the record, but no point is made in the briefs as to them. We are therefore not called upon to examine said ballots.

There are no other matters which have been submitted here for consideration and decision, and, agreeably to the views above expressed, the judgment is affirmed.

G. P. Hall, of Petaluma (E. J. Dole, of Petaluma, of counsel), for appellant. W. F. Cowan, of Santa Rosa, and W. H. Early, of Petaluma (A. H. Crook, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

PER CURIAM. In this case, a hearing here was ordered by this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the Third Appellate District, solely because of what was said by that court as to the last ballot discussed as involved in plaintiff's exception No. 5. In all other respects we are satisfied with the opinion of the District Court of Appeal, which was filed in that court July 9, 1917, and adopt the same as the opinion of this court.

[8] As to the one ballot referred to above, one for Evarts which was rejected by the trial court, it appears from the record that the rejection was solely because of the conclusion of the trial court that it was not sufficiently shown that the ballot had ever been voted. It is unnecessary to consider whether the trial court erred in this conclusion, for the record also shows that at the same time another ballot, one for Weise, as to which the situation was the same, was likewise rejected for the same reason. If error was committed as to one, which we do not decide, it was likewise committed as to the other, and one offset the other.

In re HEALY'S ESTATE. (S. F. 8266.)

WILLS 🔑552(3)—CONSTRUCTION—"BY RIGHT OF REPRESENTATION."

A testator, who left no descendants, and who had two sisters, gave personal property unto named grandnieces and grandnephews by right of representation. In specifying the grandnieces and nephews whom the testator intended to take, he named two grandnieces, who were the children of a son of one sister, another grandniece, the daughter of another son of the same sister, and a grand nephew, the son of a son of the other sister. Civ. Code, § 1403, declares that taking by right of representation occurs when the descendants of a deceased heir take together the same share of the estate of another person that their parents would have taken, if living. Held that, though the testator, in specifying the nieces and nephews who should take, named their immediate parents, it was obvious that he intended such beneficiaries should take in place of the two sisters; hence the grandnephew, who was the only descendant of one sister given any bequest, was entitled to one-half of the property, while the three grandnieces, who were descendants of the other sister, took respectively a one-fourth interest and one-eighth interest in the estate, the two grandnieces, daughters of one nephew, taking only a one-eighth interest.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, By Right of Representation.]

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thomas F. Graham, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of James Healy, deceased. From the decree of distribution, Bridget Rhead, assignee of one of the legatees, appeals. Reversed and remanded.

W. H. Morrissey, Chas. S. Wheeler, and John F. Bowie, all of San Francisco, for appellant. John J. O'Toole, Cullinan & Hickey, and J. E. Derham, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHAW, J. By his last will James Healy bequeathed the residue of his personal property to certain grandnephews and grandnieces by right of representation. The decision in the case requires a determination of the meaning of the phrase "by right of representation" as applied to this bequest. James Healy left no descendants. He had two sisters, Mary Healy, who married a man named Lanning, and Bridget Healy, who married a man named Burke. Mary had three sons, namely, George, Joseph, and Henry Lanning. Joseph had two daughters, namely, Milly and Annie Lanning. Henry had one daughter, Nellie Lanning. Bridget had a son, Patrick Burke, who had a son, William Burke. The two nephews, Joseph and Henry Lanning, the nephew Patrick Burke, and the two sisters of James Healy, had all died before the execution of the will. The persons named as residuary legatees were the said Milly and Annie Lanning, the said Nellie Lanning, and the said William Burke. The question is whether these persons are to be taken as representing their parents, respectively, who were nephews of the testator, or as representing, respectively, the sisters of the testator, Mary and Bridget.

The following are the provisions of the will in controversy. We give them with the paragraphing as they appear in the will itself.

"Fifth. I give and bequeath all other personal property of whatsoever nature or description or wheresoever situated, of which I may die possessed, unto the following grandnephews and grandnieces by right of representation:

"Milly and Annie Lanning, residents of Montreal, Canada, being the children of a nephew whose name I do not now recall, but which said nephew is a son of my sister Mary Healy.

"Nellie Lanning, of Montreal, Canada, daughter of a nephew whose name I do not now recall, but which said nephew is a son of my sister Mary Healy. Said Nellie Lanning was for some time connected with the office of the 'True Witness' as proofreader.

"William Burke, of New York City, son of my nephew Patrick Burke, which nephew is a son of my sister Bridget Healy."

The respondents contend that the intent of the testator, manifested by the fifth clause of the will, was to give one-third of the residue to Milly and Annie Lanning, one-third to Nellie Lanning, and one-third to William Burke. Their theory is that the phrase "by right of representation," in the opening paragraph, refers exclusively to the three nephews described in the last three paragraphs, and that its only effect is to limit the shares of Milly and Annie, as representatives of their unnamed father, to one-sixth of the estate each, instead of the one-fourth each that would have been theirs if the residue left to the four persons named had been given to them as a class, without the qualifying phrase. The court below took this view and distributed the residue accordingly. Bridget Rhead, who is the owner by assignment of the share of William Burke, appeals from the decree of distribution.

For the appellant it is contended that the phrase "by right of representation," in the opening paragraph, refers primarily to the two deceased sisters of the decedent, subsequently named; that it is their grandchildren who are to take the residue as their representatives, respectively, the result being that one half will go to the assignee of William Burke as the representative of his grandmother, Bridget Healy Burke, and the other half to Milly, Annie, and Nellie Lanning, as the representatives of their grandmother, Mary Healy Lanning.

We do not perceive any strong reasons for selecting the nephews as the stocks to which said introductory qualifying phrase refers, which do not point with equal or greater force to the selection of the sisters as the point of beginning of lineage intended. The phrase is in the introductory sentence of the fifth clause. By implication and grammatical construction it is to be taken as a qualification of all that follows relating to the subject to which the phrase would naturally apply. The natural meaning, therefore, would be that wherever the relationship of the legatees is such that the rule of descent by right of representation would apply, and nothing appears to indicate a contrary intent, the parties are to take "by right of representation" and not per capita, or, in other words, that the principle of taking by representation should apply to the dispositions made, in all cases to which it could apply.

Taking by right of representation occurs when the descendants of a deceased heir take together the same share of the estate of another person that their parents would have taken if living. Civ. Code, § 1403. We are to take the testator as conceiving that his two deceased sisters should be the original stocks of descent, arbitrarily naming certain of their descendants to represent them as descendants in his testamentary scheme, and then declaring that the principle of representation should apply to the entire scheme. Giving the phrase this meaning and application, the result would be that the residue would first be divided into two parts, one for the persons named who were descendants of the sister Mary Healy Lanning, the other for those named who were descendants of the sister Bridget Healy Burke. This would give William Burke, as the sole representative of the testator's sister Bridget, one half of the residue, and to the three descendants of the other sister, Mary, the other half thereof.

In disposing of the share appointed to the descendants of Mary, the principle of representation would again apply. By descent from Mary, her sons, Joseph and Henry, if living, would each take a share. The two daughters of Joseph, namely, Milly and Annie, would represent him, and by that rule they would take, together, the share of their father as the descendant of Mary; that is, one-fourth of the residue, or one-eighth thereof to each of them, the other one-fourth going to Nellie Lanning as the only named representative of her father Henry Lanning. This appears to us to be the most reasonable and natural interpretation of the will, and the one which best accords with the literal meaning and grammatical construction of the language.

The only circumstance that can be considered as indicating an opposite interpretation is the fact that in naming and describing the legatees the paragraph form of composition is used, and a separate paragraph is devoted to the children of each deceased nephew. This, at best, is of very slight importance as a key to the meaning, and its force is much weakened by the fact that he did not remember the names of two of the nephews, showing that his mind was not dwelling strongly upon them, and that, in each case, he did expressly mention a sister as the parent, and apparently without any necessity of doing so except to point to them as the parent stocks. The paragraphing alone is insufficient to overcome the natural meaning of the words.

Counsel for respondents rely on the decisions in Robinson v. Shepherd, 4 De Gex, J. & S. 129, 46 Eng. Rep. 865; Parker v. Winder, L. R. (1883) 24 Ch. Div. 664, and In re Dering, Weekly Notes 1911, p. 187, as precedents in their favor. In Rosenberg v. Frank, 58 Cal. at page 411, decided in 1881, this court quoted and approved the following from the decision of the United States Supreme Court in Lambert's Lessee v. Paine, 3 Cranch (7 U. S.) 130, 2 L. Ed. 377, decided in 1803:

> "Except for the establishment of general principles, very little aid can be procured from adjudged cases in the construction of wills. It seldom happens that two cases can be found precisely alike."

The experience of the present members of this court confirms this declaration. In the cases referred to by counsel for respondents, the language was different from that of the present will, and the reasoning of those cases has little, if any, application to the present case. The cases of Gibson v. Fisher, L. R. 5 Eq. Cas. 51, decided by Lord Romilly, Master of the Rolls, and Siders v. Siders, 169 Mass. 523, 48 N. E. 277, are more nearly like the case at bar, and are to that extent precedents in favor of our conclusion. It follows that the court below erred in the decree of distribution appealed from.

The decree of distribution is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to enter an order distributing the residue of the estate in accordance with the views expressed in this opinion.

BROOKER et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. (S. F. 8185.)

Master and Servant 🔑373 — Workmen's Compensation Act—"Arising Out of and in the Course of the Employment."

Under Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, c. 279) § 12, allowing compensation to the dependents of an employé only where the proximate cause of his death is a personal injury sustained by an "accident arising out of and in the course of the employment," the death of an employé engaged in the erection of a building upon a scaffold 39 feet above the ground, properly guarded by a rope along its outer side, as a result of an epileptic fit in which he fell down on the scaffold and rolled over the edge, was not within the statute; the question whether the injury arose "out of" the employment not depending on the height from which the employé fell or the extent of his injury.

In Bank. Application for writ of review by B. M. Brooker, employer, and the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company, insurer, to review an award made by the Industrial Accident Commission against the insurer, in favor of Rodrigo Fuente and Amelia Fuente, on account of the death of R. R. Fuente. Award annulled.

Lloyd S. Ackerman, of San Francisco, for petitioners. Chris M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondents.

SHAW, J. This is a petition to review an award made by the Industrial Accident Commission against the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company, insurance carrier for Brooker, in favor of Rodrigo and Amelia Fuente, on account of the death of R. R. Fuente, caused by injuries received by Fuente while he was in the employment of the defendant Brooker as a laborer. Fuente was the son of the petitioner Rodrigo and the stepson of the petitioner Amelia. The petition is based upon the claim that the injury which caused the death of Fuente, and the accident which produced the injury, although they happened to him in the course of his employment, did not arise "out of" his employment.

The decedent was a laborer employed by Brooker in the erection of a building. He was working upon a scaffold 5 feet in width and 39 feet above the ground. The scaffold was guarded, in compliance with the law or ordinance, by a rope 3 feet high along its outer edge. While so engaged, the decedent fell to the surface of the scaffold, rolled off the edge, and thence fell to the ground. Death resulted from the injuries caused by the fall to the ground. There was evidence sufficient to show that he was subject to epileptic fits at long intervals, and that he was seized with one of these fits while at work on the scaffold, as a consequence of which he fell down upon the scaffold, and that as a result of the contortions incident to such fit he rolled off the edge and was precipitated to the ground. There was no evidence to the contrary. The commission did not find that the epileptic fit caused the fall, as it should have done, but found in general terms that the injury which caused the death of Fuente arose out of and happened in the course of his employment. It is practically conceded that the sole cause of his fall was a fit of epilepsy.

The contention of the petitioners is that the proximate cause of the fall was the epileptic fit, with which his employment had no causal connection, and hence that the accident and resulting injury arose from the fact that he was an epileptic and had the fit, and not out of his employment. We are of the opinion that this contention must be sustained. The Workmen's Compensation Act allows compensation to the dependents of an employé only where the proximate cause of the death of such employé is a personal injury sustained by him "by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment." Section 12. There was nothing in the nature of the work which the deceased was doing at the time that had any tendency to bring on a fit of epilepsy. Neither the fit, nor the fall, nor the injury, was produced by the nature of the work in which he was engaged. The injury was doubtless the greater by reason of the distance from the scaffold to the ground, but this distance was not due to the nature of the work itself. The question whether or not such an injury arises "out of" the employment cannot and does not depend upon the height from which the employé falls or the extent of the injury he receives as the result of the fit.

The exposition of this question by the Supreme Court of Michigan in Van Gorder v. Packard Motor Car Co., 162 N. W. 107, is so clear and so well fits the conditions of the case at bar that we cannot do better than to quote it here. The employé, while at work on a scaffold 6 feet in height, was seized with an epileptic fit, which caused him to fall off the scaffold to the floor, whereby his skull was fractured and his death ensued. The court, after an elaborate review of the authorities, says:

> "There is no claim that the scaffold was improperly constructed or in any way unsuitable for the service. Due to no conditions arising out of his employment, but solely to his predisposition to epilepsy, of which his employer had no notice, he fell from the scaffold, receiving an injury from which death resulted. The fall was caused, and caused only, by the epileptic fit. The fit was the direct and only cause of his injury. We do not think it would be seriously contended that, had he fallen in an epileptic fit while standing on the floor and received the injury he did, the injury arose out of the employment, and that the defendant was liable. * * * The height from which he fell, here only a short distance, could not change the liability for the injury. The most that can be said is that the height from which the deceased fell may have aggravated the extent of the injury. A person falling a greater distance may be more seriously injured than one falling a lesser distance; but it does not change the question of responsibility, of liability. The distance of the fall might contribute to the extent of the injury, but it was not a contributory cause to the fall. When the deceased was seized with the epileptic fit, he would have fallen, no matter where he was; and the employer cannot be held responsible because that unfortunate seizure occurred when the workman was on the scaffold, a few feet from the floor."

The other authorities are, for the most part, to the same effect. In Butler v. Burton-on-Trent Union, 5 Butterworth's Workmen's Compensation Cases, 355, the decedent, while on duty, was sitting at the top of a stairway. A fit of coughing, due to the fact that he was afflicted with tuberculosis, came on and made him giddy, causing him to fall down the steps. From the injuries resulting therefrom he died in a few days. It was held that "the accident did not arise out of the employment, in the sense that it was due to the nature of the employment, or to anything to which the nature of the employment required him to expose himself," and that to say that it "'arose out of' because it took place on premises where he was in fact engaged," would make the fact that it arose "in the course of" the employment the sole test, whereas the law requires that it shall also arise "out of" the employment. In Nash v. Rangatira, L. R. [1914] 3 K. B. Div. 978, a sailor, while drunk, was walking up the gangway of the steamer, and solely because of his intoxication fell therefrom and was killed. The court said that the accident and injury did not arise "out of" the employment, and that the fact that he was on the gangway did not make it so, although it increased the peril from a fall. Frith v. Louisianian, 5 B. W. C. C. 410, L. R. [1912] 2 K. B. Div. 155, was a similar case of a sailor who fell over the side of the vessel because of his intoxication, and was drowned. He was "within the ambit of his employment," but the court held that his death did not arise out of that employment. In Rodger v. Paisley, 5 B. W. C. C. 547, a messenger, while carrying a message on the street, fainted and fell, thereby injuring him so that he died. This injury did not, the court says, arise out of the employment. In Collins v. Brooklyn, etc., Co., 171 App. Div. 381, 156 N. Y. Supp. 957, the decedent, while at work, fell to the ground in a swoon due to heart disease, and thereby received the injury which caused his death. The court said that it did not arise out of the work, and that to make it so it must appear that the injury was "a consequence of something that had a relation to the work of the employer," and that the act does not "make the employer an insurer of the life, health, or regular heart action, of an employé," and that it should have been shown that the swoon, for example, arose out of overexertion in the employer's service. See, also, McCoy v. Michigan Screw Co., 180 Mich. 454, 154 N. W. 572, L. R. A. 1916A, 323; Klawinski v. Lake Shore, etc., Co., 185 Mich. 643, 152 N. W. 213, L. R. A. 1916A, 342; Hawkins v. Powell's, etc., Co., 4 B. W. C. C. 178, L. R. [1911] 1 K. B. Div. 988; Barnabas v. Bersham Colliery Co., 4 B. W. C. C. 119—all involving the same principle.

A distinction is to be made between cases of this character, and those where the accident, though partly caused by the idiopathic condition of the employé, is due in part also to the overexertion of the employé in performing his work, or to the nature of the work or the appliances furnished to him with which to work, or to the lack of proper safeguards against the ordinary dangers of the place of work, the injury being sometimes greater because of his idiopathic condition. In those cases the injury is held to arise out of the employment. An example of those cases is Fennah v. Midland, etc., Ry., 4 B. W. C. C. 440, where the decedent, an engine driver, was tightening a nut in the engine and suddenly fainted and fell. The court, from the evidence, was of the opinion that his fainting fit was brought on by the work and held that the injury arose out of the employment. Where the idiopathic condition and the employment are each contributing causes of the accident the employer is liable, but not where the idiopathic condition is the sole cause.

The case of Carroll v. What Cheer Stables Co., 38 R. I. 421, 96 Atl. 208, L. R. A. 1916D, 154, is cited in support of the opposite view. It is, however, distinguishable on the principle just stated. A hack driver, while driving on the highway, fell from his seat and was injured by the fall. The fall was probably caused in part by a faint or dizziness induced by a disease from which he was suffering. But there was evidence that his horses were in a kind of gallop, and that he was "pitched out" by the motion, and the court said that the "fall was more than the mere inert fall or collapse of an unconscious man; that it was a positive throwing or pitching of the driver from his seat by the movement of the hack turning or lurching into the gutter, toward or against the curbstone, and might have happened to a driver in full possession of his senses." Upon this ground the court based its decision in his favor.

The only case to the contrary is Wicks v. Dowell, L. R. [1905] 2 K. B. Div. 225. The deceased was seized with an epileptic fit while standing on a wooden stage in a ship, close to the edge of a hatchway opening into the hold, and while guiding the descent of a bucket into the hold by means of a long pole, and as a result he fell into the hold and was injured. The award was made. The court held that the accident arose "out of" his employment. The facts are somewhat similar to the case at bar. But it stands alone, and is contrary to the later decisions above cited arising in England under the same law. We think the better reason is with the later cases.

WILSON v. PACIFIC ELECTRIC RY. CO. et al. (L. A. 3998.)

1. Railroads 🔑178—Enforcement of Liabilities Against Property—Assessment for Public Improvements.

Where a railroad company had only a strip of land 95 feet wide, being below the average of width of similar land devoted to railroad purposes, the segregation of all of the strip except that occupied by the tracks with sufficient clearance for the convenient passage of the rolling stock as not a part of the right of way and as subject to sale in satisfaction of assessments for a street improvement, with no investigation of the amount of business transacted by the railroad, no inquiry regarding the necessities of the company in the matter of space for loading and unloading commodities, and no estimate of probable future requirements of space, though a part of the assessed land had been used for railroad purposes, was unauthorized.

2. Railroads 🔑178—Enforcement of Liabilities Against Property—Assessment for Public Improvements.

Under the law existing prior to 1911, a sale by metes and bounds of all of a railroad company's interest, including a part of its right of way, in satisfaction of an assessment for a street improvement, could not be enforced.

3. Railroads 🔑178—Enforcement of Liabilities Against Property—Assessment for Public Improvements—"Right of Way."

The "right of way" of a railroad company as respects its liability to be sold in satisfaction of an assessment for a public improvement is not a mere right to operate trains over tracks, and cannot arbitrarily be confined to easements over just enough land for running trains; the criterion being the land actually occupied and reasonably necessary for use, and the right of way being merged in the fee where the railroad company owns the fee.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Right of Way.]

Angellotti, C. J., and Shaw and Sloss, JJ., dissenting.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank G. Finlayson, Judge.

Action by Phillip L. Wilson against the Pacific Electric Railway Company and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, the defendant named appeals. Reversed.

Frank Karr, R. C. Gortner, and A. W. Ashburn, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. Tanner, Odell, Odell & Taft, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Plaintiff sued successfully to foreclose a lien for improvement of a street against certain property of the Pacific Electric Railway Company situated in the city of Venice. The railway corporation appeals from the judgment and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

The court found, partly upon the testimony of witnesses and partly upon stipulation of the parties, that prior to the 23d day of June, 1909, the Los Angeles Pacific Company, appellant's predecessor in interest, was the owner and in possession of that strip of land in the city of Ocean Park, now Venice, which now constitutes a portion of Sereno street, extending from the southerly line of Elena avenue to the southerly line of Rose avenue; that prior to that time and pursuant to an agreement in writing carried into effect by an ordinance of the municipality the Los Angeles Pacific Company and the city exchanged certain properties; and that deeds were duly delivered by which, among other things, title to the land now occupied by the part of Sereno street here involved, together with other adjoining property, passed from the railroad company to the city. The city, in the contract, in the ordinance, and by acceptance of the deed with appropriate covenants to express that purpose agreed to defray all expenses of opening and improving and maintaining streets over or across the lands deeded to it by the railroad company, and that said company should never be compelled as an abutting owner or as the proprietor of property within an assessment district to pay any assessment for opening, improving, or maintaining such streets. By the city's deeds to the railroad company the latter became the owner in fee of land which, when added to other property possessed in like tenure, formed a continuous strip 95 feet in width, occupied in part by its tracks. Sereno street as it now exists is parallel to this strip and adjoins it. Less than six months after the acceptance by the city of the deed from the railroad company a proceeding to open said Sereno street was instituted, and in October, 1910, an assessment for the improving of said street was levied upon a portion of the strip of land owned by the said railroad corporation. The assessment was by metes and bounds and embraced the southerly part of the strip of land adjacent to Sereno street and 47 feet in width, including part of that acquired from the city and part of the property previously owned by the railroad company. Appellant pleaded in its answer that the property thus assessed was part of its right of way. The court found that this allegation was untrue, and that the land had never been devoted to public use. There were further findings to the effect that the property was legally assessable for the improvement of Sereno street and the lien of plaintiff, an assignee of a street contractor who performed work on said street, was held to be valid in every respect.

Appellant asserts that the findings upon which the judgment is predicated are wholly unsupported in that the evidence and stipulations compel the conclusion that a railroad right of way was assessed; that prior to the amendment of the "Vrooman Act" in 1911 such an assessment was void; and that the assessment was illegal also because it was levied in violation of the conditions upon which the city acquired title to the land over which the street was opened.

Mr. Ashburton, a civil engineer, in the employ of appellant, testified that the strip of land 95 feet wide, belonging to the railroad company, was fenced upon its northerly and southerly sides; that an average of 40 or 45 feet was occupied by rails, although at one end the track curved in such manner as to extend almost all the way across the strip; that at the time of the assessment there were some few small houses on the property between the main tracks and the site of Sereno street; and that the north boundary line of the assessment district did not encroach upon the land actually used by the Pacific Electric Railway Company for its tracks. Mr. Bugbee, another witness, testified in part as follows:

> "This particular parcel of the right of way, i. e., the 95-foot strip, was the old Santa Fé right of way running into Inglewood and into Santa Monica. It has been in use for a good many years as a freight line, with the exception that our Inglewood passenger traffic we handled on that line."

Counsel thereupon stipulated that the part of defendant's right of way upon which the tracks are laid is and has been at all times used for purposes of traffic. Witness said that the four small houses or "shacks" had been used for a section camp and for storing materials. Later on he said he rented them "just to keep them occupied and get what revenue we could out of them until after the road was standardized." The witness testified that after the land formerly owned by the city had been added to that of the defendant company it had been used for industrial purposes. Those purposes he explained as follows:

> "By that I mean in the handling of material such as building materials, fuel, feed, and things of that kind. In order to be economically handled, they have got to be on a spur track, and we have put in spur tracks in here to serve the industries, and I think we have two at the present time, but I would have to verify that by reference. There are two fuel and feed yards there at the present time. They are occupied by lessees of the Pacific Electric Railway Company. We have spur tracks in there to reach them, and are serving them with those spur tracks."

He further gave it as his opinion that the whole of the strip 95 feet wide was necessary for the present and future purposes of the company. "The United States government," said the witness, "recognizes 200 feet." He also said that the small buildings or "shacks" formerly on the southerly portion of the land had been removed. Mr. Crawford, the only witness called by the plaintiff, described the running of the line by which the northern boundary of the assessment district was fixed. He testified partly as follows:

> "My instructions were not to include any property in the district only what was covered by the buildings, such as houses, shacks. We measured the distance of those houses from Sereno street. We did not include in the assessment any land upon which was situated tracks belonging to the defendant company. We ran the assessment I think 47 and some fraction feet from Sereno street, as now situated. I couldn't say how far away that would be from the nearest track. We measured up the buildings, houses, and included property that had the buildings on. I suppose we left more land behind the buildings next to the track in some places than in others. At Elena street I think it was about 6 or 8 feet. I don't just remember what it was."

He also said:

> "There were some poles supporting wires within the territory included in the assessment district. I don't know whether they belonged to the defendants in this action or some one else. The poles were standing. I couldn't say whether they were parallel with the tracks. They were not connected with the trolley wires. * * * There was no track upon the 47 feet, which I have described belonging to the railroad company. I don't know whether there were any piles of lumber, brick, or anything of that nature upon the 47-foot strip."

[1] Appellant insists that this testimony utterly fails to sustain the finding that the strip of land included in the assessment district was not and had not been used for public purposes. We think it clear that the court arbitrarily determined that the railroad company's "right of way" consisted only of the land occupied by the tracks with sufficient clearance for the convenient passage of the rolling stock. There was no investigation of the amount of business transacted by the railroad. There was no inquiry regarding the necessities of the company in the matter of space for loading and unloading commodities. There was no estimate of the probable future requirements of space, but one of the witnesses stated that an additional track would soon be necessary for the business. That a part of the assessed land had been used for railroad purposes is clear, and there was uncontradicted testimony that the strip, 95 feet wide, was below the average of width of similar land devoted to railroad purposes. The segregation of this property as not a part of the appellant's right of way had no proper basis. It was not sufficient that the actual traffic could be operated over the tracks without the constant use of the land within the railroad company's fences. At least that portion of the assessed strip which had been a part of the railroad's property before the acquisition of the land from the city had been devoted to various railroad purposes. Therefore the finding attacked by appellant was not supported by the evidence.

[2] The question then is whether or not, under the law existing at the time this assessment was levied, a lien could be foreclosed as decreed in this case. It is to be remembered that this assessment was levied prior to the amendment to the general street law expressly authorizing the assessment of rights of way and subjecting them to sale for nonpayment of assessments. Stats. 1911, p. 742 § 20, subd. 11. Therefore this case is to be determined according to the principles announced by such authorities as Southern California Railway Co. v. Workman, 146 Cal. 80, 79 Pac. 586, 82 Pac. 79, 2 Ann. Cas. 583, and Fox v. Workman, 155 Cal. 201, 100 Pac. 246. In this case as in those the question was not whether the fee, subject to the easement for right of way, might or might not be sold for satisfaction of an assessment, but whether or not a sale by metes and bounds of all the railroad company's interests, including a part of the right of way, could be enforced. Following those authorities we must answer the question in the negative. In Schaffer v. Smith, 169 Cal. 764, 147 Pac. 976, the two cases in which Workman, treasurer of Watts, was defendant, were cited, and it was again said that while the property of a railroad company may be assessed to pay for work upon an abutting street there was no authority to sell in foreclosure of the lien both the fee and the right to operate the railroad.

[3] The "right of way" of a railroad company is not the mere right to operate trains over tracks, and cannot arbitrarily be confined to an easement over just enough land for running trains. The criterion is the land actually occupied and reasonably necessary for use by the common carrier. For this reason spur tracks and very short lines have been held to be instruments for public use of land. Madera Railway Co. v. Raymond Granite Co., 3 Cal. App. 668, 87 Pac. 27. Where, as in this case, the fee of the property rests in the railroad company, the "right of way" denoting in its technical sense the tenure by which the land is held, is merged in the fee, as no person may have an easement in land which he himself owns. San Pedro, Los Angeles & Salt Lake Railroad Co. v. Pillsbury, 23 Cal. App. 675, 139 Pac. 669, 671. The sale contemplated by the foreclosure was of all of appellant's interest, and, as we have seen, at the time of the attachment of the lien there was no authority for such a disposition of at least a portion of the land included in the assessment district and devoted to railroad purposes.

As the judgment and order must be reversed for the reasons given above, it will not be necessary to decide the other question involving the force of the city's agreement not to assess its vendee. Respondent insists that McNeil v. City of South Pasadena & Pacific Electric Railway Co., 166 Cal. 153, 135 Pac. 32, 48 L. R. A. (N. S.) 138, is decisive of the whole matter, but appellant is equally positive that where two modes of paying for street improvements are possible, one by assessment under the Vrooman Act (St. 1885 p. 160), and another by resort to funds in the city treasury, the municipality may, as a part of the consideration for property purchased, agree to forego the former method. Under the circumstances it is not necessary for this court in the present appeal to decide this very interesting question.

The judgment and order are reversed.

We concur: HENSHAW, J.; LORIGAN, J.; VICTOR E. SHAW, Judge pro tem.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. (dissenting). I dissent. I am of the opinion that the evidence is sufficient to support the conclusion of the trial court that no part of the assessed portion of the land owned in fee by the railroad company, the greater part of which admittedly was used for purposes in no way connected with the railroad such as being leased to private parties for other purposes, was ever devoted to railroad purposes, and that none of such assessed portion ever constituted a part of the railroad right of way. As to the other objection made by appellant I think the case clearly falls within the principle of McNeil v. City of South Pasadena, 166 Cal. 153, 135 Pac. 32, 48 L. R. A. (N. S.) 138.

I think the judgment should be affirmed.

In an action for negligent injuries, where one relies upon the violation of an ordinance or statute, he must be within the class intended by the legislative body to be benefited by the enactment.

2. STREET RAILROADS 🔑84—PERSONAL INJURIES—VIOLATION OF ORDINANCE—WHO MAY INVOKE.

An ordinance requiring street cars to stop or hurry from crossings in case of fire may be invoked, as for his benefit, by a bystander injured while on the sidewalk by a fire automobile, forced to take to the sidewalk by sudden obstruction of a crossing by a street car.

3. STREET RAILROADS 🔑114(5) — PERSONAL INJURIES—VIOLATION OF ORDINANCE—EVIDENCE.

In an action by an injured bystander on the sidewalk by the sudden obstruction of a crossing by a street car, in violation of ordinance giving fire apparatus right of way, evidence held to support a finding that the motorman should have known there was a fire and was negligent.

4. STREET RAILROADS 🔑81(1) — STREETS — STREET CARS—FIRES.

Where defendant's motorman knows or should know that a fire automobile is coming at a great speed and runs his car out on a crossing suddenly, forcing the automobile to swerve to the walk injuring plaintiff, the company is negligent, whether violating an ordinance or not.

5. NEGLIGENCE 🔑15 — CONCURRING NEGLIGENCE—JOINT AND SEVERAL LIABILITY.

One injured by the concurring negligence of two persons can sue either or both, and it is no defense that the person sued was not himself the sole tort-feasor.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. A. Sloane, Judge.

Action by Bradley W. King against the San Diego Electric Railway Company, a corporation. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Eugene Daney, of San Diego, Read G. Dilworth, of Coronado, and E. Swift Torrance, of San Diego, for appellant. Crouch & Harris, Claude L. Chambers, and Ray M. Harris, all of San Diego, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. This is an action for damages arising out of personal injuries to plaintiff alleged to have been caused by the negligence of defendant. The court, sitting without a jury, gave judgment for plaintiff for $6,000. Defendant appeals. The facts sufficiently appear in the following findings of the trial court:

"That on the 16th day of January, 1912, the plaintiff was upon the sidewalk at the southwest corner of Fifth and G streets in the city of San Diego, Cal., and was in the exercise of due and proper care for his own safety; that at said time there was a fire near the said place, to wit, a block west and about one-half a block south from said corner on the west side of Fourth street between G and H streets; that said fire was pouring forth a large quantity of black smoke; that the fire department of said city was racing westward on said G street near its intersection with said Fifth street in order to reach said fire as soon as possible; that at said time the defendant, by and through its servants and employés, was running one of its street cars southerly upon said Fifth street between F street and G street in said city.

"That the defendant carelessly and negligently and without due or proper care or regard for plaintiff's safety ran its said street car suddenly across the intersection of Fifth and G streets and directly in the way of an automobile which was part of said fire department, and which said automobile was then approaching the said intersection from the east on the said G street; that said automobile was being driven at a rapid rate of speed by the chief of said fire department.

"That all of said facts heretofore found were known by the defendant, or could have been known had it been in the exercise of due or proper care in the plaintiff's behalf.

"That part of said fire department, to wit, the assistant chief, driving his horse and buggy and ringing his fire bell, had already just passed said corner in plain view of defendant's servants in charge of said street car; and the fire chief, as he approached said corner in his automobile, continually blew a large whistle; and that said bell and whistle so sounded by said assistant fire chief and fire chief could easily have been heard by defendant's servants in charge of said car had they exercised ordinary care for the safety of the plaintiff; that a considerable part of the fire department of said city was also racing to said fire, and were also clanging their fire bells.

"That when said street car was run upon said intersection of said street and directly in front of said automobile of said fire chief, it became necessary for said fire chief, in order to avoid a collision with said street car, to steer and swerve his said automobile around in front of and past the said street car, and the said fire chief did so steer and swerve his said automobile around in front of said street car, and in so doing unavoidably ran his said automobile upon the sidewalk where the plaintiff was standing and struck the plaintiff with great force and violence, crushing him to and upon the ground there, and inflicting upon him great and grievous bodily injury as follows, to wit, his left leg was so crushed, bruised, contused, and wounded that it became and was necessary to amputate same above the knee, and the same was thereupon amputated above the knee. * * *

"The court finds that the injuries which the plaintiff received, as hereinbefore found, were not the direct and proximate result of the negligence of the plaintiff; that the plaintiff, at the time of the accident which resulted in his injury, was standing upon the northerly edge or curb line of the sidewalk upon the south side of the said G street, at or about the place where it intersects with the westerly boundary of said Fifth street, with portions of his body, sufficient to be struck by said automobile, extending slightly northerly of said curb line, and was leaning out slightly into that portion of said G street set apart for the use of vehicles, and that, while so standing, plaintiff was then looking westerly down said G street away from the direction in which said automobile was approaching; that the plaintiff did not know that said automobile and said street car, or either of them, were approaching or that they were approaching each other, or that said fire chief was going to endeavor to pass in front of said car, and did not know that he was in great, or any, danger of injury to his person in standing where he was, and in the exercise of ordinary care and diligence for his own safety should not have known; and it was not the portion of the plaintiff's body which was extending northerly over said curb line and into said street which was struck by said automobile of the fire chief, and that the injuries which the plaintiff received, as hereinbefore found, were not the direct or proximate result of the negligence of the plaintiff.

"That by reason of the personal injuries, hereinbefore found, plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of $6,000."

The amended complaint, upon which issue was joined, merely set out the facts showing negligence, but by subsequent amendment the following paragraph was added:

"That on the 21st day of August, 1888, the legislative department of the city of San Diego duly passed and adopted an ordinance entitled, 'Ordinance No. 276. An Ordinance providing for Blockading the Streets and Alleys and the Preservation of Fire Department Property During Fire,' which said ordinance was thereafter duly approved by the mayor of said city, and published according to law, and at the time of the committing of the grievances herein mentioned, had never been repealed, and was in full force and effect, a portion of which said ordinance is as follows, to wit:

" 'Sec. II. All steam engines and other moving apparatus of the fire department shall have paramount right of way through all streets, lanes, alleys, courts and other places in the city of San Diego, when going to a fire, and such engines and other apparatus, and vehicles belonging thereto, shall take and keep to the right side of the street, unless the same be obstructed, and all street cars in the vicinity of any such fire engine, or other apparatus or vehicles going to a fire, shall retard or accelerate their speed, as occasion may require, in order to give to the fire department the unobstructed use of the street for the time being.' "

Section III of this ordinance provided that:

"Any person or persons having control of any vehicle or street car who willfully or carelessly permits the same to obstruct the progress of any engine or apparatus of the fire department going to a fire * * * shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. * * *"

It is appellant's contention, argued at great length, that respondent's cause of action is based entirely upon the ordinance above mentioned, and that conceding a violation of the ordinance by appellant still there was no violation of any duty owing to respondent, since the purpose of the ordinance was to insure a right of way to the fire department while going to a fire and not to prevent injury such as was suffered by respondent. In other words, appellant's view is that respondent is not one of the class intended to be benefited by the ordinance, and cannot therefore take advantage of its violation. Upon this ground appellant objected to the introduction of the ordinance, and now assigns its admission in evidence as error. We think the ruling of the trial court was proper.

[1] We agree with appellant that one who relies upon the violation of a statute or ordinance must be within the class intended by the legislative body to be benefited by the enactment. 29 Cyc. 438.

[2] We do not, however, concede that the application of this rule affects the respondent in this case. No doubt the primary object of those portions of the ordinance above quoted was to insure to the fire department the right of way for its vehicles while going to a fire. But that was not the only purpose contemplated. Suppose the chief had actually collided with the street car, and had sued appellant for resulting injuries. Could he have relied upon the ordinance? Unquestionably he could, and such has been the ruling wherever an enactment of this kind has been invoked by a member of the fire department. Buys v. Third Ave. R. Co., 45 App. Div. 11, 61 N. Y. Supp. 113; Geary v. Met. St. Ry. Co., 73 App. Div. 441, 77 N. Y. Supp. 54; Id., 84 App. Div. 514, 82 N. Y. Supp. 1016, affirmed 177 N. Y. 535, 69 N. E. 1123; City of New York v. Met. St. Ry. Co., 90 App. Div. 66, 85 N. Y. Supp. 693, affirmed 182 N. Y. 536, 75 N. E. 1128; Duffghe v. Met. St. Ry. Co., 109 App. Div. 603, 96 N. Y. Supp. 324; McBride v. Des Moines City Ry. Co., 134 Iowa, 398, 109 N. W. 618; Boylan v. New Orleans Ry., etc., Co., 139 La. 185, 71 South. 360; Indianapolis Traction, etc., Co. v. Hensley (Ind.) 115 N. E. 934. Suppose, further, that in this collision between the chief and the street car, a bystander also was injured. Should we say that the chief can invoke the ordinance but the bystander cannot, although both were injured in the collision which resulted from the violation of the ordinance? We think not. We think the legislative body intended not only to enable the fire department to reach a fire speedily and unhampered, but also to prevent collisions with other vehicles and consequent injury to firemen and bystanders. There is nothing in the ordinance itself to negative such an intent, and the very close relation between an obstructed right of way and a collision shows that an accident like the one here involved was in the contemplation of the city council when it framed the ordinance. In other words, both the members of the fire department and the individual members of the public are within the class intended to be protected by this provision.

[3] It is not contended that the motorman in charge of defendant's car "willfully" permitted it to obstruct the progress of the chief's automobile. The question is therefore whether the motorman "carelessly" permitted such obstruction. This is denied by appellant, and its determination requires a review of the evidence.

A cursory reading of the testimony given by the 35 or more witnesses examined at the trial would seem to reveal a remarkable conflict in the evidence, particularly as to the relative positions of the street car, the assistant chief, and the chief. But a closer scrutiny will show that the statements of the bystanders are not positive statements; they are merely the best recollection of matters observed at a time of more or less excitement, when several things were happening simultaneously, some of them at opposite points of the compass, with the natural result that no one of the witnesses can be relied upon for an accurate account of all the details. A careful study of the testimony establishes the following sequence of events at the intersection of Fifth and G streets, where the accident occurred: First, the general city fire alarm, heard by practically all the witnesses; second, the crossing of the street intersection by the assistant chief in his red buggy, drawn by a white horse, traveling about 20 or 25 miles an hour, and ringing his large bell; third, the approach of the chief in his red automobile at a speed of 25 to 30 miles an hour, coming west on G street toward Fifth, sounding his whistle, and the simultaneous approach of the street car at its usual speed of 7 to 8 miles an hour, coming south on Fifth toward G street.

Plaintiff's theory for holding that defendant was negligent is that the motorman of the street car in question heard or should have heard the general fire alarm; that in the exercise of ordinary care he would have seen and heard the assistant chief as the latter passed by on G street within at least 50 feet of the car, and he would have seen the people congregating around the corners of Fifth and G streets, and heard the approach of the chief and the fire apparatus following him—all of which would have indicated to a careful motorman that there was a fire in the vicinity and that a proper regard for the safety of passengers and bystanders required him to stop, before venturing upon the intersection, to investigate the chances of a collision with some of the apparatus coming down the street. This is in substantial accord with the findings, but appellant contends that they are not supported by the evidence. A careful review of the testimony convinces us, however, that there was sufficient showing made at the trial to sustain the findings.

The record shows that a number of people on both sides heard the fire alarm and fire bells some time before the chief reached the intersection. Some of the witnesses were on the various corners of Fifth and G streets; others were in their offices on the second and third floors of the City Hall, some 50 or 60 feet from the intersection; defendant's witness Demers was on Fifth street about 25 feet north of G street, and defendant's witness Reese was on Fifth street 100 feet south of G street. None of these had any difficulty in hearing the fire signals. Other witnesses testified that they saw the smoke rolling up from Fourth and G streets to a height of 25 or 30 feet, and according to the witness Tellison and others it was an "awful black smoke," which was to be expected, considering that it came from burning tar oil. The plaintiff's witness Salmons stated that he was driving an automobile south on Fifth street between F and G, when he first became aware of a fire in the vicinity, either by reason of the fire whistle or the people, some of whom he saw going down the street and others looking out of the City Hall windows. He turned at G street and drew up at the curb to get out of the way of fire vehicles which he knew were to be expected. He saw the assistant chief go by, and he heard the bell on the latter's buggy. He saw the chief about 200 feet back of the assistant chief, and saw the street car shoot out on the crossing just as the chief got there. The general condition at the intersection was, he declared, such "as is usual around a busy corner at the time of a fire." It will be noted that the motorman was coming from the same direction and had the same opportunities of observation as this witness. One Hooker, who was driving a horse and buggy on G street at the time, testified that there was considerable noise and ringing of fire bells, and that he was particularly concerned with the gong on the chief's machine which he was seeking to avoid. Many witnesses saw the assistant chief approach and cross Fifth street, and heard the "peculiar gong which he had on the front of his vehicle." The witness Hay stated that the street car was about 50 feet north of the crossing when the assistant chief passed. Another witness said the street car had traveled less than 30 feet from the time it slowed up to let the assistant chief go by to the time when the chief passed. He saw the motorman put on the brakes when the assistant chief approached and release them when the latter passed. The assistant chief himself remembered distinctly that he saw the car and motorman, who was looking out at the time, and that the car was only 25 or 26 feet away from him at the crossing. There is also ample testimony to the effect that the chief followed the assistant at a distance of about 150 to 200 feet, and that the chief was traveling about 25 to 30 miles an hour, while the speed of the street car was about 7 to 8 miles an hour. These relative speeds and distances show that the motorman was not over 50 feet from the intersection of Fifth and G streets when the assistant chief passed in plain view of the car, and that the motorman was therefore in a position to see and hear the various things indicating a fire, and that fire vehicles were to be expected at the intersection. The motorman testified that he did not see the assistant chief at the crossing, nor did he observe any evidences of the fire. He stated that he had slackened the speed of his car to allow two buggies drawn by dark horses racing abreast on G street to pass the intersection. But every witness on both sides who was asked the question, including the conductor of the car, testified that he did not see the vehicles described by the motorman. Furthermore, there was evidence tending to show that as he approached the intersection the motorman was not looking straight ahead, as he should, but was gazing off to the side in the direction of the fire. The witness Freeman, in particular, stated on both direct and cross-examination that he watched the motorman coming down Fifth street from the time the latter was within 125 feet of the intersection, and that during all that interval the motorman was looking out under the eaves of his car as if trying to see the smoke, and was not paying attention to anything ahead. The witness sought to warn the motorman by waving and whistling to him, but the motorman continued to look away until almost at the intersection, when he saw the chief and pressed down his brakes hard and slid across the street about 75 or 80 feet, stopping on the south side. The motorman denied that he was looking out under the eaves of his car, but the testimony of Freeman, taken together with the motorman's ignorance of all that was going on in front of him, was evidently sufficient to convince the trial court that the motorman was negligent, and that such negligence was the proximate cause of the injury to plaintiff. We cannot say that there is not sufficient evidence to support such finding.

[4] The facts thus found by the court are sufficient to show not only that the motorman carelessly permitted the street car to obstruct the progress of the chief's automobile, which constituted a violation of the ordinance and negligence per se, but also that there was ample showing of negligence without resort to the ordinance. Appellant makes the point that the court would not have found negligence if the ordinance had not been introduced. As we have decided that the ordinance was properly in evidence, and that its violation could be relied upon by respondent as negligence per se, it is immaterial whether or not there was a cause of action without the ordinance. However, the specific facts found were independent of the violation of the ordinance, and would in themselves sustain the finding of negligence.

We are not called upon at this time to decide whether or not the chief of the fire department was himself negligent in exceeding the speed limit set by the city ordinance.

[5] It needs no citation of authority for the point that one who is injured by the concurring negligence of two persons can sue either or both, and it is no defense that the particular person sued was not himself the sole tort-feasor.

Appellant also insists that the lower court should have found the plaintiff guilty of contributory negligence. We have examined the evidence upon this point, and cannot say that the finding that the plaintiff was in the exercise of due care is not sustained.

Judgment affirmed.

MARTIN v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR ALAMEDA COUNTY et al. (S. F. 8213.)

1. Common Law 🔑12 — Adoption — Construction of Statute.

Pol. Code, § 4468, making the common law of England, so far as not repugnant to nor inconsistent with the state Constitution and laws, the rule of decision in the courts of California, does not refer solely to the lex non scripta, the common law unmodified by statute, but the term "common law" contemplated the whole body of jurisprudence as it stood, influenced by statute at the time when the Code section was adopted, and also embraced equity.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Common Law.]

2. Costs 🔑128 — Proceeding in Forma Pauperis — Inherent Power of Common-Law Courts.

The power of the English common-law courts to remit fees on petition in forma pauperis did not originate in any statute, but was exercised as one of the inherent powers of the courts themselves, independently of statute.

3. Costs 🔑129 — Prosecution in Forma Pauperis—Construction of Statute.

Code Civ. Proc. § 91, providing for the right of a suitor in a justice court to prosecute an action in forma pauperis, does not forbid a poor suitor from prosecuting an action in a court of record.

4. Costs 🔑129 — Prosecution in Forma Pauperis — Power of Superior Court — Statutes.

The power of superior courts to admit suitors to commence, or, having commenced, to prosecute, actions in forma pauperis in all proper cases is not curtailed by Pol. Code, § 4295, and other statutes dealing with the payment and prepayment of fees, as such provisions are general and relate to the collection and disposition of the fees, payment or prepayment of which is prescribed by law, and apply to cases where the court has not remitted the payment of fees on behalf of a poor suitor.

5. Costs 🔑132(4)—Prosecution in Forma Pauperis—Petition.

A petition by plaintiff in an action in the superior court to be allowed to prosecute in forma pauperis, supported by affidavit that except for his chose in action plaintiff was not possessed of more than $25, and that no one except himself was interested in the successful prosecution of the action, was sufficient, as against the judge's return declaring that he had information and belief to the effect that the plaintiff's attorney had a contingent fee in the action, on which ground he refused the petition.

6. Jury 🔑31(10)—Prosecution in Forma Pauperis—Right to Jury Trial.

In such case, the denial of the petition merely depriving plaintiff of his right to a trial by jury and leaving him to a trial of his cause without a jury was a denial of remedy, as a party entitled to prosecute in forma pauperis is entitled to a trial by jury.

7. Costs 🔑132(4)—Prosecution in Forma Pauperis—Sufficiency of Petition.

Moving papers before the superior court, entitled "Notice of Motion for Leave to Sue in Forma Pauperis," were not misleading by reason of the misnomer, though it was in fact a motion for leave to further prosecute in forma pauperis.

8. Costs 🔑132(4)—Prosecution in Forma Pauperis—Moving Papers.

The moving papers were not imperfect because not defining what was meant by the request "for permission to prosecute the above-entitled action in forma pauperis," though the term "forma pauperis" is not used in the statutes.

9. Costs 🔑132(4)—Prosecution in Forma Pauperis—Sufficiency of Moving Papers.

The moving papers were not deficient in failing to specify the remission of just what fees was sought by plaintiff, where it was manifest that he sought the remission of all fees exacted by law.

10. Costs 🔑131 — Prosecution in Forma Pauperis—Right.

A party plaintiff, who had paid the original filing fees for the commencement of an action did not thereby bar himself of the right to make future application for a remission of subsequent fees.

11. Costs 🔑132(6)—Prosecution in Forma Pauperis—Affidavit of Merits.

To a petition by a plaintiff for leave to prosecute in forma pauperis, an affidavit of merits, declaring that plaintiff had stated the facts of his said suit to his attorney and was advised that he had a good, sufficient, and just cause of action against defendant, was sufficient, in view of the complaint showing a meritorious cause of action and of what might be shown by an amended affidavit.

In Bank. Application by Andrew Martin for writ of mandate directed against the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Alameda, Hon. T. W. Harris, Judge thereof, heard after order in District Court of Appeals, First District, refusing the mandate. Mandate issued.

Elwin B. Carson, of Oakland, and C. A. Linn, of San Francisco, for petitioner. D. C. Dutton, of Oakland, for respondents. Alden Ames, of San Francisco, for Legal Aid Society, as amicus curiæ.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff commenced this action in the superior court of the county of Alameda against Ergo A. Majors, to recover damages for the death of plaintiff's minor daughter, alleged to have been occasioned by the wrongful acts of Ergo A. Majors. After the commencement of this action this petitioner, who is a day-laborer, married and the father of ten minor children, all of whom are living and dependent upon him for support, sought leave of the court to be allowed to prosecute his action in forma pauperis. His application was supported by an affidavit to the effect that, saving for his chose in action, he was not possessed of more than $25, and that no one saving himself was interested in the successful prosecution of the action. The superior court denied his application. He sought by mandate from the Court of Appeal to secure an order directed to the superior court of Alameda county, compelling the latter court to grant his application. The court of appeal declined to issue the mandate, assigning no reasons for its order refusing to issue the writ. It was in effect a dismissal. Application then being made by petitioner to this court, an alternative writ of mandate was issued.

The fundamental question thus presented is of the right of the petitioner to proceed with the prosecution of his action in the superior court in forma pauperis, and therefore without the payment in advance of the legal fees. Certain minor subsidiary questions are raised by respondents, going to the asserted insufficiency of the papers filed in support of the application made to the superior court, but the principal answer of respondents is based upon our laws and their construction of those laws. Thus it is pointed out that by section 631 of the Code of Civil Procedure:

"Trial by jury may be waived by the several parties to an issue of fact in actions arising on contract or for the recovery of specific real or personal property. * * * 5. By failing, at the beginning of each day's session, to deposit with the clerk the jury fees and, if there be any, the mileage for such day."

Further, that the statutes of 1871–72 (Stat. 1871–72, p. 188) declare that in civil cases the party in whose favor verdict is rendered, before the same shall be entered, shall pay the jury fees, and that if in any trial in a civil case the jury be for any cause discharged without finding a verdict, the fees of the jury shall be paid by the party who demanded the jury. Still further, that section 4295 of the Political Code forbids state, county, and township officers from performing any service for which fees may be required (saving in proceedings on habeas corpus) without prepayment of such fees, excepting from the operation of this law only the state and any county, city, city and county, public officer, board or body acting in his or its official capacity, and that only upon the payment by any person of the fees required by law is it made the duty of the officer to perform the required services. And, finally, we are referred to a rule of the superior court of the county of Alameda to the following effect:

"In the trial of a civil action by a jury, each party is required daily, during the trial, at or before the case is called for trial each day, to deposit with the clerk the amount of money necessary to pay the jury fees, including mileage for such day and one-half of the reporter's fees. Out of the money so deposited the clerk shall pay the reporter's fees. The jury fees shall be paid out of the moneys deposited by the party who is required by the statutes of this state to pay the same. All moneys not required to be paid out pursuant to this rule shall be returned by the clerk to the party depositing the same."

We have thus been at pains to set forth all of the written law which respondents present, since it is by virtue of these laws that they insist that the order of the superior court of Alameda county refusing to grant petitioner's application was well founded. Indeed, they go further and assert that by virtue of these laws the court had no power to grant the application. Herein their argument is that the right of one so to commence, and, having commenced, to prosecute, his action in forma pauperis is a right unknown to the common law; it exists only by virtue of statute, and goes no further than the statute permits; that in the English law it owed its origin solely to statute. Next (so runs respondents' argument) our adoption of the English common law as the basis of our jurisprudence was an adoption of lex non scripta, the immemorial usage and custom out of which grew the common-law system, and therefore, the English statutes, however ancient, form no part of the body of that law. Finally the argument is that under the English law the authority of the court to waive fees under a pauper's application rested wholly upon statute and formed no part of the inherent common-law power of those courts. From this the conclusion is advanced, as being unescapable and controlling in the matter, that as our statutes have not in terms, nor yet by necessary implication, vested our courts with power to waive fees upon such poor man's petition, it cannot be done.

[1] Little need be said as to the meaning of the language of our Political Code (section 4468), which makes the common law of England, so far as it is not repugnant to nor inconsistent with our Constitution and laws, the rule of decision in all the courts of this state. Learned, indeed exhaustive, discussions of the matter will be found in 8 Cyc. 366, and the note in 30 (1913 Ed.) Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 1222, 1252. But as the matter seems to be seriously pressed upon the attention of this court, under the statement that we have not distinctly defined the meaning of this section of the Political Code, and as it is further said that our decisions adverting to the matter (such as People v. Vasquez, 9 Cal. App. 548, 99 Pac. 982; Ex parte Karlson, 160 Cal. 382, 117 Pac. 447, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 1334; Peters v. Peters, 156 Cal. 34, 103 Pac. 219, 23 L. R. A. [N. S.] 699; City of Pasadena v. Superior Court, 157 Cal. 794, 109 Pac. 620, 21 Ann. Cas. 1355; Estate of Sutro, 155 Cal. 733, 102 Pac. 920; McDaniel v. Cummings, 83 Cal. 518, 23 Pac. 795, 8 L. R. A. 575; Estate of Fair, 132 Cal. 534, 60 Pac. 442, 64 Pac. 1000, 84 Am. St. Rep. 70) point to the conclusion that the language of the section of the Political Code above mentioned is to be construed as referring solely to the lex non scripta, the common law unmodified by statute, it is here proper to say that such a view of our decisions is completely mistaken. It would be strange, indeed, if our Legislature should have designed to limit the applicability of the Code section to the ancient and frequently most barbarous rules and customs of the common law, and in so doing refuse to take into account the mitigation of their harshness and the broadening of the rules themselves which followed the successive enactments of the English statutes. To the contrary, we hold that our Legislature in its use of the phrase "common law" had in contemplation the whole body of that jurisprudence as it stood, influenced by statute, at the time when the Code section was adopted. And more than that, that it embraced also in its contemplation the great handmaiden and coadjutor of the common law, equity. And in exemplification of this we need but refer to the language of this court in Katz v. Walkinshaw, 141 Cal. 116, 70 Pac. 663, 74 Pac. 766, 64 L. R. A. 236, 99 Am. St. Rep. 35. Manifestly no harm can be done by this construction of the language of the Code, since that language itself limits the applicability of the common-law system to such of its rules and principles as are not repugnant to nor inconsistent with the spirit of our own law. And if we needed further support than that given by pure reason on so plain a proposition, it can be found in the similar construction which the Supreme Court of the United States has put upon the language of one of its own statutes, "saving to suitors in all cases the right of a common-law remedy where the common law is competent to give it." The Supreme Court of the United States construes this language not to be limited to remedies as they existed at common law, but to embrace such substituted remedies as might be provided by statute, and still further to such relief as equity might afford, equity being for this purpose considered as a branch of the common law. North Pacific Steamship Co. v. Industrial Accident Com., 163 Pac. 199, Knapp, Stout & Co. v. McCaffrey, 177 U. S. 638, 20 Sup. Ct. 824, 44 L. Ed. 921.

[2] But quite independently of this determination, there is still the controlling fact that the power of the English common-law courts to remit fees on petition in forma pauperis did not have its origin in any statute, but was in fact exercised as one of the inherent powers of the courts themselves, quite independently of statute. And this one would naturally expect to find since, imperfect as was the ancient common-law system, harsh as it was in many of its methods and measures, it would strike one with surprise to be credibly informed that the common-law courts of England shut their doors upon all poor suitors who could not pay fees, until Parliament came to their relief. Even greater would be the reproach to the system of jurisprudence of the state of California if it could be truly declared that in this twentieth century, by its Codes and statutes, it had said the same thing, and yet this is precisely the position which respondents to this application take.

Respondents do cite certain authorities, such as Hoey v. McCarthy, 124 Ind. 466, 24 N. E. 1038, Campbell v. Chicago & Northwestern Ry. Co., 23 Wis. 490, 11 Cyc. 200, where it is declared that this power rests upon statute, and therefore cannot be exercised saving under the statute. An examination satisfies us that this error in the declaration of these courts and others has arisen from a misconstruction of the language of Blackstone's Commentaries. He declares as follows:

> "And paupers, that is, such as will swear themselves not worth £5, are, by St. 11 Hen. VII, c. 12, to have original writs and subpœnas gratis, and counsel and attorney assigned them without fee; and are excused from paying costs, when plaintiffs, by St. 23 Hen. VIII, c. 15, but shall suffer other punishment at the discretion of the judges. And it was formerly usual to give such paupers, if nonsuited, their election either to be whipped or pay the costs: though that practice is now disused."

It will be noted that Blackstone does not found the existence of the power upon statute. He is merely discussing the exercise of the power under existing statutes, which is of course a wholly different matter. But a very brief review will establish that the power was an existent power, recognized and exercised before the enactment of these or other acts of Parliament. Thus says Marshall in his Law of Costs in all Suits and Proceedings in Courts of Common Law (page 347):

> "With a view to enable such poor persons as have not ability to pay the expenses incidental to the prosecution of an action to enforce their rights, they may, upon such inability being shown, be admitted to sue in forma pauperis. When so admitted the plaintiff is exempt from the payment of court fees, and he is entitled to the service of counsel, and of an attorney, who render their services without reward. This privilege, so far as regards the exemption from court fees, was conceded at common law; for where the plaintiff swore that he was unable to pay for entering his pleadings, the officer was bound to enter them gratis."

In the case of Mounford v. Pate (82 Eng. Rep., Full Reprint, p. 1093; s. c., 1 Keble's Rep., p. 913), the motion was made on behalf of a plaintiff applying in forma pauperis to be discharged of costs "there being none at common law and paupers thereby discharged." Discussion followed, and "the court agreed with Twisden that the continual practice being to assess costs, the plaintiff (in forma pauperis who has suffered nonsuit) must pay them or submit to be whipt at election." In Brunt v. Wardle, 133 English Reports, Full Reprint, 1254, the principal question before the justices was whether a plaintiff upon the institution of his action must make application to sue in forma pauperis, or whether such order could be made after the commencement of the action to enable a plaintiff to prosecute it in forma pauperis. Tindal, C. J., and his associate justices held that it was within the power of the court to make the order after the commencement of the action, the Chief Justice saying:

> "After all, is St. 11 H. 7, c. 12, anything more than confirmatory of the common law? In the learned report of the Serjeants' Case by my Brother Manning, p. 41, note (d), a case is referred to that occurred in the 15 Ed. 4, 20 years before the passing of that act, from which it appears that at common law if a party would swear that he could not pay for entering his pleadings, the officer was bound to enter them gratis; and that in this court there was a presignator pur les poers. It seems to me that the proper conclusion for us to come to is that this plaintiff was entitled to be admitted to sue in forma pauperis, pendente lite, and that the rule must be discharged,"

—and Maule, J., added:

> "I am also of opinion that this rule should be discharged. The objection to the order of my Brother Coltman is that the court has no power to admit a party to sue in forma pauperis, pendente lite; and the objection is sought to be supported by the recent decisions in the Court of Exchequer. Those decisions, however, are open to the observations which have been already made—that they were cases relating to costs, and that the attention of the court does not appear to have been called to the undoubted common-law authority of the court to admit parties to sue in forma pauperis. The authority cited by my lord from the Serjeants' Case shows that so early as St. 15 Ed. 4, it was the established practice to admit a party to sue in forma pauperis, and various instances are to be found in the books of parties being so admitted after the commencement of the suit."

This case, decided so recently as 1841, may well be regarded as conclusive in its construction of the common law of England and controlling upon our section of the Code making that law the basis of our jurisprudence, and this quite apart from any consideration of the modifications of the common law of England worked by acts of Parliament.

[3] It is pointed out that our Code of Civil Procedure (section 91) makes express provision for the right of a suitor in a justice court to prosecute such an action in forma pauperis, while no such express provision of our statute is made applicable to our courts of record. Thus section 91 of the Code of Civil Procedure declares that the payment of fees in advance—

> "shall not be exacted from parties who may prove to the satisfaction of the presiding justice that they have a good cause of action and that they are not of sufficient pecuniary ability to pay the legal fees."

Again we say that it would be an unmerited reproach cast upon the legislative branch of our state government to hold that it meant to permit a suitor to prosecute his action in forma pauperis in a justice court, where the amount involved could not be large nor the consequences of the litigation great, and yet designed to forbid such a poor suitor from prosecuting his action according to the laws of the land in a court of record, where rights might and could be all-important and his recovery of the utmost consequences. No such reproach justly attaches. It is quite plain that the Legislature, recognizing the power of courts of record to admit suitors in forma pauperis, designed to save all question in the case of inferior courts not exercising common-law jurisdiction, and that it is for this reason that the power which exists in our courts of general jurisdiction without statute is expressly conferred upon the inferior courts of limited jurisdiction.

[4] With the power in our superior courts thus declared, to admit suitors to commence, or, having commenced, to prosecute, their actions in forma pauperis in all proper cases, the next consideration is whether or not the Legislature has by its enactments designed to curtail that power. Quite aside from the question as to the power of the Legislature to do this thing, it is obvious that only the plainest declaration of legislative intent would be construed as even an effort to do this thing. We find no such expressed intent. All of the statutes dealing with the payment and prepayment of fees, such as section 4295 of the Political Code, are general in their nature, and have to do with the orderly collection and disposition of the fees, payment or prepayment of which is prescribed by law. Neither individually nor collectively are they even susceptible of the construction that the design of the Legislature was to deny to the courts the exercise of their most just and most necessary inherent power. They have applicability to all cases where the court has not, in the exercise of that power, remitted the payment of the fees on behalf of a poor suitor, and in every instance the court's order to this effect is sufficient warrant to every officer charged with the collection of fees to omit the performance of that duty in the specified case.

[5, 6] Our next consideration is the narrow one of objections urged by respondents to the sufficiency of the petitioner's moving papers addressed to the superior court. Certain of these appear in the verified return of the judge of that court. The plaintiff's verified petition before the superior court declared that no person other than himself had any interest in the successful prosecution of the action. The judge's return declares that he had information and belief to the effect that the attorneys for the plaintiff had a contingent interest, being a contingent fee, in the successful outcome of the litigation, and that for this added reason the plaintiff's application was refused. But if it be conceded that issue was here joined upon the direct averment of plaintiff's petition, something more is required as to the nature, source, origin, and soundness of the court's belief, before its order can be upheld on this ground. This showing is not made. Yet in view of the fact that the attorneys for the plaintiff were before the superior court, it could most easily have been made. Next it is said that plaintiff was not remediless, since the order of the court refusing to grant his application deprived him merely of his right to a trial by jury, but left open to him the trial of his cause without a jury. Little need be said to show the inadequacy of such a response. Where the suitor was allowed to prosecute in forma pauperis, all the rights which were open to him upon the payment of fees were open to him by virtue of the order, and every officer was required to perform his duty without the payment of fees as fully as though the legal fees had been paid. Precisely as anciently such a plaintiff in forma pauperis was entitled to prosecute his action "after the course of the common law," so in this state he is equally entitled to prosecute his action under our Constitution and laws, and the right of trial by jury is one of the most important of these. Therefore we will not say that a suitor who can pay court fees shall have his trial by jury, and the suitor who cannot pay court fees must be content to go to trial without a jury. The law does not say this, and we will not read such a declaration into the law.

[7-11] Respondents' final contention is that petitioner's moving papers before the superior court were defective: (1) They were entitled "Notice of Motion for Leave to Sue in Forma Pauperis," whereas in fact it was not a motion for leave to sue, but a motion for leave further to prosecute the action in forma pauperis. Suffice it here to say that the misnomer could have misled, and in fact did mislead, nobody. (2) The moving papers were imperfect in not defining what was meant by the request "for permission to prosecute the above-entitled action in forma pauperis," since the phrase "in forma pauperis" is not used in the statutes of this state. But we cannot yield acquiescence to the suggestion that the learned judge or the learned attorneys for the defendant did not fully understand the meaning of this Latin phrase so prequently employed in the common law. (3) The moving papers are said to be deficient in failing to specify the remission of just what fees was sought by plaintiff. It seems quite manifest that he sought, as he had the right to seek, the remission of all fees exacted by law. (4) It is said that there was a failure to show that the application was seasonably made. What we are to understand by this is not made plain. We have shown, and indeed quoted from the decisions showing, that the right to prosecute in forma pauperis was fully recognized with the right to commence an action in forma pauperis. The right here sought is the right to prosecute after the plaintiff had paid the original filing fees for the commencement of the action. Certainly by having paid this first fee he did not debar himself of the right to make future application for a remission of subsequent fees. (5) The application was accompanied by an affidavit of merits made by plaintiff, and declaring:

> "That he has stated the facts of his said suit to said C. A. Linn, Esq., attorney at law, and is advised that he has a good, sufficient, and just cause of action against the defendant."

Such cases as Nickerson v. California Raisin Co., 61 Cal. 268, People v. Larue, 66 Cal. 235, 5 Pac. 157, and Jensen v. Dorr, 9 Cal. App. 18, 98 Pac. 45, are relied on in support of the deficiency of this affidavit of merits. The cases are in point, but to support such an application as this, an affidavit of merits going to the justice and sufficiency of the cause of action is not called for by our law, nor was it called for by the common law. At common law the unfortunate suitor whose cause of action proved to be nonmeritorious stood liable to be "whipt." Further, we are advised that the attention of the superior court was not in any way directed to this asserted insufficiency in the affidavit of merits. An amended affidavit could and would doubtless have been filed. Moreover, the case was at issue on matters of fact, and there was a sufficient showing in the complaint at least of a meritorious cause of action. Therefore, while the court may call for a sufficient affidavit of merits, or indeed for any other form of satisfactory evidence before issuing its order allowing an action to be commenced in forma pauperis, the need of such supporting affidavit becomes very much less when, as in this case, the action has been brought and is at issue on its facts. Nor would such a defective affidavit of merits justify the court in refusing to the poor suitor the relief sought, if in all other respects he was entitled to it, without at least giving him an opportunity to present an affidavit measuring up to the requirements of the law.

For these reasons we hold that the court erred in refusing to grant the order prayed for. Let mandate issue accordingly.

SHAW, J. (concurring). I concur in the judgment and in all of the opinion of Mr. Justice HENSHAW, except the statements to the effect that the "common law of England," referred to in section 4468 of the Political Code as the rule of decision in this state where not repugnant to or inconsistent with our written law, includes that law "as it stood influenced by statute, at the time when the Code section was adopted"; that is, on April 13, 1850. (Stat. 1850, p. 219.) This proposition, as the opinion shows, is not necessary to the decision, for the right to sue in forma pauperis existed at common law in England before any statutes regulatory thereof were enacted. In 1850 there were in England, I have no doubt, many general acts of Parliament in force which no one would claim were adopted as parts of our law by the act of our Legislature. The statement of what is included by that section needs more qualification and elaboration than is given to it in the main opinion. I think it inadvisable to attempt to state any rule on the subject, except in cases where it is necessarily involved.

TENNYSON v. BEGGS (DREISCHMEYER, Intervener). (S. F. 7558.)

1. HUSBAND AND WIFE 🔑268(2)—COMMUNITY PROPERTY — MINGLING OF PROPERTY — DEBTS OF HUSBAND.

Where a husband owned a prune orchard, which was community property, and the wife owned an adjoining orchard which was her separate property, and the husband managed and controlled the entire property, sold the prunes, and took the cash proceeds and a note for the balance payable to himself, there being no fraud on creditors, the share of the wife did not become community property subject to payment of his debts.

2. HUSBAND AND WIFE 🔑270(8)—MINGLING OF PERSONALTY—PAYMENTS—PRESUMPTIONS.

Where the proceeds of a wife's property become mingled with the money of the husband, and payments are made by the husband, it will be presumed that he intended to pay out of his share, and the share of the wife will be included in the remainder.

3. BANKRUPTCY 🔑295—MINGLED FUNDS—JURISDICTION OF STATE COURTS.

Where a trustee in bankruptcy brings action in the superior court against a debtor of the bankrupt, and bankrupt's wife intervenes, claiming ownership of the fund sued for, and it appears that a portion of the fund belonged to her, the superior court had jurisdiction to apportion the fund; its jurisdiction being at least equal to and concurrent with the United States, as, in contemplation of law, the share never belonged to the bankrupt.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. R. Welch, Judge.

Action by D. D. Tennyson, trustee in bankruptcy for Frank L. Dreischmeyer, against Will M. Beggs; Carrie N. Dreischmeyer, intervener. Judgment rendered, and defendant and intervener both appeal. Affirmed.

Louis Oneal, of San Jose, for plaintiff. R. C. McComish, of San Jose, for defendant. S. G. Tompkins, of San Jose, for intervener.

SHAW, J. The plaintiff sued the defendant Beggs to recover the sum of $2,750, alleged to be in his possession and control, belonging to the said Frank L. Dreischmeyer, who had been theretofore adjudged a bankrupt by the United States district court. Carrie N. Dreischmeyer, the wife of Frank, filed a complaint in intervention, alleging that the money in the hands of Beggs belonged to her and was her separate property. Beggs appeared and answered both the complaint and the complaint in intervention. The court made findings to the effect that of the sum of $2,750 which it found was held by Beggs, $1,480.75 belonged to the intervener, less $148.07, which it found was due from the intervener to said Beggs, and that $1,269.25 thereof belonged to said Frank L. Dreischmeyer and should be paid to the plaintiff as trustee in bankruptcy, less the sum of $359.93 due from said bankrupt to Beggs for services previously performed. Judgment was given accordingly. From this judgment Beggs and the intervener have each appealed.

Beggs has made no appearance upon this appeal and has filed no brief. The controversy is between the intervener and the plaintiff. The facts are as follows:

Carrie N. Dreischmeyer was the owner of 5½ acres of land as her separate estate. Her husband owned 15 acres adjoining, which was community property. The entire tract had been planted in prune trees, which were in full bearing. The husband managed and controlled the entire property. He sold the crop of prunes on both tracts for the year 1912 to one Pavlicevich for the sum of $5,250, of which he paid $2,500 in cash, giving his note for the remaining $2,750. It is this note which gave rise to the controversy. On June 9, 1913, the husband assigned this note to his wife without consideration, except such as may be inferred from the fact that the prunes from her land were a part of the consideration of the note. The next day Pavlicevich, at the husband's request, took up the latter note and in consideration thereof executed a new one to the wife for the same amount. Soon afterwards the wife indorsed and delivered this note for collection to Beggs by the following indorsement:

> "Pay to W. M. Beggs, or order, without recourse upon or any responsibility to me except for what is my separate property. C. N. Dreischmeyer."

Beggs collected the entire sum due upon the note and still retains the same. Upon the trial evidence was given to the effect that the prune crop upon the 5½ acres belonging to the wife was worth as much as $1,500 of the $5,250 for which the entire crop was sold, and also to the effect that the crop upon the 5½ acres was larger proportionally than that upon the 14 acres belonging to the husband. Upon this the court below concluded that the wife was entitled to resort to the balance of the fund received by her husband for the entire crop, and to have a trust therein declared and enforced in her favor to the extent of her share in the entire prune crop at the price paid by Pavlicevich, to wit, $1,480.75. Thereupon the court awarded to the wife the said sum as her portion of the proceeds of the crop, and the remainder thereof to the plaintiff as trustee in bankruptcy, as the proportion of her husband therein.

[1, 2] The plaintiff contends that by the conduct of the husband and wife, whereby he took control of the entire property and sold it for a lump sum, taking the cash proceeds himself, and a note payable to himself for the remainder, he so mingled the separate property of the wife with the community property that it became community property, subject to payment of his debts, and that it therefore passed to the trustee in bankruptcy. We do not think this contention is well founded. There was no fraud or deceit practiced upon the creditors, so far as it appears, and no reason in equity and justice why the wife should not now have her share of the proceeds of her own property out of the fund in the hands of Beggs, produced by the sale thereof. Under the well-settled rules of equity concerning such matters, the payments made by the husband out of the common fund will be attributed to his share thereof, or it will be presumed that he intended them to come out of his share, and the share of the wife, as beneficiary, will be held to be included in the amount remaining. People v. California Safe Deposit & Trust Co. (S. F. No. 8088) 167 Pac. 181, 388, decided August 27, 1917; Elizalde v. Elizalde, 137 Cal. 634, 66 Pac. 369, 70 Pac. 861. This doctrine governs the case, and the action of the court below is justified by it.

There is no merit in the claim that the court did not properly apportion the fund. The facts already stated show that the husband's creditors will receive their full share of the proceeds of the property.

[3] It is further urged that the superior court has no jurisdiction to determine the matter, but that the entire fund should be paid over to the trustee in bankruptcy, for distribution and apportionment by the District Court of the United States, after further investigation by that court. We see no ground for his contention. The trustee himself presented his claims to the state court and asked its decision thereon. He alleged that the property belonged to the bankrupt, and thereby presented that matter to that court for determination. The intervener took issue thereon, and alleged that she was the owner of the fund. The evidence shows that she is the owner of a part thereof. In contemplation of law, therefore, the share adjudged to her never belonged to the husband, and neither the bankrupt court, nor the trustee in bankruptcy, has any jurisdiction over it. The state court is as competent to determine the question of title to the fund sued for as is the District Court of the United States, and its jurisdiction to do the same is at least equal to and concurrent with that of the District Court. We find no error in the judgment appealed from.

The judgment is affirmed, with judgment against the plaintiff for intervener's costs of appeal.

We concur: SLOSS, J.; LAWLOR, J.

BLANC v. DE LATOUR. (Civ. 2120.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Aug. 31, 1917.)

APPEAL AND ERROR ⚷1011(1) — REVIEW — FINDINGS.

Findings on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George E. Crothers, Judge.

Action by J. E. Blanc against George De Latour. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Sterling Carr, of San Francisco, for appellant. P. A. Bergerot and A. P. Dessouslavy, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This action was brought to recover the amount of a note for $586.87, dated June 27, 1914, and payable 90 days thereafter, executed by defendant to plaintiff. Its execution, delivery, and nonpayment are not denied, but defendant in his answer alleges that the note was given in part payment of the purchase price of a stock of goods in New York City, in which transaction the plaintiff falsely represented that he had purchased said stock of goods for the benefit of the defendant, paying therefor a certain sum, when in fact he had paid for it some $1,500 less than the sum represented. It is also alleged in the defendant's pleading that the note was without consideration. Plaintiff, on the other hand, in his answer to the cross-complaint, denies that the note was without consideration, or that any fraud was practiced upon the defendant in the transaction concerning the purchase and sale of said stock of goods. He also avers that the note formed no part of that transaction, but was given as evidence of an indebtedness between the parties which sprang from an entirely different business dealing.

As to the issues in the case thus framed by the pleadings it is sufficient to say that while there is evidence in the record to support defendant's view of the case, on the other hand there is also evidence to sustain plaintiff's contention. This latter the trial court adopted. Being based upon conflicting evidence, this appellate court, under the rule well settled in this state, will not interfere with such court's finding and its appropriate judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

HANCOCK v. HUNT, County Treasurer, et al. (Civ. 2335.)

INTEREST ⟹50—EFFECT AS STOPPING INTEREST—TENDER OF INHERITANCE TAX—STATUTES.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 1498, 1499, providing that when a debtor is entitled to the performance of a condition precedent to, or concurrent with, performance on his part, he may make his offer dependent upon the due performance of such condition, and that a debtor has a right to require from his creditor a written receipt for any property tendered in the performance of his obligation, and under section 1504, providing that an offer of payment duly made, though title to the thing offered be not transferred, stops the running of interest on the obligation, where the executor and devisee of testatrix, the superior court having fixed the amount of the inheritance tax, pending appeal taken by the state, tendered the county treasurer in lawful money of the United States the amount of the tax as fixed by the superior court, but refused to deliver the money because the county treasurer tendered a receipt in terms "subject to appeal now pending from above order of said superior court to the Supreme Court of the state of California," the treasurer's absolute and unwarranted refusal of the money tendered stopped the running of interest on the amount fixed by the order.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Lewis R. Works, Judge.

Application for writ of mandate by G. Allan Hancock, individually and as executor of the estate of Hancock Ross, deceased, against John N. Hunt, Treasurer of Los Angeles County, and John S. Chambers, Controller of the State of California. From an order denying the writ, applicant appeals. Order reversed.

Chandler P. Ward and Stephens & Stephens, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. Robert A. Waring, of Sacramento, and John W. Carrigan and Edwin H. Pennock, both of Los Angeles (U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., of counsel), for respondents.

SHAW, J. The facts upon which the superior court made its order denying petitioner's application for the writ of mandate, and from which order he appeals, are as follows: Ida Hancock Ross died on March 15, 1913, leaving an estate of inheritance to G. Allan Hancock, petitioner herein. For the purpose of fixing the amount of tax which should be paid upon the estate so inherited, a proceeding was instituted in the superior court to determine the value thereof, in which contest the court, on February 27, 1914, made an order fixing the amount of such tax at $159,354.90, which order, on an appeal taken by the state prior to September, 1914, was affirmed. 171 Cal. 64, 151 Pac. 1138. Under the provisions of the Inheritance Tax Act, the 18 months within which such tax might be paid without interest or penalty expired on September 15, 1914. On September 8, 1914, after the perfecting of the appeal, petitioner served upon the proper officers and agents of the state an offer in writing—

> "to pay to the state of California the sum of $159,354.90 as payment in full of the inheritance tax due to the state of California upon the interest inherited by the undersigned, G. Allan Hancock, in the estate of said deceased and under the last will and testament of said deceased, said sum of $159,354.90 having been fixed as the tax due to the state of California upon the said inheritance by an order of the superior court of the county of Los Angeles, state of California, duly made in the above-entitled matter on February 27, 1914. You will further take notice that in the city of Los Angeles on the 14th day of September, 1914, the undersigned will formally offer and tender said sum of $159,354.90 to John N. Hunt, the treasurer of Los Angeles county, as payment in full of the inheritance tax due to the state of California on said inheritance of the undersigned, G. Allan Hancock, from the estate of, and under the last will and testament of, Ida Hancock Ross, deceased; and will demand a valid receipt in full for said tax."

Pursuant to this notice and on the day specified therein, petitioner did tender to the county treasurer, in lawful money of the United States, said sum of $159,354.90 as payment of the inheritance tax due to the state of California on the property inherited by him from the estate of Ida Hancock Ross under the terms of her will, and demanded "a valid receipt in full for said tax" so ascertained and fixed by order of the court, in response to which demand the county treasurer tendered to him a receipt in the usual form and containing the usual data, except that across the face of the receipt was written the following:

> "Subject to appeal now pending from above order of said superior court to the Supreme Court of the state of California, made by John S. Chambers as state controller," etc.

Petitioner objected to the form of the receipt and refused to deliver the money subject to the condition so imposed, and which respondent Hunt refused to accept otherwise than subject thereto. On October 22, 1915, upon the coming down of the remittitur pursuant to the order of the Supreme Court on affirmance of the appeal so had by the state, petitioner paid the principal sum of the tax as fixed by the court, upon which he received a receipt in the usual form, except that it contained conditions to the effect that its acceptance should in no way prejudice the right of the state to collect interest and penalties imposed by the Inheritance Tax Act for nonpayment of said tax within 18 months from the date of the death of said Ida Hancock Ross, or prejudice the right of petitioner to maintain that said payment constitutes a full satisfaction in payment of said tax, nor prejudice him in attempting to obtain a receipt in full for the tax.

It thus appears that the real controversy is whether or not the state is entitled to interest upon the principal sum so fixed by the court as due upon the inheritance of petitioner; his contention being that the tender so made by him, under the authority of Ferrea v. Tubbs, 125 Cal. 687, 58 Pac. 308, released him from all liability to pay interest thereon, notwithstanding the fact that the state refused to receive the same save and except upon the condition named. In our opinion, this contention should be sustained. The obligation of petitioner had been ascertained and fixed by an order of court. In performance of this obligation he tendered the full amount thereof, and under the provisions of sections 1498 and 1499 of the Civil Code he was entitled, as a condition of delivery, to a valid receipt showing such payment. "If the debtor tender a sufficient amount of money, he is entitled to a receipt in full, and may couple his tender with a demand for such receipt." Ferrea v. Tubbs, supra. The tender so made was free of conditions other than those which appellant was entitled to exact, viz. "a valid receipt" in full of the sum so tendered in payment of the judgment. This being true, the case is brought within the provisions of section 1504, Civil Code, which provides that:

> "An offer of payment * * * duly made, though the title to the thing offered be not transferred to the creditor, stops the running of interest on the obligation, and has the same effect upon all its incidents as a performance thereof."

In the Tubbs Case the plaintiff recovered a judgment from which he appealed, pending which the defendant tendered the full amount thereof "as payment in full." Plaintiff refused to accept it, and upon affirmance of the judgment insisted upon payment of interest to the date of the filing of the remittitur. The court held that the tender, though not accepted, stopped the running of interest. The principle there announced finds approval in the subsequent cases of Wadleigh v. Phelps, 149 Cal. 627, 87 Pac. 93, and Stein v. Leeman, 161 Cal. 502, 119 Pac. 663. The facts in the Tubbs Case are identical with those here involved, except that here the state was appellant, to which as such litigant, however, the same rule is applicable. Concededly, since there would have been no subject of controversy left, an acceptance of the tender would have constituted ground for motion to dismiss the appeal; hence the provision that respondent insisted upon inserting in the receipt to the effect that the judgment debtor should waive the exercise of such right. We are directed to no rule of law, statutory or otherwise, under which a party appealing from a judgment in his favor may nullify the legal effect of a tender of payment duly made pending appeal, by a refusal to accept it unless the judgment debtor will agree to waive a right resulting from acceptance thereof. No authority existed for exacting the condition which the state sought to attach to its acceptance of payment. The tender was unconditional, save that the obligor, as he had the right to do, demanded the delivery of a valid receipt concurrent with delivery of the money. The judgment creditor refused to give the receipt to which appellant was entitled, or any receipt other than one nullifying the incidental effect of payment, thus by its own act preventing payment of the judgment. Such act was equivalent to an absolute and unwarranted refusal of the money tendered and, upon the authorities cited, stopped the running of interest on the amount fixed by the order. This sum has been paid, and it follows that petitioner is entitled to a writ of mandate as prayed for, requiring the respondents to execute and deliver to him a valid receipt in the usual form adopted in such cases, showing such payment.

The order of the court denying the writ is reversed.

PEOPLE v. FRISBIE. (Cr. 400.)

INTOXICATING LIQUORS ⚷236(11) — SALE—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Evidence held sufficient to support a finding that a transfer of liquor was a sale, and not a mere accommodation.

Appeal from Superior Court, Glenn County; W. M. Finch, Judge.

Cyrus Adelbert Frisbie was convicted of crime and appeals. Affirmed.

W. T. Belieu, of Willows, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BURNETT, J. Defendant was convicted under an indictment charging that he did "willfully and unlawfully furnish, sell, distribute and give away to one Joe Street, a human being, alcoholic liquors, to wit, whisky" in the town of Willows, Glenn county; it being no-license territory.

The only point made by appellant is that the evidence fails to show any violation of the Wylie law (St. 1911, p. 599), in that it appears that:

> "There was no sale, but on the contrary the testimony will show that what was done by Frisbie was a mere act of accommodation on his part in delivering the liquor in question to the state's witness, Joe Street."

It must be admitted that defendant and Street so testified, but reading between the lines we are impressed with more than a mere suspicion that this contention involves a mere subterfuge, that it was a simulated defense, an afterthought and the product of a collusive understanding reached upon the suggestion of appellant. Such inference is fairly deducible from this portion of Street's testimony:

"Q. Were you at Mr. Goddard's place last night? A. Yes, sir. Q. Was Mr. Frisbie there?

A. Yes, sir. Q. Did Mr. Frisbie ask you in substance to say that he was your agent? A. Well, I will tell you. He asked me this question. He says, 'Do you remember, Joe, the time that you sent up by me to get that whisky for you, that two bottles of whisky?' and I stopped and studied a minute, and I said, 'I believe I do, Bert; I believe I do remember about sending up by you to get the two bottles of whisky,' and he said, 'Will you swear to that effect?' and I said, 'I will swear to it as it comes along as I am asked that question.' I says, 'If I am asked that question I will swear to it that I did send by you to get two bottles of whisky and only paid you for one at the time being. I give you one dollar and a half, and of course the other last bottle I had not paid him for.' * * * He said, 'That will make me an agent for you.' "

It may be said also that there are some inconsistencies and contradictions in the testimony of these witnesses that cast suspicion upon their explanation of the transaction, and we think the jury were not unwarranted in holding that there was an actual sale by appellant to Street of the two bottles of whisky. Aside from that, in stating what occurred at the time he received one of the bottles, Street testified:

"There was no words spoken. I laid the money down on the writing desk and there was a bottle standing on the end of the writing desk, and I laid down the money and put the bottle in my pocket, and he laid down the change and I put that in my pocket, and he said, 'You better have a drink before you go,' and he treated me to a couple of drinks, and treated my friend, and we walked out."

It thus appears that appellant furnished Street with liquor that was not contained in said bottle. That it was whisky and belonged to appellant also sufficiently appears. Indeed, the language as to treating would, of course, imply a gift from appellant to Street. It is also true that Street was not a guest. This evidence brought out on cross-examination is sufficient to satisfy the charge of the indictment, and hence the question of agency as to the liquor furnished in the bottle is not of controlling moment.

We think the conviction was just, and the judgment and order are affirmed.

WALLACE et al. v. MacDONOUGH THEATER CO. et al. (Civ. 2147.)

1. NUISANCE 🔑75—INJUNCTION—SPECIAL DAMAGES TO PLAINTIFFS—STATUTE.

Under Civ. Code, § 3493, providing that a private person may maintain an action for a public nuisance especially injurious to himself, but not otherwise, a complaint by negro plaintiffs for injunction against the exhibition of a motion picture as a nuisance, which merely alleged that its exhibition would tend to cause general race hatred between the white and negro races, but did not state any facts showing that plaintiffs suffered any peculiar or special damages by reason of the exhibition, was demurrable, though it alleged that it was specially injurious to plaintiffs.

2. PLEADING 🔑8(20)—CONCLUSION OF LAW—INJUNCTION SUIT.

In an action to enjoin as a public nuisance the exhibition of a motion picture film, the allegation of the complaint that the exhibition was especially injurious to plaintiffs was a mere conclusion of law.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; T. W. Harris, E. J. Brown, Wm. H. Waste, Wm. S. Wells, Wm. H. Donahue, Judges sitting en banc.

Action by Father D. R. Wallace and others against the MacDonough Theater Company and others. From a judgment for defendants on demurrer to the complaint, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Lawrence Sledge and Glesner Fowler, both of Oakland, for appellants. Rose & Silverstein, of Oakland, for respondents.

KERRIGAN, J. By this action an injunction was sought against the defendants, restraining and enjoining them from exhibiting a moving picture or photoplay known as "The Clansman" or "The Birth of a Nation." It is the claim of the plaintiffs that such exhibition constitutes a nuisance; that it is indecent and offensive to the moral senses of plaintiffs, and especially injurious to them for the reason that the play holds them up to public ridicule and contumely. Defendants demurred thereto, and the superior court of Alameda county sitting en banc sustained such demurrer, entered judgment thereon, and this appeal is from such judgment.

By such demurrer it is first alleged that the complaint does not state a cause of action for the reason that it is based upon the theory that the pictures shown constitute a public nuisance, and that there is no allegation that the plaintiffs sustained any special or particular injury by reason of their production. As a further ground of demurrer defendants alleged that the trial court was without jurisdiction to hear the matter for the reason that the moving picture censor of the city of Oakland, the place in which the picture was exhibited, had determined the question adversely to plaintiffs' contention, and that its action in that behalf was binding upon the court.

[1] With reference to the first objection it appears that the complaint simply alleges that the exhibition of the picture would tend to cause general race hatred between the white and negro races, but nowhere does it state any facts which show that plaintiffs suffered any peculiar or special damage by reason of the exhibition or any different injury than would be suffered by other members of the negro race. The complaint is predicated upon the theory that the pictures constitute a public nuisance, and it is well established that private parties seeking to restrain or abate a public nuisance must show some special injury to themselves aside from and independent of the general injury to the public, and in the absence of such showing private persons will be denied an injunction. Our Code in substance so provides. Civ. Code, § 3493.

[2] Nor does the mere allegation, as here, that it is especially injurious to the plaintiffs, change the rule; such recital being held to be a mere conclusion of law. Spring Valley Water Works v. Fifield, 136 Cal. 14, 68 Pac. 108.

It follows that the complaint herein does not state a cause of action against the defendants which justifies plaintiffs in invoking the relief sought. This being so, we deem it unnecessary to discuss the other grounds of demurrer.

Judgment affirmed.

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT ⚷291(13)—MODIFICATION ON LEASE—EVIDENCE.
Evidence held sufficient to support a finding that a written agreement to repay lessee a certain portion of the rent, as it was paid, on account of unsettled business conditions, was not a modification of the lease, but was a temporary agreement.

2. LANDLORD AND TENANT ⚷290(3) — CONSTRUCTION OF BUILDINGS — INDEMNITY TO TENANT—ACTION FOR RENT.
An agreement to indemnify a lessee for losses on account of buildings put up on a long lease, due to unsettled business conditions, cannot be set up in defense of an action of detainer for rent, because the loss could not be determined until the end of the lease.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Everett J. Brown, Judge.

Action by Joanna M. Driscoll and Thomas A. Driscoll against J. S. Myers and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and J. S. Myers appeals. Affirmed.

H. B. Griffith, of San Francisco, and L. D. Manning and Gibson & Woolner, all of Oakland, for appellant. Neal Power and Snook & Church, all of Oakland (J. C. Flannery, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

LENNON, P. J. In this action of unlawful detainer, the plaintiff had judgment from which the defendant appeals. The action was defended upon the theory that the defendant was holding under an alleged modification of the original lease, and that he was not in default of the terms thereof.

Briefly stated, the facts of the case are these: On October 15, 1906, one McFadden, plaintiffs' predecessor in interest, as lessor and J. S. Myers, the defendant, as lessee, entered into a written lease of certain real property for a term of 15 years, commencing January 1, 1907, and ending December 31, 1921. At the time of the execution of the lease, the demised premises consisted of an unimproved lot of land in the city of Oakland for which graduated rentals were provided to be paid in increasing amounts as follows:

> "$100 per month for each of the first thirty months; $120 per month for each of the second thirty months; $160 per month for each of the third thirty months; $225 per month for each of the fourth thirty months; $260 per month for each of the fifth thirty months, and $275 per month for each of the sixth and last thirty months thereof."

There was no agreement or obligation on the part of the lessee to improve the lot, but the lease in terms provided:

> "That said lessee * * * agrees that all buildings and improvements that may be erected or put upon said premises shall be at his own cost and expense, and shall thenceforth remain thereon as an inseparable part of said premises and kept by him generally in repair, and shall continue and be the property of said lessor upon the determination of this lease."

The lessor McFadden died testate August 5, 1911, and plaintiff Thomas A. Driscoll was appointed and qualified as executor of his estate. On July 9, 1912, the demised premises were distributed to plaintiffs by a decree duly made and entered in the estate of McFadden.

It appears that on August 2, 1909, McFadden executed to the defendant the following writing, which, it is contended, constituted the alleged modification of the lease:

> "August 2, 1909.
> "Mr. J. S. Myers: I think that this memorandum will be satisfactory to you for the time being in reference to the lease made by myself and you on the property on the northwest corner of Grove and 22nd streets, Oakland, California. I realize that this lease was entered into at a time when business conditions and rental values were more prosperous than at present. I do not care to make permanent changes in reference to the lease at this time; but if you will send the rent each month according to the terms of the lease, I will call upon you every two or three months and will examine the account and make up and pay you an amount which will be equal to one-third of the total income on the property, until such time as conditions become more settled as to permanent rental values. It is my intention, and I agree, that during the life of said lease, you shall not lose more than approximately one-third of the cost of the improvements, repairs, and necessary expenses.
> "[Signed] B. McFadden.
> "This agreement is satisfactory and I agree to the same. [Signed] J. S. Myers."

The defendant regularly paid McFadden the rental reserved in the lease, save during a period of 13 months, commencing October 1, 1909, and ending October 1, 1910. During this period the defendant paid $100 per month instead of $120 per month, as called for by the lease. Upon the termination of this period, the defendant resumed the payment of the rental in the amounts reserved in the lease, and continued to pay the same up to and including the month of December, 1913. Since then the defendant has failed and refused to pay any rental at all upon the ground that if an accounting were had pursuant to the terms of the alleged modification of the lease, it would be found that the defendant was not in default, and that the plaintiffs were indebted to him.

[1] The trial court found, among other things, that the writing in question was not executed as, and was never intended by the parties thereto to be, a modification of the lease, and that the abatement of the rental reserved therein to the extent of $20 per month from October 1, 1909, to October 1, 1910, was not made by McFadden under and pursuant to the terms of the alleged modification.

These findings are assailed upon the ground that they are not supported by the evidence. This is the only question necessary to be considered, for if, as we are convinced, the evidence supports these findings, they in turn will alone suffice to support the judgment, and therefore we need not determine the remaining question as to whether or not the further finding of the trial court that there was no consideration for the alleged modification is supported by the evidence.

That the abatement of the rent was not made because of the alleged modification of the lease is evidenced in part by the undisputed facts revealed by the evidence that no abatement of the rent immediately followed its execution, and that none was allowed until October 1, 1909, which was some two months subsequent to its execution.

That the abatement of the rent was the result of an understanding apart from the execution of the alleged modification is fairly inferable from the further fact that on November 16, 1909, which was just about two weeks subsequent to the first abatement of the rent, the defendant in a letter written by him to McFadden said:

> "I want to thank you very kindly for the consideration you have shown in the adjustment of the rent, and I assure you that I intend to treat you fairly and justly. In making this lease I simple overbid the value of the land when conditions were booming, I expect to lose pretty heavily, but that is no fault of yours."

Added to this, the record shows the admitted fact that after the expiration of the 13 months, during which the rent was abated, and up to and including December 31, 1913, the defendant resumed payment of the rent in the several amounts reserved in the lease, and this fact tends most strongly to negative the idea that the abatement of the rent was anything more than a mere temporary adjustment, and fortifies the conclusion that it was not made and allowed pursuant to any agreement or understanding of the parties embodied in the alleged modification of the lease.

Upon its face the writing in question shows affirmatively that it was never executed as, or intended to be, a permanent modification of the lease, for it is expressly declared therein that McFadden did not at that time "make any permanent changes in reference to the lease."

Moreover, there is the testimony of defendant to the fact that neither he nor McFadden ever construed and considered the writing in qustion to be a permanent modification of the lease. Indeed, he could not say otherwise in the face of the undisputed fact that at all times subsequent to the execution of the alleged modification, save during the period that the rent was abated, he paid the rent called for in the lease, and thereafter repeatedly importuned plaintiffs for a modification of the lease with reference to the rentals, without ever at any time asserting or even intimating that the lease had been modified by McFadden.

In this connection the record further shows that on December 23, 1913, the defendant, writing to the plaintiff Thomas A. Driscoll, requesting a change in the terms of the lease, admitted that he recognized the fact that the plaintiffs were "not under any legal obligation to change the terms of the lease, and it would clearly be a matter of equitable adjustment between man and man if anything is done." It will thus be seen that the language of the writing in question, coupled with the admissions and conduct of the defendant concerning the purpose and effect of the writing, warranted the finding that it was not executed as, and intended by the parties thereto to be, a modification of the lease.

[2] Conceding, as is contended, that by the writing in question McFadden contemplated and agreed to indemnify the defendant to the extent of two-thirds of any loss which might accrue to him during the entire period of the lease as the result of his improvement of the demised premises, still that fact could not be availed of as a defense to the action of unlawful detainer grounded upon a breach of the covenant to pay the rent reserved in the lease, nor interposed as an offset to the sum sued for as rent, for manifestly the defendant's loss, if any, could not, under the terms of the writing, be determined or even approximated until the expiration of the term of the lease and a full performance by the defendant of all of its terms.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

SOUTHERN PAC. CO. v. DORE et al.

(Civ. 2068.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Sept. 4, 1917. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 2, 1917.)

COVENANTS 🔑14—IMPLIED WARRANTIES—"GRANT."

A deed providing that the parties of the first part do "grant," bargain, and sell "all of their right, title, and interest," etc., did not purport to pass a fee, and a covenant that the land was free from incumbrances could not be implied from the word "grant"; the deed not being within Civ. Code, § 1113, providing that from the use of the word "grant" in any conveyance by which an estate of inheritance or fee simple is to pass is implied the covenant that such estate is free from incumbrances done, made, or suffered by the grantor or any one claiming under him.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Grant.]

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Edward P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by the Southern Pacific Company against Ellen Dore and others. From an order sustaining defendants' demurrer without leave to amend, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Frank McGowan and H. C. Booth, both of San Francisco, for appellant. Dorsey & Henderson, of San Francisco, for respondents.

KERRIGAN, J. The appeal in this case is from an order sustaining the demurrer of the defendants without leave to amend.

The question in the case is whether or not there is to be found in the conveyance set out in the complaint an implied covenant against incumbrances. The complaint alleges that the deed signed and acknowledged by the defendants on the 9th day of July, 1907, was not delivered until June 2, 1910; that for the years 1908, 1909, and 1910 the lands described in the deed were assessed for taxes in a sum which, with interest and accrued penalties, aggregated $8,804.01, when they were paid by plaintiff on June 21, 1913. For this sum plaintiff demands judgment, together with the statutory rate of interest from said last-mentioned date. The granting clause in the deed reads:

> "That the said parties of the first part * * * do by these presents grant, bargain and sell unto the said party of the second part, and to its successors and assigns forever, all of their right, title and interest in and to the following tracts" (describing certain parcels of land).

The plaintiff relies for a recovery in this action upon the provisions of section 1113 of the Civil Code, which section so far as material here is as follows:

> "From the use of the word 'grant' in any conveyance by which an estate of inheritance or fee simple is to be passed, the following covenants, and none other, on the part of the grantor for himself and his heirs to the grantee, his heirs and assigns, are implied, unless restrained by express terms contained in such conveyance: * * *
> "2. That such estate is at the time of the execution of such conveyance free from incumbrances done, made or suffered by the grantor, or any person claiming under him. * * *"

Plaintiff's position on this appeal is that since the conveyance of July 9, 1907, contains therein the word "grant," it implies in law a covenant that the land affected was free from incumbrances as provided in the section of the Code just quoted—a covenant broken by the defendants in suffering the taxes assessed against the land to remain unpaid. The defendants' position on the other hand is that the deed in suit is not within the purview of this section, for the reason that it does not purport to pass a fee; that, on the contrary, the use of the words "all of their right, title, and interest in and to" the land described had the effect as a matter of law to restrain or negative the implication of the statute.

We are constrained to accept the defendants' contention. According to the plain language of the statute it is only when a conveyance of an estate of inheritance or a fee simple is to pass that from the word "grant" a covenant is implied that the land to be conveyed is free from incumbrances; and when the conveyance by its terms merely purports—as does the conveyance here—to pass all the right, title, and interest of the grantors, according to the authorities nothing more passes than the estate which such grantors had in the land at that time subject to all defects and equities which could have been asserted against the grantors. In Hull's Adm'r v. Hull's Heirs, 35 W. Va. 155, at page 164, 13 S. E. 49, at page 52 (49 Am. St. Rep. 800), the court says:

> "Where a deed conveys the grantor's right, title, and interest, though it contains in general terms a covenant of general warranty, the covenant is regarded as a restricted one, limited to the estate conveyed, and not one defending generally the land described. The covenant of warranty is intended to defraud only what is conveyed, and cannot enlarge the estate conveyed" (citing numerous cases).

In Gee v. Moore, 14 Cal. 472, 474, the court said:

> "The deed does not purport to convey the premises in fee simple absolute, so as to bring the instrument within the provision of the thirty-third section of our statute (section 1113) concerning conveyances. It only purports to pass all the right, title, and estate, which the grantor possessed in the land."

In Kimball v. Semple, 25 Cal. 440, the conveyance was of the grantor's right, title and interest. At page 452 the court said:

> "The deed to Whitcomb was simply a conveyance of whatever interest Larkin then held in the land mentioned in the deed, but it did not purport to convey the land nor any certain interest therein."

In Allison v. Thomas, 72 Cal. 562, 14 Pac. 309, 1 Am. St. Rep. 89, the court says:

"It has been uniformly held that a conveyance of the right, title, and interest of the grantor vests in the purchaser only what the grantor himself could claim, and the covenants in such deed, if there were any, were limited to the estate described. Coe v. Persons Unknown, 43 Me. 432; Blanchard v. Brooks, 12 Pick. (Mass.) 47; Brown v. Jackson, 3 Wheat. 449, 4 L. Ed. 432; Adams v. Cuddy, 13 Pick. (Mass.) 460, 25 Am. Dec. 330; Allen v. Holton, 20 Pick. (Mass.) 458; Sweet v. Brown, 12 Metc. (Mass.) 175, 45 Am. Dec. 243; Pike v. Galvin, 29 Me. 183. This construction is in accord with the obvious meaning of the language. The grantee in such a deed necessarily takes only what the grantor then had, and subject to all defects and equities which could then have been asserted against the grantor."

It follows that the judgment should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

PEOPLE v. AVENA. (Cr. 382.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 30, 1917.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑742(3)—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Whether the statements of state witnesses at the preliminary examination, contradictory of their testimony, so far impeach them as to render their testimony improbable or unbelievable, they explaining it by saying they had been told, and in this being corroborated, that if defendant, their father, was convicted, he would be sent to the penitentiary and they to the reform school, is a question for the jury.

2. WITNESSES 🔑396(1)—CREDIBILITY—CONTRADICTORY STATEMENTS—EXPLANATION.

Witness may explain why at the trial she changes her testimony from that given by her at the preliminary trial.

3. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑730(1)—TRIAL—AGREEMENT—CURE BY INSTRUCTION.

Any injury from misconduct of prosecuting attorney in closing argument in stating that in other states defendant would have been hung, and that all of what took place when defendant was brought to his office was not given in evidence, because objected to, will be deemed eliminated; the remarks being promptly objected to and the court instructing that they be disregarded.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Malcolm C. Glenn, Judge.

Joe Avena was convicted, and appeals. Affirmed.

Richard P. Talbot, of Sacramento, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CHIPMAN, P. J. On information filed by the district attorney of Sacramento county defendant was convicted of the crime of rape upon his 12 year old daughter, and was sentenced to 50 years imprisonment at Folsom. He appeals from the judgment of conviction and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

Defendant invites attention to the following three points which he deems sufficient to call for a new trial: (1) That the verdict is contrary to the evidence; (2) errors of law committed by the trial court; (3) misconduct of the deputy district attorney.

[1] The facts testified to by the prosecuting witness and her sister were amply sufficient to justify the verdict. The point urged is that both these witnesses admitted that the testimony they gave at the trial was directly contrary to that given at the preliminary examination and that their testimony there given was false. The explanation given by them for this change in their testimony was that they had been told that if their father was convicted he would be sent to the penitentiary and they would be sent to the detention home or the reform school. There was evidence tending to show that some such representations were made to them, before testifying at the preliminary examination, as inducement to shield their father from the consequences of the unnatural act with which he was charged. It was for the jury to decide whether these contradictory statements, under all the circumstances and facts placed before the jury, so far impeached these witnesses as to render their testimony at the trial improbable or unbelievable. People v. Preston, 19 Cal. App. 685, 127 Pac. 660. There is nothing in the story told by the prosecuting witness, corroborated as it was by her sister, which is inherently improbable or would justify the reviewing court in interfering with the verdict of the jury. It is not without some significance that the learned judge who sat at the trial not only denied the motion for a new trial, but that the sentence imposed amounted practically to life imprisonment, for defendant, 49 years of age, was given a 50 years' term of imprisonment.

[2] Lena Avena, sister of the prosecuting witness, testified to the act committed by her father. Upon her cross-examination counsel for defendant called her attention to her testimony given at the preliminary examination contradictory to her testimony she had just given at the trial. Upon redirect, the district attorney was permitted, over objection, to show that the witness had been told that she would be sent to the reform school or detention home if her father went to state prison. The court allowed this testimony on the ground that the witness was entitled to explain why she had changed her testimony. Some questions and answers in the course of the re-examination were objectionable, but the main object was to give the witness the opportunity of explaining why she had testified as she did at the preliminary. We see no error in this ruling. No other alleged error in the court's ruling is called to our attention.

[3] In his closing argument to the jury Deputy District Attorney Jones recapitulated the evidence as to what took place the morning following the act of their father; that the children "talked it over"; that "the mother was gone, and they told Mrs. Murphy and they told Mrs. Anastasio, and they or some one told Charlie," who telephoned to the officer; that the latter came, heard the story of the children, and arrested their father.

"Where was he treated wrong," asked Mr. Jones, "where was he treated with any harshness? Why, if it had been down in the state where Mr. Talbot (defendant's attorney) was born, if it had been down in the Southern States, you know what would have happened to that man. The neighbors around there would not have permitted him to have been brought up to the jail. They would have hung him right outside of that tent. Many a colored man has been.

"Mr. Talbot: If your honor please, the gentleman from Missouri will deny that they would have hung this man.

"The Court: Eliminate that, Mr. Jones.

"Mr. Talbot: They would have given him a fair trial. They would not have hung this man unless there was proof.

"Mr. Jones: No; they never have.

"Mr. Talbot: No; they would give him a fair trial.

"The Court: Just a moment, gentlemen.

"Mr. Talbot: He has got no right to go outside of this testimony.

"Mr. Jones: I am not going outside of the case. I am simply explaining what they would have done if it had been in your state.

"Mr. Talbot: Well, now, I assign that as error, and I ask that the jury now be instructed to disregard that part of the statement. * * *

"The Court: The jury will disregard it."

The district attorney then proceeded to state what took place in his office, and who were present when the defendant was brought there, at which time the court stenographer took down in shorthand what there occurred. In the course of the trial the district attorney had endeavored to introduce the statement there made by the defendant, but the court denied the offer. The district attorney continued:

"Now, gentlemen of the jury, the whole statement of what took place there has not been read to you, because they objected to it and would not permit it to be read.

"Mr. Talbot: Now, we object to that kind of argument here before this jury.

"The Court: The objection is sustained. Do not refer to that.

"Mr. Talbot: Trying to cloud the jury on the testimony.

"Mr. Jones: I am not trying to cloud the jury, sir. I have not got much time, but I will sit down and let you talk, if you want to.

"Mr. Talbot: I am objecting to the court; that is not proper argument before the jury.

"The Court: Well, I will instruct the jury to disregard any reference to the statement. It is not in evidence."

It is now contended that:

"The ruling of the trial court was absolutely insufficient to cure such willful misconduct."

The appellate courts are called upon too frequently, in reviewing criminal cases, to deal with the conduct of district attorneys who travel outside the record in their argument to the jury in order to bring about a conviction. Such course should never be necessary if the evidence is sufficient to warrant conviction; and, if it is not sufficient, no district attorney is warranted in demanding a conviction. Where, however, the misconduct is promptly called to the attention of the court and it is asked to instruct the jury to disregard the objectionable remarks of the district attorney and the court does so, the injury done is deemed to have been cured. We held, in People v. Ferrara, 31 Cal. App. 1, 159 Pac. 621, that to justify a reversal the misconduct of the district attorney must be flagrant and obviously prejudicial. We do not think that the alleged misconduct in the present case was of such persuasive character as to have led the jury to ignore the court's instruction to disregard it. People v. McRoberts, 1 Cal. App. 28, 81 Pac. 734.

The record shows that defendant was ably defended; that but a single error of the court in its rulings has been pointed out, and that one not prejudicial; that full and unobjectionable instructions were given the jury; and that the evidence accepted by the jury was amply sufficient to warrant the verdict rendered.

Ex parte KOSTRIKEN. (Cr. 703.)

1. Criminal Law 🔑211(4)—Sufficiency of Complaint—Rape.

Where the complaint before the committing magistrate did not allege that prosecutrix was not the wife of accused, it failed to show the commission of the crime of rape.

2. Habeas Corpus 🔑29—Complaint—Evidence.

Where the complaint for rape did not allege that prosecuting witness was not the wife of accused, and the evidence did not show it, a writ of habeas corpus will be granted, and the petitioner discharged.

Application by William Kostriken for a writ of habeas corpus. Granted, and petitioner ordered discharged.

Ambrose Gherini, of San Francisco, and J. Edwin Lyons, for petitioner. Chas. M. Fickert, Dist. Atty., and A. L. O'Grady, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of San Francisco, for respondent. John D. Harloe, of San Francisco, for sheriff.

PER CURIAM. [1, 2] Upon this hearing for a writ of habeas corpus, the return to the writ previously issued shows that the petitioner was charged with, and held to answer for, the crime of rape, upon evidence which in part shows that, at the time of the alleged commission of the offense, the prosecutrix, a minor under the age of 15 years, was the wife of the petitioner. The return further shows that the complaint filed with the committing magistrate does not allege that the prosecutrix was not the wife of the petitioner at the time of the commission of the alleged rape. It follows that neither the complaint nor the evidence show the commission of an offense against the penal laws of the state, therefore the writ is granted, and the petitioner ordered discharged from custody.

WISSMAN v. CABANISS, Superior Court Judge. (Civ. 2217.)

1. Judgment 🔑17(1)—Process to Sustain—Necessity for Personal Service.

Where a wife, in a proceeding between herself and her husband, was not personally served with process, the decree was entirely ineffectual to decide any property rights between the parties.

2. Depositions 🔑8—Right to Take—Action between Husband and Wife.

A wife having a right to bring an action against her husband had the statutory right in preparing for trial to cause his deposition to be taken.

3. Depositions 🔑64(4)—Right to Direction of the Superior Court to Answer.

Where plaintiff, taking defendant's deposition in preparing for trial of her action, asked questions pertinent to the issues raised in the case and to be tried, she had a right to have the questions answered, and, if defendant refused to answer, she had a right to a direction of the superior court that they should be answered.

4. Depositions 🔑64(4) — Jurisdiction to Direct Witness to Answer—Ouster.

The superior court could not oust itself of jurisdiction to direct defendant husband, whose deposition plaintiff wife was taking in the exercise of her statutory right to prepare for trial, to answer a question pertinent to the issues raised by the pleadings by an erroneous holding that in a former action between the parties the question of their property rights had been determined.

Petition for writ of mandate by Mary C. Wissman against George H. Cabaniss, Judge of the Superior Court. Writ directed to issue.

Haven & Athearn, of San Francisco, for petitioner. H. G. W. Dinkelspiel and Frank W. Hooper, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Petition for writ of mandate. The court is of the opinion that this writ should issue.

[1, 2] As to the effect of the decree in the former proceeding, we are of the opinion that it was entirely ineffectual to decide any property rights between the husband and wife by reason of the fact that the wife was not personally served with process. In that proceeding the court was without jurisdiction to determine the question of property rights in the absence of personal service. That being so, the wife had a right to bring the action out of which this proceeding arose, and she had the statutory right in preparing for the trial of that action to cause the deposition of the defendant to be taken.

[3] At the taking of that deposition she asked questions which were pertinent to the issues raised in the case and to be tried therein; she had a right to have those questions answered, and in case the witness refused to answer, she had a right to the direction of the superior court that the question should be answered. A refusal on the part of the superior court to exercise its power in aid of that right amounted to a denial of justice to her to the extent that it deprived her of the statutory right which she had to prepare for trial by the taking of this deposition.

[4] The court could not oust itself of jurisdiction to direct the witness to answer a question which was pertinent to the issues raised by the pleadings by holding—as we think clearly against the law—that in the former action the question of property rights had been determined. That matter seems to us so clear that we are of the opinion that the court in this present matter had no discretion to refuse the order which the plaintiff sought to compel the witness to answer, and that its refusal amounted to the ousting of itself from jurisdiction in the matter, and hence was the proper subject of a writ of mandate.

The writ will issue as prayed for.

JANSSON v. NATIONAL S. S. CO.

(Civ. 2129.)

1. NOTICE 🔑9—CODE PROVISIONS—WRITTEN NOTICE.

Where notice of a fact is required to be given under the various provisions of the Code, written notice is usually intended, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1010, providing that "notices must be in writing."

2. NEW TRIAL 🔑116(2)—TIME FOR PROCEEDINGS—NOTICE OF ENTRY OF JUDGMENT—SUFFICIENCY.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 659, providing that notice of intention, to move for new trial must be filed within 10 days after notice of entry of judgment, actual knowledge of entry of judgment is not sufficient to start the time running within which notice of intention to move for a new trial must be filed, but, unless waived, a written notice of entry must be given.

3. NEW TRIAL 🔑116(2)—NOTICE OF ENTRY OF DECISION—WAIVER.

A motion or other proceeding by a party with reference to a decision by which he seeks to protect his own interest against the other party and obtain relief which could be granted only in view of a decision is a waiver of notice of entry of such decision.

4. NEW TRIAL 🔑116(2) — ENTRY OF JUDGMENT—WAIVER OF NOTICE.

A stipulation to correct a memorandum of costs is not a waiver of written notice of entry of the judgment required by Code Civ. Proc. § 659.

5. NEW TRIAL 🔑116(2) — ENTRY OF JUDGMENT—NOTICE OF—SUFFICIENCY.

A notice of assignment to plaintiff's attorney of a portion of a judgment, served on defendant, signed by plaintiff, and not by his attorney, is not sufficient notice of entry of judgment under Code Civ. Proc. § 659.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Hjalmar A. Jansson, sometimes known as Hjalmar A. Johnson, against the National Steamship Company, a corporation. Judgment for plaintiff. From an order denying his motion to strike from the files a notice of intention to move for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. C. Cavitt, of San Francisco, for appellant. Chickering & Gregory, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from an order denying his motion to strike from the files of the court a notice of intention to move for a new trial served and filed by defendant, plaintiff's motion being grounded upon the contention that the notice was not served or filed within the time provided by section 659 of the Code of Civil Procedure as it read at the time the motion was made. As the result of the trial herein the plaintiff recovered a verdict against the defendant on or about the 3d day of February, 1915, for the sum of $3,000. Thereafter, to wit, on the 5th day of February, 1915, a paper was served upon the defendant which, after reciting that for a valuable consideration received the plaintiff assigned to his counsel, Mr. W. C. Cavitt, an undivided one-half interest in the judgment herein, also stated that:

> "Said judgment was entered on the 4th day of February, 1915, in Judgment Book 48 at page 125 in the office of the county clerk of the city and county of San Francisco. Dated February 5, 1915. [Signed] Hjalmar A. Jansson."

Thereafter, and on the 6th day of February, 1915, plaintiff served and filed a memorandum of his costs and disbursements incurred in the action. Two days later the respective attorneys of the parties entered into a written stipulation which provided for a correction in the memorandum of costs, and which was filed with the clerk of the court on February 10, 1915. On the 24th of the same month the defendant served and filed a notice of intention to move for a new trial, which is the notice that plaintiff sought to have stricken from the files. The motion being denied, plaintiff takes this appeal.

[1, 2] Section 659 of the Code of Civil Procedure so far as it relates to the matter in hand provided at the time of the filing of said notice that the party intending to move for a new trial must, within ten days after receiving notice of the entry of judgment file with the clerk and serve upon the adverse party notice of his intention. It is claimed by the plaintiff that the stipulation above mentioned, correcting the memorandum of costs and disbursements, and the notice of assignment of a portion of the judgment, referring as it does to its entry, must be regarded as written notice of the entry of judgment sufficient to set in motion the time within which defendant was required to serve and file its notice of intention to move for a new trial. There is no doubt that where, under the various provisions of the Code, notice of a fact is required to be given, written notice is usually intended. Section 1010, Code Civ. Proc. It is also true that in the case of the entry of judgment actual knowledge of such entry is never sufficient to start the time running within which notice of intention to move for a new trial must be filed, and that unless facts appear of record which constitute a waiver thereof the written notice required by section 659 must be given. Forni v. Yoell, 99 Cal. 173, 33 Pac. 887; Gardner v. Stare, 135 Cal. 118, 67 Pac. 5; Hughes Mfg. & L. Co. v. Elliott, 167 Cal. 494, 140 Pac. 17. "The rule would therefore seem to be that written notice of filing of decision is in all cases required, unless waived by facts appearing in the records, files, or minutes of the court; and it follows that actual notice or knowledge, other than by written notice, is insufficient in any case unless it appears, from facts thus evidenced that written notice was waived." Mallory v. See, 129 Cal. 356, 61 Pac. 1123.

[3] A motion in court or other proceeding by a party with reference to a decision, which presupposes his knowledge that it has been made, and by which he seeks to protect his own interest against the other party, would be regarded as a waiver of his right to require written notice of the decision. An application for a stay of execution, it has been held, constitutes a waiver of such written notice, for the reason that the motion is based upon the fact that the decision had been rendered. In other words, the moving party obtained relief from the court which could only have been granted in view of the fact that the judgment had been rendered. Gardner v. Stare, 135 Cal. 118, 67 Pac. 5.

In Forni v. Yoell, supra, no written notice of decision appears to have been given by the prevailing party (the plaintiff), but the defendant filed a notice of intention to move for a new trial. This notice was served and filed more than ten days after the denial of a motion made by defendant to dismiss the action upon the ground that:

> "The findings and decision of the court upon final submission of this action were filed February 27, 1890, and the party plaintiff thereby entitled to judgment has ever since neglected to demand and have the same entered for more than six months since the filing of said findings and decision."

In that case it was held that the defendant, having based a motion on the fact that a decision had been rendered in the case, must have been deemed to have thereby waived written notice of the decision provided for in section 659 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[4] As to the stipulation in reference to the cost bill, we are unable to see how the defendant's action in entering into it can be regarded as a waiver of his right to receive written notice of the entry of the judgment. The stipulation does not even contemplate that the judgment had been entered, and no relief was obtained by defendant which was necessarily based upon the theory that such entry had been made. The stipulation, we think, did not constitute a waiver of notice of the entry of judgment required by the section of the Code above referred to.

[5] It is the further contention of the appellant that the written notice required by this section was in fact given, this contention being based upon the fact that the notice of assignment of a portion of the judgment served by plaintiff upon the defendant, containing, as it does, a reference to the entry of the judgment, must be held to constitute the written notice thereof contemplated by the section referred to.

It will be observed that this notice was not signed by the attorney of record for the plaintiff, but by the plaintiff himself. Apparently it was designed and purported only to give notice to the defendant that an interest in the judgment had been assigned to plaintiff's counsel. But, as was said by the learned judge of the trial court in passing upon this question:

> "Even assuming that such paper was intended to apprise defendant's counsel of the fact and date of the entry of judgment herein, it was wholly inoperative for that purpose. Where an attorney is retained in an action to represent a party litigant, all statutory notices and legal proceedings therein must be signed or inaugurated by the attorney of record alone. If in this instance a notice of intention to move for a new trial had been signed by the defendant corporation, or, if such notice had been signed by the attorney of record for the defendant herein, but had been served upon the plaintiff Jansson personally, the motion thus attempted to be inaugurated would be unavailing, and would be dismissed upon motion of the adverse party. From which it would seem to conclusively follow that a notice necessary to start the statutory period of time wherein the adverse party must institute a legal proceeding must be signed by the attorney of record for the party on whose behalf such notice was given."

For the reasons given the order appealed from is affirmed.

RIVERSIDE COUNTY v. ALBERHILL COAL & CLAY CO. et al. (Civ. 2327.)

1. Highways ⚿42—Necessity—Determination as to.

Where a county board of supervisors takes all the steps required by Pol. Code, §§ 2681–2710, relating to condemnation for roads, it is conclusive as to place of and necessity for the roads, and Code Civ. Proc. § 1241, as amended 1913, providing that when land is condemned there must be a necessity therefor, in no way qualifies such rule.

2. Highways ⚿42—Necessity—Decision of Supreme Court.

A decision of the Supreme Court that after hearing required by Pol. Code, §§ 2681–2710, relating to condemnation of roads, determination of the board to establish a road is conclusive as to necessity for and location of road, is binding as to the same facts which Code Civ. Proc. § 1241, as amended in 1913, declares essential.

3. Eminent Domain ⚿19—Condemnation—Necessity.

A road as established under Pol. Code, §§ 2681–2710, relating to condemnation for roads, is a public road regardless of the number of persons using it.

4. Eminent Domain ⚿262(4) — Review — Questions of Fact—Amount of Damages—Condemnation for Roads.

In condemnation proceedings for a road, the findings of the trial court as to amount of damages cannot be disturbed on appeal, where the evidence was conflicting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; F. E. Densmore, Judge.

Condemnation for a road by the County of Riverside against the Alberhill Coal &

Clay Company, a corporation, and the Los Angeles Pressed Brick Company, a corporation. Judgment for plaintiff. From the judgment and an order denying its motion for a new trial, the defendant Los Angeles Pressed Brick Company appeals. Affirmed.

Collier & Craig, of Riverside, for appellant. W. A. Purington and Lyman Evans, both of Riverside, for respondent.

JAMES, J. The defendant Los Angeles Pressed Brick Company, a corporation, appeals from the judgment and from an order denying its motion for a new trial. The action was brought on behalf of the county of Riverside to enforce condemnation of a strip of land for public road purposes. Acting under the authority of the provisions of article 6, chapter 2, of the Political Code, as those provisions are embodied in section 2681 et seq., the board of supervisors of plaintiff county made an order directing the district attorney to prosecute this action. All of the steps taken, from the filing of a petition by freeholders, including hearing on report of viewers, and the fixing of damages by the board of supervisors, were sufficiently alleged. The answer of appellant made no issue as to any of those allegations. The principal matters urged in defense by its answer refer to the alleged inadequate amount of damages. The defendant did, however, assert that there existed no public necessity for the road; that the same was in truth and in fact for the convenience of a certain clay manufacturing company. The trial court found that all of the allegations of the complaint were true. It is the contention of appellant that it should have appeared by the allegations of the complaint that the board of supervisors had in a formal way by resolution declared the existence of the public necessity for the laying out of the road and the taking of appellant's property. This contention is based upon the condition of the law as found in section 1241 of the Code of Civil Procedure, where it is declared that before property may be taken by condemnation it must appear that the taking is necessary to the use claimed, and that provision further declares as follows:

> "Provided, when the legislative body of a county, city and county, or an incorporated city or town, shall by resolution or ordinance, adopted by vote of two-thirds of all its members, have found and determined that the public interest and necessity require the acquisition, construction or completion, by such county, city and county, or incorporated city or town, of any proposed public utility, or any public improvement, and that the property described in such resolution or ordinance is necessary therefor, such resolution or ordinance shall be conclusive evidence; (a) of the public necessity of such proposed public utility or public improvement; (b) that such property is necessary therefor, and (c) that such proposed public utility or public improvement is planned or located in the manner which will be most compatible with the greatest public good, and the least private injury."

The provisions to which reference has just been made were incorporated in the section mentioned by amendment enacted by the Legislature in 1913. It is admitted by appellant that prior to the adoption of this amendment, under proceedings like those had for the opening of the road here involved, it was unnecessary to have proof made as to the existence of the necessity which justified the public in taking private lands. It was so held in County of San Mateo v. Coburn, 130 Cal. 631, 63 Pac. 78, 621. The board of supervisors of the county of Riverside was acting under special provisions authorizing the laying out of a public road. Those provisions made necessary the viewing of the proposed route, fixing of damages, and a hearing on the report of the viewers at which nonconsenting landowners had the right to appear and give testimony. The right existed in the board of supervisors, after such hearing, to approve or not to approve the report of the viewers. In other words, all matters affecting the project of opening the road were there to be tried and settled. In County of San Mateo v. Coburn, supra, our Supreme Court said:

> "There is no room in the present case for any question as to the character of the use for which the condemnation of the land is sought. It needs no argument to show that a highway or public road is a public use. * * * Whether a public highway is demanded in any particular region, as well as its location and extent, are also matters of a political or legislative character (citing cases). In the Political Code of this state, section 2681 et seq., the Legislature has established a tribunal for determining these questions, and has provided for notice to all persons interested therein, and given them an opportunity to be heard. If this tribunal proceeds in accordance with the provisions of these sections, it acquired jurisdiction to determine these questions, and its determination is not subject to collateral attack."

[1-4] The effect of that decision is to hold that there is a determination made by the board of supervisors where its authority is regularly pursued, both as to the necessity for the establishment of a public road and the necessity to take the particular land of the property owners. We do not perceive how the amendment of 1913 made to section 1241, Code of Civil Procedure, either adds to or qualifies any of the provisions of the article before mentioned. The Supreme Court having declared that the provisions of that article made the determination of the board of supervisors after hearing conclusive, that determination must still be held conclusive of the same facts which the amendment to section 1241 declares essential. If, looking at section 1241, we say that before property can be taken the necessity for the taking must be shown, we must also say that this showing is fully made when it appears that the board of supervisors regularly pursued the various steps and proceedings outlined in the Political Code. The defendant admitted that all of such steps were properly taken, by failing to make denial thereof. The determination made by the board we think was conclusive of all questions as to the propriety of locating the road in the particular place it was, as well as of the necessity for its establishment. The road as established would be a public road regardless of the number of persons using it. Madera Ry. Co. v. Raymond Granite Co., 3 Cal. App. 668, 87 Pac. 27. As to the question of the amount of damages, the evidence was conflicting, and the findings of the trial judge cannot be disturbed for that reason.

From a careful examination of the record submitted, we find no error warranting a reversal of the judgment or order.

1. PUBLIC LANDS ⟹41—LAND SUBJECT TO GRANT—EVIDENCE.

Introduction, by claimant through a railroad grant, of official maps of the department of the interior showing the lands in question to be public lands, and also showing the outlines of the Mexican grants in their vicinity, were sufficient to show prima facie that the land was public land, and it was not necessary to show affirmatively that the lands were not within the limits of some other grant.

2. PUBLIC LANDS ⟹117—PATENTS—COLLATERAL ATTACK—PRIOR GRANTS.

A patent under the homestead laws is not a good defense in ejectment as against one claiming under a prior railroad grant, a patent being open to collateral attack where the land was already granted.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Action by the People's Water Company against Charles L. Perkins. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

T. F. Bachelder, of Oakland, for appellant. T. M. Bradley and Harry E. Leach, both of Oakland, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action for ejectment, and from an order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial.

The premises in question are located in the county of Contra Costa, and lie within the limits of the odd-numbered sections of government land embraced within the terms of the congressional grant of such lands to the Central Pacific Railroad Company, of which the plaintiff and respondent herein is the successor in interest. The defendant opposed two contentions to the right of the plaintiff to recover in this action, neither of which was sustained by the trial court. The first of these was the contention that the lands in question were originally embraced within the limits of the Mexican grant known as the Romero grant; but the record discloses that the so-called Romero grant was claimed by the brothers Romero to have been made to them by Gov. Michel Torino in the year 1844, which claim was presented to the commissioners for the settlement of private land claims in California under the act of March 3, 1851, and was rejected by said commissioners in the year 1853 upon the ground that no such grant had ever been issued, and that upon appeal to the district court and afterwards to the Supreme Court of the United States this decision was affirmed, the final decision of the latter tribunal being given in the year 1863, some time before the act of Congress granting the Central Pacific Railroad Company the odd-numbered sections of the public domain, embracing the lands in question. It follows that at the time of such grant these lands were not within the limits of any existing Mexican grant, and were therefore subject to the congressional grant to the Central Pacific Railroad Company.

[1] In this connection the appellant insists that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover for the reason that it did not affirmatively show that the lands were not within the limits of some other grant, but this contention we find to have no merit. The plaintiff introduced in evidence the official maps of the Department of the Interior, showing the lands in question to be public lands, and also showing the outlines of the Mexican grants in their vicinity. These maps were sufficient, taken with the railroad grant and the conveyance by the railroad to it, to establish prima facie the plaintiff's case.

[2] The only other point urged by the defendant and presented upon this appeal consisted of the proof of the issuance to him of a patent under a homestead entry made by him long subsequent to the date of the original railroad grant, his contention being that the action of the commissioner of the Land Office of the United States in the issuance to him of said patent constituted a final determination that the lands were at the date of his homestead entry and patent public lands and open to such entry. He cites in support of this contention two cases, viz., Steel v. St. Louis Smelting Co., 106 U. S. 447, 1 Sup. Ct. 389, 27 L. Ed. 226, and Johnson v. Towsley, 13 Wall. 72, 20 L. Ed. 485. An examination of these cases, however, shows that, when fully read they do not go to the extent of supporting the appellant's contention; but, on the contrary, give application to the doctrine for which the appellant contends to such lands only as in fact form part of the public domain at the time of their proposed appropriation under the homestead and pre-emption laws. In the case of Smelting Co. v. Kemp, 104 U. S. 636, 26 L. Ed. 875, the Supreme Court of the United States clears its decisions of all confusion upon this point in the following language:

> "Of course when we speak of the conclusive presumptions attending a patent for lands we assume that it was issued in a case where the department had jurisdiction to act and execute it; that is to say, in a case where the lands belong to the United States. * * * If they had previously been disposed of the department would have no jurisdiction to transfer them, and its attempted conveyance of them would be inoperative and void. * * * We may therefore assume as the settled doctrine that if a patent is absolutely void upon its face, or the issuance thereof was without authority or was prohibited by statute, or the state had no title, it could be impeached collaterally in a court of law in an action of ejectment."

There are numerous other authorities sustaining this doctrine.

It follows that there is no merit in the appellant's contention that he acquired any rights superior to those of the plaintiff's predecessor by virtue of his homestead patent, and hence that he has presented no sufficient defense to the plaintiff's suit.

Judgment and order affirmed.

Defendant may have the benefit of an appeal on questions of law alone, where he has appeared specially to object to the jurisdiction of the court over him as a party defendant, and where his appeal is confined to that one question.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Application for writ of review by James D. Clark against Frank S. Forbes, as Justice of the Peace, and John E. Lacey and Ellen Lacey, his wife. From judgment denying his application, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

William Lewis, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Walter Gould Lincoln, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. Appeal from judgment. The plaintiff appeals from a judgment denying his application for a writ of review. The judgment sought to be reviewed was rendered by respondent Forbes as justice of the peace of Los Angeles township in Los Angeles county, in an action wherein John E. Lacey et al. were plaintiffs and James D. Clark was defendant. That judgment was rendered on the 25th day of May, 1916. The petition for writ of review was filed in the superior court within 30 days thereafter, which therefore was within the time in which an appeal might have been taken from the judgment.

[1] The writ of review does not lie to review a judgment from which an appeal may be taken. Appellant claims that he had no right of appeal of which he could take advantage, because by taking an appeal he would submit to the jurisdiction, and the point upon which he relies is that the justice's court did not have jurisdiction of the person of him, the said James D. Clark, in that action. The decisions cited and relied upon by him are In re Clarke, 125 Cal. 388, 58 Pac. 22; Nisbet v. Clio Mining Co., 2 Cal. App. 436, 83 Pac. 1077; Security Loan & Trust Co. v. Boston, etc., Co., 126 Cal. 418, 58 Pac. 941, 59 Pac. 296.

[2] Those cases merely hold that an appeal involving the merits of an action carries with it a submission of the appellant personally to the jurisdiction of the court. They do not contravene the rule that a defendant may have the benefit of an appeal on questions of law alone, where he has appeared specially for the single purpose of objecting to the jurisdiction of the court over him as a party defendant, and where his appeal is confined to that one question. In Olcese v. Justices' Court, 156 Cal. 82, 103 Pac. 317, the Supreme Court said:

> "This court has never recognized the right of a petitioner * * * to review the judgment of a justice's court after appeal taken and determined in the superior court. It has reviewed the judgment of a justice's court only under such exceptional circumstances as those indicated in Elder v. Justice's Court, 136 Cal. 364 [68 Pac. 1022], where petitioner's power to appeal was lost by reason of the fact that he was never notified of the day set for trial, or the rendition of judgment against him."

In the present case it is clear that at the time when he commenced this proceeding he had the right, and the knowledge which gave him the opportunity to exercise that right, to appeal from the judgment. Therefore he is not entitled to a writ of review.

[3] It further appears by the petition herein that the demurrer filed by Clark, to the complaint in the justice's court, was based not only upon the ground that the court had no jurisdiction over the person of the defendant Clark, but also upon the ground that the court had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action. The filing of such a demurrer constituted a general appearance whereby the defendant submitted himself to the jurisdiction of the court. Roberts v. Superior Court, 30 Cal. App. 714, 720, 159 Pac. 465, and cases there cited; Remsberg v. Hackney Mfg. Co., 164 Pac. 792.

[4, 5] The judgment, denying the application for a writ of review, recites that the court had before it a full and complete return of the justice's court, to an "alternative writ" theretofore issued. By its judgment the superior court sets aside the said "alternative writ of review" and denies the "application for the peremptory writ." We are not familiar with the terms "alternative" and "peremptory" as applied to writs of review. The justice's return is not shown in the transcript. For this reason alone this court is without a record which would authorize a reversal of the superior court's judgment. The "answer" filed in this proceeding by the so-called respondents Lacey was a superfluous document, and could not (in the absence of any stipulation) be used to raise any issues in this case. "The return to the writ constitutes the answer, as well as evidence." Stumpf v. Board of Supervisors, 131 Cal. 364, 63 Pac. 663, 82 Am. St. Rep. 350; Donovan v. Board of Police Commissioners, 32 Cal. App. 392, 163 Pac. 69. Treating the judgment of the superior court as in effect an affirmance of the judgment of the justice's court, the judgment of the superior court, from which petitioner appealed, is affirmed.

1. TRIAL 🔑396(3)—FINDING OUTSIDE OF ISSUES.

2. LANDLORD AND TENANT 🔑184—DEPOSIT OF SECURITY—RECOVERY.

Under lease giving lessor right to terminate for failure to pay rent, and providing that in case of fire or earthquake, if it is impossible to restore the building within 60 days, the security of $800 is to be returned to the lessee, where pursuant to notice to pay delinquent rent or vacate, the lessee vacated, the lease was terminated, and the money deposited as security could be recovered by the lessee, less any damage suffered by the lessor by reason of the lessee's fault; the receipt for the $800 reciting that it was received in full payment of the rent for the last two months of the term.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

Action by Hannah Rez and another against Emma A. Summers. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Edward Dietrich, of Los Angeles, for appellants. Jones & Weller, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. Appeal from the judgment. The plaintiff Hannah Rez obtained from the defendant a written lease of certain real property, for a term of 3½ years, beginning on the 24th day of September, 1914. The lessee was to pay an annual rental of $4,800, payable in installments of $400 per month in advance. It was agreed that:

> "If the lessee shall fail to pay the rent reserved herein promptly as the respective installments thereof become due and payable, * * * the lessor herein shall have the right to terminate this lease and to re-enter upon the demised premises and remove all persons and property therefrom, in which event said lease shall be canceled and the said lessor shall be entitled to retain all moneys paid by the lessee herein to her hereunder."

It was also agreed that:

> "In case of a fire, or earthquake, and if it is made impossible to restore the building within sixty days to its former condition, then the security of $800.00 is to be returned to the lessee by the lessor."

On the said 24th day of September, 1914, the lessor executed and delivered to the lessee a receipt for the sum of $800 as being in full payment for the rent of said premises for the last two months of the term mentioned in said lease. On the 24th day of September, 1914, the lessee paid to the lessor, besides said payment or deposit of $800, the sum of $400 due that day. The only other payment made was the sum of $250 paid on account of the installment due October 24th. On the 1st day of December, 1914, the lessor served upon the lessee a notice to pay the sum of $550 rent then delinquent, or to vacate the leased premises within three days. Pursuant to that notice, the lessee vacated the premises on the 3d day of that month.

This action is prosecuted to recover the sum of $650 (besides interest), which the lessee claims should be returned to her out of the $800 received by the lessor as above stated. If the plaintiffs are entitled to recover at all, the true balance will be a matter of computation, with which we need not concern ourselves at present. Judgment was entered in favor of the defendant, and from that judgment the plaintiffs appeal. We have stated the facts as they appear by the findings of fact. It is stipulated that no oral evidence was submitted by either party in the superior court.

[1] In its last so-called finding of facts in the case, the lower court said:

> "From the nature of the case, it would be impracticable, or extremely difficult to fix the actual damage caused to the defendant by reason of the breach of said lease by the said plaintiff.”

This finding was based solely upon a supposed presumption arising, as the court said, “from the nature of the case.” But there is no such presumption. “When a tenant fails to pay rent as provided in the lease, the amount of damage is not extremely difficult to fix, and it certainly is not impracticable to fix the amount of such damage.” Jack v. Sinsheimer, 125 Cal. 563, 58 Pac. 130. Although the defendant Summers claims that the contract was one providing for liquidated damages, her answer did not set forth any facts showing that the case is one in which an agreement for liquidated damages may be enforced. The finding last above noted was outside the issues of fact as presented for the court's determination. In Long Beach City School District v. Dodge, 135 Cal. 401, 67 Pac. 499, the Supreme Court quoted Civil Code, §§ 1670, 1671, which relate to the matter of agreements, determining in advance the compensation to be made in the event of a future breach of a contract obligation, and commented thereon as follows:

> “The first of these sections having declared all contracts fixing liquidated damages in advance to be void, except as provided in the next section, it is clearly incumbent upon the party seeking to recover upon such agreement to show by averment and proof that his case is within the exception, for without an allegation bringing his case within the exception the complaint in that regard is insufficient; the presumption being, in the absence of such allegation, that such agreement is void.”

In the case at bar, as now before us, the agreement of the parties concerning the $800 received by the lessor from the lessee must be ascertained by the terms of the receipt given, read together with the terms of the agreement, which were a part of the lease and which we have quoted. From these sources, it appears that the sum of $800 was received by the lessor as being in full payment for the rent for the last two months of the term. But the payment was not absolute and unconditional, since it was also agreed that in certain contingencies this money would be returned to the lessee, and in that part of the contract the $800 was referred to as “security.”

[2] The lessee having become delinquent by nonpayment of installments of rent which were due, the lessor elected to demand that the lessee pay those installments or vacate the premises. In response to that demand the lessee did vacate the premises. Thereby the lease was terminated, and no further rent can accrue thereunder; but the lessor, upon proper pleadings and proof, has the right to recover such damages as she may have suffered by reason of the lessee's breach of the contract.

In Tiffany on Landlord and Tenant, § 323, several cases are cited, declaring the rule to be that where money has been deposited by the lessee with the lessor to secure the payment of the rent, the tenant can recover from the landlord the excess of the amount of the deposit above the damage suffered by reason of the tenant's default, when the landlord has recovered possession by reason of such default, “it being in such case presumed, it seems, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that by reason of his recovery of possession the landlord does not suffer on account of the nonpayment of installments of rent falling due after such recovery.” The rule so stated seems reasonable, and is here adopted.

The judgment is reversed.

PEOPLE v. GASSER. (Cr. 541.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑1036(2)—IMPROPER TESTIMONY—TIMELY OBJECTION.

Where the gist of the statements by the prosecutrix to her mother was given in answer to questions to which no proper objection was made, complaint that such testimony was improperly admitted is not well taken.

2. WITNESSES 🔑40(1)—COMPETENCY OF CHILDREN—STATUTE.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1880, subd. 2, children under ten years of age are not incompetent witnesses, unless they appear incapable of receiving just impressions of the facts respecting which they are examined or of relating them truly.

3. WITNESSES 🔑40(1), 79(3) — COMPETENCY OF CHILD — EVIDENCE — QUESTIONS FOR COURT.

It was for the trial court to determine whether prosecutrix, seven years old, was competent to testify, and where, before objection, she responded to questions with apparent understanding and intelligence, it cannot be said that anything was shown tending to establish incompetency.

4. WITNESSES 🔑79(2) — INCOMPETENCY OF CHILD—BURDEN OF PROOF.

The burden of showing the incompetency of a child as a witness rested on the defendant.

5. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑656(3) — REMARKS OF COURT — SUSTAINING OBJECTION TO EVIDENCE.

The court's remark in sustaining an objection to a question “she has given the date three or four times” was not prejudicially erroneous as indicating that the judge considered that sufficient proof had been made of any essential fact.

6. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑1043(2) — REVIEW—NECESSITY OF OBJECTION AND EXCEPTION—REMARK OF COURT.

The record not showing specific objection or exception made to the remark of the court, counsel is not in a position to insist upon his objection on appeal.

7. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑665(1)—EXCLUSION OF WITNESSES—DISCRETION OF COURT.

It is within the discretion of the trial court to refuse to exclude witnesses not under examination during the trial.

8. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑673(5) — EVIDENCE OF OTHER OFFENSES—INSTRUCTIONS.

In a prosecution under Pen. Code, § 288, for committing the lewd and lascivious act with a female child, the court did not err in instructing that testimony had been introduced tending to prove other acts than those relied on for conviction, for the purpose only of proving the lewd and lascivious disposition of defendant and his disposition to commit acts of that character, and not to prove distinct offenses.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Joe Gasser was convicted of the crime defined by Pen. Code, § 288, and appeals from a judgment of imprisonment and an order denying his motion for a new trial. Judgment and order affirmed.

Joseph F. Seymour, Jr., of El Centro, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert M. Clarke, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

JAMES, J. Appellant was convicted of the crime defined in section 288 of the Penal Code. It was alleged that he committed the lewd and lascivious act with a female child. The little girl was seven years of age at the time of the commission of the alleged offense. She resided in the county of Imperial with her mother. There was testimony given by more than one witness which furnished strong evidence in proof of the charge made in the information. Defendant's appeal is taken from a judgment of imprisonment and an order denying his motion for a new trial. In view of the strong character of the evidence introduced against the appellant, it is plain that upon the facts no miscarriage of justice has resulted. The errors complained of must be viewed in the light of that condition which the record shows. We will not attempt to discuss in detail the many objections presented in the 76-page brief of the appellant, but will consider only those which present questions fairly debatable.

[1] The evidence of statements made by the girl to her mother after the commission of the alleged offense was not improperly admitted. After several objections had been made, the district attorney remarked that he would be very glad to ask the witness what the child had said, but he added:

> "I think we are only permitted to show the general character of the complaint. I am willing to ask her exactly what the little girl told her, if counsel wants me to. I might try it that way."

The district attorney then asked directly what the little girl had said, and the answer was made (and no objection interposed thereto) that the little girl had told the witness that "Joe had played naughty with her." The gist of the statements made by the prosecutrix was given by the witness in answer to questions to which no proper objection was made. Counsel's complaint that such testimony was improperly admitted is therefore not well taken.

[2-4] Further contention is made by the appellant that the court should not have received the testimony of the prosecutrix, who was at the time but seven years of age. After the witness had answered preliminary questions as to her name, age, place of residence, and her acquaintance with several persons named, appellant's counsel objected on the ground that the witness was not shown to be competent. The court overruled the objection. Children under ten years of age are not incompetent witnesses unless they appear incapable of receiving just impressions of the facts respecting which they are examined, or of relating them truly. Subd. 2, § 1880, Code Civ. Proc. It was for the trial judge to determine as to whether the witness who appeared before him was competent to testify. Before objection was made, she had responded to questions of the district attorney with apparent understanding and intelligence, and it cannot be said that, where the trial judge was observing the witness and listening to her manner of testifying, anything was shown which would tend to establish the incompetency of the infant to truly testify. People v. Dunlop, 27 Cal. App. 464, 150 Pac. 389. The burden of showing the incompetency of the child as a witness rested upon the defendant. People v. Holloway, 28 Cal. App. 218, 151 Pac. 975.

[5, 6] On cross-examination of the mother of the prosecutrix the witness was interrogated at some length as to the date of the commission of the alleged offense, and the court finally, sustaining objection to a question, remarked: "I sustain the objection. She has given the date three or four times." We do not think that this remark of the trial judge was prejudicially erroneous as indicating to the jury that the judge considered that sufficient proof had been made of any essential matter involved. The witness had fixed a date in her testimony theretofore given, and the remark of the court only indicated that fact, which must have been already very apparent to the jury. The record does not show that counsel made specific objection or exception to the remark of the court. He is therefore not in a position to insist upon his objection here. People v. MacDonald, 167 Cal. 545, 140 Pac. 256.

[7] It was within the discretion of the trial court to refuse to exclude the witnesses not under examination during the trial. People v. McCarty, 117 Cal. 65, 48 Pac. 984; People v. Nunley, 142 Cal. 441, 76 Pac. 45.

[8] It is next asserted that the court erred in the giving of this instruction:

> "The prosecution has selected acts testified to by the witnesses as having been committed by the defendant on August 16, 1916, and has elected to rely on proof of such acts for a conviction in this case. Testimony has been introduced by the prosecution tending to prove other acts of lewd and lascivious conduct of the defendant toward Alice Burcki, prior to the acts relied upon for conviction. This evidence is introduced for the purpose of proving the lewd and lascivious disposition and tendency of the defendant to commit lewd and lascivious acts. This evidence is not introduced to prove distinct offenses, but corroborative evidence tending to support the one specific offense for which the defendant is being tried."

It is claimed that this instruction is similar to one given in People v. Harlan, 29 Cal. App. 603, 156 Pac. 980, and which was held to be erroneous. The parallel does not exist. The instruction in the Harlan Case advised the jury that evidence of other offenses was introduced "for the purpose of proving the illicit relations of the defendant" with the prosecutrix. That instruction was further declared erroneous, in that it in effect advised the jury that complete proof had been made of such other acts. The instruction here given does not agree with the instruction given in People v. Harlan, for the court here told the jury only that testimony tending to prove such other acts was competent for the purpose of proving the lewd and lascivious disposition of the defendant, and was corroborative evidence merely to that extent.

We think that none of the other contentions made by appellant for reversal are deserving of specific discussion. We have examined all of them, and are satisfied that the defendant was justly convicted upon ample proof.

BELLINGHAM BAY LUMBER CO. v. HOPKINS. (Civ. 2140.)

1. MECHANICS' LIENS ⚷164(1)—PORTION OF CONTRACT PRICE AVAILABLE TO MATERIALMEN—STATUTE.

Where a building contract provided the owner should pay the contractor 75 per cent. of the actual value of work and materials, the other 25 per cent. being retained until completion, not the amount paid the contractor, who abandoned the work, but the total value of the work and materials placed on the land before abandonment, was the proper amount for the court to take as basis for the calculation provided in Code Civ. Proc. § 1200, as it stood at the time the rights of the parties attached, to ascertain the portion of the contract price available to materialmen and applicable to the satisfaction of their liens.

2. COURTS ⚷91(1) — DECISION OF SUPREME COURT—BINDING FORCE.

The rule announced by the Supreme Court as to the proper interpretation to be placed upon a statute must be applied by the trial court and the appellate court, when applicable to the case at bar.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by the Bellingham Bay Lumber Company against E. W. Hopkins. There was judgment for defendant. From an order granting plaintiff new trial, defendant appeals. Order affirmed.

McGraw & Barry, of San Francisco, for appellant. Wm. M. Cannon and J. E. Reardon, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from an order granting a new trial. The action was one to foreclose a materialman's lien. The facts of the case were these:

On or about January 22, 1909, the defendant, E. W. Hopkins, as the owner of a lot in San Francisco, entered into a written contract with Webster-Mace Construction Company as a contractor for the erection of a building thereon. The contract price was $81,200, payable as follows: Seventy-five per cent. of the value of the labor performed and materials installed during each month was to be paid on the 1st day of the succeeding month until final acceptance of the building, and the remaining 25 per cent. of the contract price was to be paid 35 days after such acceptance. The contractor commenced to work upon the building under this contract, but on May 27, 1909, before completion thereof abandoned its contract. Prior to the time of said abandonment the plaintiff herein had furnished the contractor lumber, to be used and which was actually used in the building, amounting at agreed prices to the sum of $2,515.48, of which amount there was an unpaid balance of $1,590.38 at the time of such abandonment, for which the plaintiff duly filed its claim of lien. Up to the time of the abandonment of the contract the defendant had made progress payments to the contractor pursuant to its terms amounting to $30,643.95, which sum represented 75 per cent. of the actual value of the labor performed and materials installed up to the date of the abandonment of the contract. The amount of the material delivered and on the ground at the time work ceased and the contract was abandoned was of only nominal value. Subsequently the owner proceeded with the completion of the building in accordance with the original plans and specifications, and actually and reasonably expended thereon the sum of $53,565.50.

Upon the trial of the case the court made a finding based upon the foregoing facts, and upon the construction which it then placed upon section 1200 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to the effect that:

> "At the time of said abandonment by said contractor the value of the work and material already done and furnished, including materials then actually delivered and on the ground, estimated as near as may be by the standard of the whole contract price, was less than the sum of $30,643.95."

And accordingly it rendered judgment against the plaintiff upon the theory that there was no fund in the defendant's possession from which the plaintiff's claim of lien could be satisfied. Upon motion for a new trial the court became convinced that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the foregoing finding, and accordingly granted the motion for a new trial upon that ground, and ordered a retrial as to that single issue. It is the correctness of this latter ruling which is challenged upon this appeal.

[1] We are of the opinion that the trial court acted correctly in its order granting the motion for a new trial upon the ground stated. During the trial of the cause the court apparently fell into a twofold error with respect to this particular matter. In the first place the court, in making its estimate as to the value of the actual work and materials on the premises at the time of the abandonment of the contract, took as its basis for its valuation the amount of money which had been paid to the contractor on account of such work and materials up to said date; but the court apparently overlooked the fact that this amount represented but 75 per cent. of the actual value of such work and materials, the other 25 per cent. thereof being retained by the owner under the terms of the contract, and hence that the total value of the said work and materials would be $40,858.60, which would be the proper amount which the court should have taken as the basis for the calculation provided for in section 1200 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as it then stood, for the purpose of ascertaining the portion of the contract price available to materialmen and applicable to the satisfaction of their liens in cases of this character.

The second error into which the court fell was in the construction given by it of section 1200 of the Code of Civil Procedure in arriving at its conclusion that there was no amount in the owner's possession available for the payment of the plaintiff's claim. Section 1200 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as it existed at the time the rights of the parties in the present case attached, read as follows:

> "In case the contractor shall fail to perform his contract in full, or shall abandon the same before completion, the portion of the contract price applicable to the liens of other persons than the contractor, shall be fixed as follows: From the value of the work and materials already done and furnished at the time of such failure or abandonment, including materials then actually delivered or on the ground, which shall thereupon belong to the owner, estimated as near as may be by the standard of the whole contract price, shall be deducted the payments then due and actually paid, according to the * * * contract and the provisions of sections 1183 and 1184, and the remainder shall be deemed the portion of the contract price applicable to such liens."

The Supreme Court in the recent case of Ganahl Lumber Co. v. Weinsveig, 168 Cal. 668, 143 Pac. 1025, has construed this section of the Code in its application to cases involving the abandonment of contracts for the erection of buildings, and requiring the adoption of its method of calculation for the purpose of ascertaining the fund, if any, in the hands of the owner available for the settlement of materialmen's liens. Upon the trial of this cause the court adopted an interpretation other than that determined by the foregoing case as the basis for its aforesaid finding; and its order granting a new trial was predicated upon its change of view resulting from its acceptance of the rule of construction of said section of the Code announced in the Ganahl Case.

[2] The appellant herein undertakes to argue that the Supreme Court was in error in its views expressed in that case as to the proper interpretation to be placed upon section 1200 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that the rule therein announced should be departed from by this court in the instant case. But it is not for us to make that departure, and it would therefore be a waste of effort to follow counsel for the appellant through an exhaustive analysis of cases in this and other jurisdictions for the purpose of determining whether the construction adopted by the Supreme Court of the section of the Code in question was the proper one. It is the construction which must be applied by the trial court and this court to the case at bar, and, having thus adopted and applied it, the trial court was not in error in granting a new trial.

We find no merit in any other of the points urged upon this appeal.

Order affirmed.

[1] The cause was placed on the April calendar, and was called on April 9, 1917, and appellant given 30 days to file opening brief, respondent 10 days to reply, appellant 10 days, cause then to stand submitted. May 9th appellant was given 10 days from that date in which to file opening brief. Appellant has filed no brief, and has not asked for further time in which to do so. We must assume that he has abandoned his appeal, and hence we are authorized to affirm the judgment and order without examining into the merits of the appeal. We have, however, given the record careful examination, and find therein no ground for reversal.

The prosecuting witness, one Equals, arrived at Sacramento about 8 o'clock p. m. on October 3, 1916, and took rooms at the Western Hotel, on K street between Second and Third streets. After a hasty toilet in his room he betook himself to the bar of the hotel to spend the evening. He had about $18 in his pocket, from which store he drew not lavishly but with some liberality in treating the frequenters of the bar, all of whom were strangers. Among them was defendant, who drank with Equals several times. About 10 o'clock Equals had become somewhat intoxicated, and concluded it was about time to seek the open air, although he testified that he had full control of his mental faculties, albeit his legs were a bit unsteady. He went out onto K street having, as he testified, two $5 gold pieces in one of his trousers' pockets, and $5 in silver in the other. He also had a knife in one trousers' pocket and a corkscrew, which latter he said he had carried for two years, in the other. Defendant and another man left the saloon at the same time and joined Equals in his quest for fresh air. Together they walked west toward Second street and along Second north and turned into an alley after going a block or two. Equals was a stranger in the city, not familiar with the streets, and did not know just where they went. After entering the alley 20 or 30 feet, these men seized Equals roughly, one holding him while the other went through his pockets and took all the money he had, a knife and a corkscrew. One of them then knocked him down and left him unconscious. About this time Police Officer Addison was on the south side of I street between Front and Second, and, looking down the alley, saw three men enter at the other end from J street and stop about 30 feet from J street. His suspicions were aroused, and he walked down the alley towards the men to see what they were doing, and presently saw them engaged, "and it looked like there was a scuffle, three men together." Addison went towards them and saw two of these men walking out of the alley toward J street. He passed Equals lying on the ground and followed these two men, overtaking them "close to K street." One of the men ran and the other, Clayton, Addison arrested. He took him to the Tremont Hotel between First and Second, and "rang for the patrol wagon." Clayton was put into it, and Equals was picked up and also put in it, and the wagon was driven to the police station, where defendant was searched and there was found in his pockets $15.30, consisting of two $5 gold pieces and the balance in silver. A corkscrew was also found in his pocket, which Equals at once recognized and identified by marks on it which he described. While defendant was in the patrol wagon the driver saw him make some motion as though putting something under the seat and, on going out and examining where defendant sat, found a knife, which he brought into the office and asked defendant if it was his. He said it was not, and Equals identified it as his. Equals also declared that Clayton had stolen his money to which Clayton replied: "You are mistaken, old man; I never saw you before."

[2] The bartender at the Western testified that he knew Clayton, and that the latter drank with Equals the night of the "stand-up" several times and left the bar room when Equals did. The evidence warranted the jury in believing Equals' testimony that Clayton was one of the two men who robbed him.

Defendant testified in his own behalf. He admitted being with Equals in the bar, talking and drinking with him, but denied that he was one of the men who went with him after leaving the saloon. His testimony was that, coming out of the bar, he went east up K street to go to a movie show, and, finding it was too late, he turned back, dropped into a restaurant for a sandwich, came out, and was on his way back along K street when a man came up to him and asked for a match, and just then the officer came up, the other man ran, and he was himself then arrested. He testified, that he got the corkscrew in a "wholesale house" in San Francisco, but he could not remember the name of the firm or the street where he obtained it. On cross-examination he admitted that he had been twice convicted of robbery, once in Washington and once in Pennsylvania.

We find among the records a transcript certified by the official reporter which purports to set forth all the rulings of the court and other matters to which objection was made at the trial. This transcript was afterwards supplemented, on order of this court, by a complete transcript. We have examined the alleged errors as shown by the first transcript, but find none of sufficient gravity to warrant a reversal.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

ROYAL INDEMNITY CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COM'N et al. (Civ. 2225.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Oct. 22, 1917. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 20, 1917.)

Petition by the Royal Indemnity Company for a writ of review upon an award by the Industrial Accident Commission. Writ dismissed, and award affirmed.

Watt, Thornton & Watt and H. B. M. Miller, of San Francisco, for petitioner. Chris. M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. Petition for a writ of review upon an award made by the Industrial Accident Commission.

The petitioner issued a policy of insurance covering the individual liability of one of two persons jointly engaged in farming, and contends in support of its objection to the award of the commission that the applicant in whose favor it was made was employed by a copartnership consisting of the two persons referred to, so that the applicant's claim against the assured is not one covered by the policy; but we are satisfied—it being conceded that the finding of the commission is in effect a finding of a joint and several obligation—that there is evidence sustaining such finding.

The writ is therefore dismissed, and the award affirmed.

In re WATSON.

WATSON v. WATSON.

(Sac. 2641.)

1. Insane Persons 🔑2—Evidence of Incompetency.

Where a woman 78 years old having nine children conveyed land constituting about one-tenth in value of her property to a son living near her and who had been attending to her business affairs in the expectation, but without any binding promise, that he would provide a home for her, the conveyance was not evidence of incompetency requiring the appointment of a guardian.

2. Insane Persons 🔑2—Evidence of Incompetency.

Evidence held insufficient to show that a woman 78 years old, who had conveyed part of her property to one of her children, was incompetent, though she was suffering from some physical infirmities incident to her advanced years.

3. INSANE PERSONS ⚷30—APPOINTMENT OF GUARDIAN—GROUNDS.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1763 et seq., authorizing the appointment of a guardian for any person incapable of taking care of himself and managing his property, the fact that the property of a woman 78 years old, who had conveyed some of her property to one of her children, might be made more productive and the contending claims of the various children better harmonized by keeping her estate intact during her lifetime did not justify the appointment of a guardian, where her mental faculties were not impaired to such an extent as to make her unable to properly manage and take care of her property or to render her liable to imposition by artful or designing persons.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; W. H. Langdon, Judge.

Proceeding by L. A. Watson for the appointment of a guardian of Sarah A. Watson, an alleged incompetent person. From an order appointing a guardian, the alleged incompetent appeals. Reversed.

Hawkins & Hawkins, of Modesto, for appellant. Griffin, Carlson & Boone, of Modesto, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. The superior court of Stanislaus county made an order adjudging Sarah A. Watson to be incompetent, and appointing a guardian of her estate. From this order the alleged incompetent appeals.

The principal contention of the appellant is that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding of incompetency. Our study of the record has satisfied us that there was no substantial testimony showing that Mrs. Watson's mental faculties were impaired to any such extent, if at all, as to justify the court in taking the management of her property out of her hands, and subjecting it to the control of a guardian.

Mrs. Watson was a widow, 78 years of age, the mother of six sons and three daughters. She was residing on a six-acre tract of land near the city of Modesto. Here she lived with her son, Walter Watson, who was the owner of an adjoining parcel of three acres. Mrs. Watson owned a number of pieces of farming land in the states of North Dakota and Minnesota, of the aggregate value of $50,000 or $60,000. Her husband had died some 7 years before this proceeding was begun, and for some time after his death her daughter, Mrs. McLain, had lived with her. Mrs. McLain moved to her own home, and some time later Walter Watson brought his family from Minnesota to California, and took up his abode with his mother. This occurred about 3 years before the filing of the application for letters of guardianship. In October, 1916, Mrs. Watson conveyed to her son, Walter, for a consideration of $200, the six-acre tract upon which he and she were living. The land was worth from $4,000 to $6,000, and it is not pretended by any one that the sum paid was regarded as an adequate consideration for a sale. Indeed, it is apparent that Mrs. Watson and her son did not view the transaction as a sale for a price in money alone. The evidence indicates that the grantor desired to give to her son, Walter, some inducement for remaining on the place, and that she expected to have a home there with him. She seems to have had the belief that some money consideration was necessary to the validity of a conveyance of real property. Except for the payment of the $200, the transfer was really a gift, made in the expectation (though without any binding promise) that the donee would provide a home for his mother. The idea that Mrs. Watson was mentally incompetent does not seem to have occurred to any one until she made the conveyance under discussion. The recording of the deed came to the attention of some of the grantee's brothers and sisters, and caused dissatisfaction and ill feeling, which speedily culminated in the institution of this proceeding.

[1] The respondent relies in large part upon this transfer as evidence of incompetency. But we do not think it can fairly be given any such effect. The evidence was clear that Walter, ever since taking up his residence in California, had been attending to his mother's business affairs, and that he had her full confidence. There is no ground for even a suspicion that this confidence was not justified. It was admitted that he had always treated his mother with filial kindness. In view of the conditions, an absolute gift of this property, constituting about one-tenth, in value, of Mrs. Watson's holdings, would have afforded no occasion for surprise—still less, for any inference of want of capacity on the part of the donor. So far as the evidence shows, the conveyance was the product of her own free volition, and was not induced by any persuasion or pressure on the part of Walter. There was nothing in the evidence to warrant a conclusion that in transferring this land she was not acting rationally.

[2] The remaining evidence relied on to show incompetency was exceedingly weak. Mrs. Watson herself was called as a witness and examined at considerable length. Her testimony, read as a whole, shows that she had a clear and distinct knowledge of her property interests, and a very definite understanding of her relations to her children, and of their claims upon her. She was able to enumerate and describe her various property holdings and the income derived from each. Her total gross annual income was about $1,700. She was not, it is true, able to state just what the net income was, or to give in detail the expenditures required for taxes and other charges against the property. But, in view of fact that these matters were, to a large extent, being attended to by her son Walter, no inference unfavorable to her mental capacity could fairly be drawn from this circumstance. Indeed, on the whole, it appears to us that her knowledge of her affairs was at least as extensive and accurate as that of the average person who has confided the management of his business interests to a trusted agent. She was suffering from some physical infirmities incident to her advanced years, such as deafness, rheumatism and bronchitis. But there is nothing to show that the clearness of her mind had been impaired in any substantial degree. Much is made of the circumstance that she was unable to recall the provisions of a will which she had made at some time not disclosed by the evidence. But this is of trivial consequence when it is considered that at the time of the hearing her own testimony showed, as above stated, a very complete knowledge of what her property was, and what she was doing and desired to do with it.

One or two of her children testified that they thought she was not competent to look after her affairs. But this testimony was not supported by any good reason. It was founded principally upon the circumstance that she had made the conveyance to her son Walter.

[3] From the remarks of the trial judge, incorporated in the record, it would appear that he thought that Mrs. Watson's property might be made more productive, and that the contending claims of the various children could be better harmonized by keeping her estate intact during her lifetime. But these purposes, however desirable in themselves, do not afford any justification for appointing a guardian. Mrs. Watson's children had no vested right to an equal division of her estate. She was the owner of the property. It was her right to manage it as she pleased, either personally or through agents of her choice, and to dispose of it as she saw fit, unless her mental faculties were impaired to such an extent as to make her unable to properly manage and take care of it or to render her liable to imposition by "artful or designing persons." The appointment of guardians for insane and incompetent persons is authorized by sections 1763 et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure. The proper construction of these sections was discussed at some length in Matter of Coburn, 165 Cal. 202, 131 Pac. 352, and there is no occasion to repeat what we there said. We may, however, quote, as appropriate to the present case, this sentence from the opinion in Estate of Schulmeyer, 171 Cal. 340, 153 Pac. 233:

> "Generally speaking, an adult person has the right to control his own person and affairs, and that right should not be taken from him, except upon a showing of the statutory grounds warranting a restriction of his liberty of action for his own protection."

We have tried to demonstrate that, in the present case, the required showing was not made.

We have not forgotten that the weight of evidence is for the trial court, and that the finding made below is to be sustained on appeal wherever there is any evidence which, with the aid of legitimate inferences, may fairly be thought to support it. But we are satisfied that there is no such evidence here. The showing is manifestly weaker than that made in Matter of Coburn, supra, or Estate of Schulmeyer, supra, or, so far as we are advised, in any other case in which a finding of incompetency has been held to have support in the evidence.

The order is reversed.

BURGE v. ALBANY NURSERIES, Inc.

(S. F. 7628.)

1. SALES 🔑434—ALLEGATION OF BREACH OF WARRANTY—SUFFICIENCY.

In an action for a breach of warranty in the sale of fruit trees, the complaint, although wanting in the statement of any specific facts which prevented discovery of the breach at the time of delivery, or before the suckers began to grow as alleged, was sufficient against a general demurrer, where it alleged that plaintiff did not know and had no means of ascertaining whether the trees were grafted on myrobalan roots, either at the time of delivery or afterwards until the roots threw out such suckers; such allegations showing that discovery was prevented until the time mentioned.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1040(10)—HARMLESS ERROR — OVERRULING DEMURRER — UNCERTAINTY OF PLEADING.

Unless it can be seen that the overruling of demurrers for uncertainty in complaint caused injustice to the defendant in the result of the trial, an error in that respect will not be cause for reversal of the judgment.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1040(10) — HARMLESS ERROR—OVERRULING OF DEMURRER.

Where defendant obtained from the allegations all the information necessary to enable him to conduct the trial and present his defense, overruling his special demurrer was without prejudice.

4. SALES 🔑445(5)—BREACH OF WARRANTY—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

Whether plaintiff when planting fruit trees purchased from defendant could by the use of ordinary care have discovered that the trees were not grafted upon myrobalan roots as warranted, held a jury question.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑999(1)—REVIEW—VERDICT.

Where it cannot be said as a matter of law that plaintiff did not use due diligence in discovering the breach of warranty, the Supreme Court cannot set aside the verdict thereon.

er, the court did not err in admitting evidence tending to show the difference between the value of the land when the discovery was actually made by plaintiff and its value if planted with the kind of trees warranted, in view of Civ. Code, § 3300, providing that damages for breach of an obligation are measured by the amount which would compensate the party aggrieved, and section 3313 providing that the measure of damage for breach of warranty of quality is the excess of the value which the property would have had "at the time to which the warranty referred" had the warranty been complied with over its actual value at that time.

7. TRIAL 🔑243—INSTRUCTIONS—DIFFERENT THEORIES OF RECOVERY.

Where the jury had to determine the facts upon two theories, instructions as to the measure of damages on both theories were not objectionable as inconsistent.

8. SALES 🔑261(6)—FRUIT TREES—GUARANTY.

That the contract described trees sold as "on myrobalan roots" of itself constituted a guaranty that the trees should be grafted on myrobalan roots.

9. SALES 🔑261(6) — CONTRACT — CONSTRUCTION—"STOCK GUARANTEED TRUE TO NAME."

The reasonable construction of the penciled clause in a contract of sale of fruit trees, "Stock guaranteed true to name," is that such guaranty applies to all names descriptive of the trees wherever they appeared in the contract, and as the term "on myrobalan roots" constituted a part of such description the guaranty is to be understood as a warranty that the trees should be as described in the contract; that is, on myrobalan roots.

10. EVIDENCE 🔑450(8) — PAROL TESTIMONY AFFECTING CONTRACTS—AMBIGUITY.

There being no ambiguity in the contract as to the meaning of the words "guaranteed true to name," it was not error to refuse to allow testimony to the effect that such guaranty applied only to the varieties of trees, and not to the variety of roots upon which trees were to be grafted.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Napa County; Henry C. Gesford, Judge.

Action by A. E. Burge against the Albany Nurseries, Incorporated. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wallace Rutherford, of Napa, for appellant. L. E. Johnston, H. L. Johnston, and Clarence N. Riggins, all of Napa, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff.

The complaint alleges that by a certain written contract incorporated therein, the defendant sold to the plaintiff 1750 French and Imperial prune trees grafted on myrobalan roots, guaranteed to be of that kind; that the trees were delivered to plaintiff in December, 1910; that they were in fact grafted upon peach roots; "that plaintiff did not know, and had no means of ascertaining, whether or not the trees were as ordered by him, and as guaranteed by the defendant at the time of their delivery as aforesaid, and relied, in accepting them, solely upon said warranty and representations of defendant that all of said prune trees were on myrobalan roots"; that so believing, plaintiff planted all of said trees on his farm in Napa county in the spring of 1911; that he did not know, and had no means of ascertaining, whether or not said trees were on myrobalan roots, until the spring of the year 1913, when suckers from the roots disclosed the fact that they were grafted on peach roots and not on myrobalan roots; that said trees were purchased by him to plant on said farm, the soil whereof is unsuitable for the growth of trees grafted upon peach roots, but is suitable for trees grafted upon myrobalan roots; that the value of the plaintiff's land at the time he discovered that said trees were on peach roots would have been $100 per acre greater if it had been planted to prune trees on myrobalan roots, than it was at that time as planted to prune trees on peach roots. Judgment was prayed for $2,569. The myrobalan is a variety of wild plum tree.

The first point urged in support of the appeal is that the complaint does not state a cause of action. In support of the objection it is urged that the measure of damages for a breach of such warranty is the difference between the value of prune trees grafted on myrobalan roots and the value of prune trees on peach roots, such values to be determined at the time of delivery, unless some cause existed which prevented the discovery of the breach of warranty until some future time, and that there are no sufficient allegations of the existence of any such cause, nor any allegations that there was any difference between the value of trees on myrobalan roots and trees on peach roots, in December, 1910, when said trees were delivered.

[1] While the complaint is wanting in the statement of any specific facts constituting a cause preventing the discovery at the time of delivery, or before the suckers began to grow, as alleged, we think it contains enough to stand against a general demurrer for want of facts. The statements that the plaintiff did not know and had no means of ascertaining whether or not the trees were grafted on myrobalan roots, either at the time of delivery or afterwards, until the spring of 1913, when the roots threw out suckers, are general allegations that there was a cause existing which prevented such discovery until the time last mentioned. If the defendant desired more particular information on that point he should have demurred specially on the ground of uncertainty or ambiguity. The demurrer contained several specifications of uncertainty, but none of them related to this point.

[2, 3] The demurrer for uncertainty specifies that it cannot be ascertained from the complaint what the value of the plaintiff's farm was per acre prior to the planting of the trees, since the planting of the trees, nor at the time of the filing of the complaint, nor in 1913 at the time of the discovery that the trees were on peach roots. Demurrers for uncertainty are usually of small importance, and unless it can be seen that the overruling thereof caused injustice to the defendant in the result of the trial, an error in that respect will not be cause for reversal of the judgment. The real objection on this point is that the allegation that the plaintiff's land would have been worth $100 per acre more if the trees had been on myrobalan roots than it was worth with the trees on peach roots, is only a conclusion of law, and that the value of the land on peach roots and on myrobalan roots, respectively, should have been alleged directly. Whatever criticism may be indulged upon this method of pleading, we have no doubt that the defendant obtained therefrom all the information necessary to enable him to conduct the trial and present his defense. The main inquiry upon the trial related to the difference in value of the land in 1913, when the discovery was made, planted to trees on peach roots as it was, from its value as it would have been if the trees had been grafted on myrobalan roots. The defendant suffered no prejudice by the alleged uncertainty.

[4, 5] The most important point in the case arises over the claim of the defendant that the plaintiff, if he had exercised reasonable care, would have discovered at the time of planting the trees, in April, 1911, that the trees were grafted on peach roots and not on myrobalan roots. The testimony of plaintiff himself was that at the time of the planting of the trees, in April, 1911, he took the trees out of the trenches in which they had been "heeled in"; that in so doing he saw the roots of almost all of the trees, and that he found four or five peach pits clinging to the little fibrous roots of the trees; that this disturbed him and created in his mind a suspicion that the trees were not on myrobalan roots. At that time he had no knowledge of the difference in appearance between the two kinds of roots. He immediatly inquired of the men who were planting the trees for him, and was informed that they also did not know the difference. Thereupon he called upon Mr. Edgman, who was the defendant's agent for the sale of the trees, and who had made the sale of these trees to Mr. Burge, told him about the peach pits, and was advised by Edgman not to worry about it, that the trees were on myrobalan roots; that the defendant would not send anything not on myrobalan roots just as ordered; that he (Edgman) knew they were, and that the peach pits had probably stuck to the roots while in the nursery after they were uprooted for shipment, since all sorts of pits were usually lying about nursery yards. With this assurance the plaintiff was satisfied and made no further investigation. On this subject the court instructed the jury that if they should find that plaintiff did not discover, and could not by reasonable diligence have discovered, that the trees were not on myrobalan roots, until the spring of 1913, then they should estimate the damages according to the difference in values established by the evidence at that time; that ordinary care or reasonable diligence does not exclude all negligence, but is that degree of care which is exercised by ordinarily prudent persons under the same or similar circumstances, and that they should not find that plaintiff should have discovered the breach of warranty when he found the peach shells on the roots, unless they further found that an ordinarily prudent person would have discovered the fact under the same or similar circumstances, and that to that end they should consider all the facts and circumstances of the case shown by the evidence, including the relations between plaintiff, and defendant and its agents, any representations that may have been made by him to them, and the degree of knowledge required to distinguish the peach root from the myrobalan root, and the plaintiff's experience therein at the time. This instruction is not complained of, and we think it correctly states the law. It further appeared from the evidence that the plaintiff had had no previous experience in the planting or cultivation of trees of any kind; that the main difference in appearance between myrobalan roots and peach roots was a slight difference in color, the myrobalan root having a somewhat reddish tinge, and the peach root a yellowish tinge. The question whether a man has been careful or negligent in such circumstances is peculiarly a question for the jury. It is seldom that negligence of this character can be predicated upon facts as a matter of law, and unless this can be done the Supreme Court cannot set aside the verdict of the jury on that ground. In view of the facts above related we are satisfied that in the present case the question is one for the jury, and that this court cannot disturb its decision.

[6] The theory of the plaintiff upon the trial was that the time of the actual discovery of the peach roots in April, 1913, was the time for the estimate of values upon which the measure of damages was to be computed. The defendant contended that the time of ascertaining the damages was either the time of delivery, or the time when the plaintiff discovered the peach pits clinging to the roots in April, 1911. The case is not to be distinguished on this point from Shearer v. Park Nursery Co., 103 Cal. 415, 37 Pac. 412, 42 Am. St. Rep. 125. The Civil Code provides that the measure of damages for a breach of warranty of quality of personal property is the excess of the value which the property would have had "at the time to which the warranty referred, if it had been complied with, over its actual value at that time." Section 3313. It also provides that damages for breach of an obligation are measured by the amount which would compensate the party aggrieved for all the detriment proximately caused thereby, or which in the ordinary course of things would be likely to result therefrom. Civ. Code, § 3300. In the Shearer Case, where fruit trees were sold with a warranty of quality as to the variety, the breach was not discoverable at the time of planting, nor until the trees began to bear fruit. The court held that the phrase, "the time to which the warranty referred," in section 3313, should be construed in such cases to mean "the time when the breach thereof is, or with due diligence might be, discovered by the purchaser," and that the proper method of ascertaining such difference, when the discovery could not be made until after the trees were planted, would be to take the difference at the time of discovery, between the value of the land as planted to the trees delivered, and the value such land would then have had if it had been planted with trees of the kinds warranted by the seller. This case is approved in Germain Fruit Co. v. Armsby Co., 153 Cal. 590, 96 Pac. 319. The defendant objected to all the evidence tending to show the difference in value of the land in April, 1913, when the discovery was actually made. The soundness of the objection of necessity would depend upon the question of fact whether by due diligence the breach might have been sooner discovered. As this was a question to be determined by the jury, it necessarily follows that the court did not err in overruling the objection and admitting the evidence. The question of fact, as to when the discovery might have been made by reasonable diligence, was properly submitted to the jury by the instruction.

[7] There is no real conflict in the instructions. They express two theories; one upon the hypothesis that the discovery could not with diligence have been made prior to April, 1913, the other upon the theory that the plaintiff did not exercise reasonable diligence in following up the suspicion he had at the time of the planting. Inasmuch as the jury had to determine the fact upon which these theories depended, it was proper that they should have instructions as to the measure of damages upon both theories.

[8-10] The defendant claims that there was no warranty that the trees delivered should be trees grafted upon myrobalan roots. This contention is without foundation. The description of the trees contained in the contract declared that they should be "on myrobalan." The contract was upon a printed form, and a clause therein authorizing the seller to substitute other varieties for those ordered was erased, and below the description were inserted in pencil the words "Stock guaranteed true to name." The fact that the contract described the trees as "on myrobalan," of itself constituted a guaranty that the trees sold should be grafted upon myrobalan roots. Flint v. Lyon, 4 Cal. 21. The reasonable construction of the penciled clause, "Stock guaranteed true to name," is that such guaranty applied to all names descriptive of the trees, wherever they appear in the contract, and as the term "on myrobalan" constituted a part of such description, the guaranty is to be understood as a warranty that the trees should be as described in the contract; that is, on myrobalan roots. There was no ambiguity in the contract as to the meaning of the words "guaranteed true to name," and it was not error for the court to refuse to allow testimony by persons engaged in the nursery business, to the effect that such guaranty applied only to the varieties of trees, and not to the variety of roots on which the trees were to be grafted. These comprise all the points urged in appellant's brief. We find no substantial error.

The judgment is affirmed.

HOARE v. GLANN. (S. F. 7554.)

Rehearing Denied Nov. 15, 1917.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑353 — COMPLETION BY CONTRACTOR AND ASSIGNOR—USE OF MATERIALS—LIABILITY.

Where a contract for paving work in a town provided that, if the contractor did not perform it satisfactorily, the town might complete the work, and that material along the work should become its property, and might be used without allowing the contractor anything therefor, and the contractor assigned the contract to defendant, with a provision that, if defendant failed to perform the work to the town's satisfaction and the town so notified the contractor, the defendant's interest should cease and the contractor might terminate the assignment and complete the work, and defendant abandoned the work, the contractor, in completing it as directed by a resolution of the town, was not acting as its agent, but under the contract, and hence was liable for his appropriation of material purchased of him by the defendant and lying along the street.

2. ACTION 🔑28—WAIVER OF TORTS—ACTION ON CONTRACT.

In such case, the assignee might waive the wrong committed by the contractor and assignor in appropriating the material without the assignee's consent, and claim as under an implied contract for its value as it lay upon the street.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Edgar T. Zook, Judge.

Action by P. H. Hoare against Nathaniel P. Glann, in which, after his death, Merrie A. Glann, executrix, was substituted as defendant, with counterclaim by defendant. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying her motion for new trial, defendant appeals. Judgment and order reversed.

Henry Conlin, of San Francisco, and E. B. Martinelli, of San Rafael, for appellant. B. D. Marx Greene and J. A. Elston, both of Berkeley, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying her motion for a new trial.

The action was begun in the lifetime of Nathaniel P. Glann. The complainant states a cause of action against him for the recovery of $4,463.24, alleged to have been due from him to the plaintiff, for crushed rock sold and delivered by plaintiff to said Glann. After the trial, but before the decision below, Glann died, and the defendant, as administratrix of his estate, was duly substituted as defendant. The answer alleged as a counterclaim against the plaintiff that the plaintiff was indebted to Glann in the sum of $6,590.64 for crushed rock belonging to Glann, appropriated and used by said plaintiff, upon which, after deducting the amount due to the plaintiff upon the account sued on by him, there remained a balance of $2,127.40, for which the defendant asked judgment against the plaintiff.

The court found that the money was due to the plaintiff from the decedent for the rock sold by plaintiff to said decedent in his lifetime, as alleged in his complaint, but that the plaintiff had not appropriated or used any rock belonging to said decedent, and was not indebted to decedent, and that nothing was due upon the counterclaim. Judgment was thereupon given for $4,463.24 due upon the plaintiff's claim.

The facts are as follows: The plaintiff entered into a contract with the town of Larkspur for the paving of a street in said town. After making the contract, Hoare assigned the same to said Nathaniel P. Glann. The agreement of assignment provided that Glann was to perform the work required by said contract, and that if he failed to prosecute the work to the satisfaction of the engineer of the town of Larkspur, or the board of trustees thereof, then, upon written notice to Hoare from said board that the contract was not being properly performed, the interest of Glann in the contract should cease, and that Hoare might thereupon inform the board that the assignment had been terminated and immediately proceed to complete the work himself. There was an oral agreement between Glann and Hoare, at the time of the assignment, that Glann should purchase from Hoare the crushed rock to be used in performing the contract, to be delivered by Hoare on the cars at Petaluma at the price of 80 cents per ton. In pursuance of the assignment Glann entered upon the performance of the contract and did a large amount of work thereunder. Under the oral agreement he purchased from Hoare a large quantity of crushed rock, which was delivered to him at Petaluma, and by him carried from Petaluma to the place of work, along the streets, ready for use. He had not paid therefor in full, and the amount sued for in the complaint was the balance unpaid upon the rock so purchased. Glann had also procured rock from others, and some of this rock had been delivered for use on the street. When Hoare took charge of the work, after the default of Glann, a large quantity of this rock lay along the line of work ready for use. There was evidence tending to prove that the value of this rock, in place, as it lay ready for use, was $6,590.64, as alleged in the counterclaim. After partly completing the work Glann was notified by the town board that the work was not being done to the satisfaction of the engineer, and the board also gave written notice to Hoare that the contract was not being properly performed. The board refused to allow Glann to proceed, and directed that Hoare should complete the work under the original contract with the town. Hoare proceeded to complete the work after taking charge thereof, and used in such completion the whole of the rock so provided by Glann therefor, and lying along the line of the work.

The court below made findings to the effect that Hoare had not appropriated, taken, or used any rock or other property belonging to Glann, and held that Glann was not entitled to anything on account of the rock provided by him along the street and used by Hoare in the completion of the improvement. The original contract with the town of Larkspur provided that if Hoaré, the original contractor, failed to perform the work to the satisfaction of the town authorities, the town itself could take possession thereof and proceed to complete the work, and that if it did so the material provided for its completion by the contractor and delivered upon and along the work should become the property of the town, and could be used by it in such completion without allowing the contractor anything therefor. The court below was of the opinion that when Hoare took charge of the work to complete the contract he did so as agent of the town of Larkspur, that he was entitled to all the rights of said town, and that in using the material already provided by Glann he was not appropriating the property of Glann to that use, but was taking property which belonged to the town of Larkspur, and that he owed Glann nothing therefor.

[1, 2] We think the court was mistaken as to the legal effect of the facts proven and admitted to be true. It is clear from the evidence that the transaction by which Hoare took over from Glann the further prosecution of the work and completed it himself was a mere carrying out of the terms of the agreement between him and Glann for the assignment of the original contract. When Glann was discharged by the town board from the further prosecution of the work, the board passed a resolution referring to the terms of the assignment of the original contract by Hoare to Glann, and to the fact that said assignment had terminated by reason of the notice previously given by the board to Hoare and Glann, and stating that by the terms of the original contract Hoare was still bound to perform the work required thereby; that he had offered to do so, and that in the opinion of the board it was for the best interests of the town and Hoare that he should be directed to do so, and thereupon it directed Hoare to proceed forthwith to complete the work under his original contract. It was in pursuance of this resolution that Hoare completed the work. His status upon beginning the work anew was precisely the same as if he had never made an assignment to Glann. The town did not undertake the performance of the work itself, as the original contract provided that it might do, but instead thereof directed the original contractor Hoare, to perform his contract in accordance with its terms. The forfeiture of the rock provided by Glann for the work and delivered along the line of the street, as provided by the original contract, was not enforced by the town, and did not take place. It follows that the town never acquired any right to said rock, and that Hoare, upon again taking up the work, did not succeed to any rights of the town to the rock provided by Glann. With respect to Glann and Hoare, the rock so provided was the property of Glann. Hoare had no legal right to appropriate it to his own use, except with Glann's consent. The title to the rock sold to Glann had completely passed to Glann at the time Hoare appropriated it. Glann thereupon had the right to waive the wrong committed by Hoare in appropriating the rock without Glann's consent, and to claim as under an implied contract for the value thereof as it lay upon the street. The court should have made findings in accordance with the evidence upon the facts set forth in the counterclaim, and should have allowed the defendant the reasonable value of the material in place at the time it was appropriated by the plaintiff.

The judgment and order are reversed.

TAYLOR v. ALBION LUMBER CO.

(S. F. 7350.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑278(10) — INJURIES TO SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY—EXCAVATION.

Evidence held sufficient to show negligence on the part of the master in putting deceased at work drilling an old shot hole in which all of the dynamite had not been exploded.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑189(2) — INJURIES TO SERVANT—FELLOW SERVANTS—VICE PRINCIPALS—FOREMEN.

A foreman employed to superintend the work who had authority to direct deceased at his work represented the master, and his negligence was that of the master.

3. DEATH 🔑32 — ACTION FOR BENEFIT OF MOTHER.

The mother or personal representative of a deceased employé has a right of action under Code Civ. Proc. § 377, for death by wrongful act, and is not confined to the remedy under Civ. Code, § 1970, providing for damages for the benefit of dependent parents of a deceased employé.

4. DEATH 🔑32 — ACTION FOR BENEFIT OF MOTHER—NONRESIDENT ALIEN.

That the mother of the deceased employé killed by negligence of the foreman was a nonresident alien was immaterial on the question of right of action for her benefit under Code Civ. Proc. § 377.

5. WAR 🔑11—"ALIEN ENEMY."

An alien enemy is one with whose country the United States is at war.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Alien Enemy.]

6. WAR 🔑10(2)—ALIEN ENEMIES—RIGHTS.

The rights of a nonresident alien enemy are merely suspended until the cessation of hostilities.

7. WAR 🔑10(2)—ALIEN ENEMIES—RIGHT OF ACTION.

Where an employé was killed three years prior to participation of the United States as a belligerent in the war against Germany, and the deceased's mother was an alien, resident in Austria-Hungary, to which the declaration of war had not been extended, an appeal from a judgment dismissing the action will not be dismissed on the ground that she was an alien enemy, since that would perpetually bar the mother from pursuing her claim, but the judgment of dismissal will be reversed.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; J. Q. White, Judge.

Action by John Taylor, as administrator of the estate of Anton Bozich, deceased, against the Albion Lumber Company. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

T. E. K. Cormac and Wal J. Tuska, both of San Francisco, and Thomas & Thomas, of Ukiah, for appellant. Mannon & Mannon, of Ukiah, and L. A. Redman and Redman & Alexander, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. The decedent, Anton Bozich, also known as Anton Bozic, while acting in the course of his employment by the defendant on March 25, 1911, received injuries which caused his death within a few days thereafter. Upon the theory that the injuries causing death were due to the negligence of defendant, this action was brought by the administrator of his estate, on behalf of his mother Helena Bozic, alleged and shown to be his sole heir at law, and alleged to be wholly dependent upon him for subsistence and support, and damaged by his death. When at the trial plaintiff concluded his case, a motion for a nonsuit was made by defendant substantially on the grounds:

First, that section 1970, Civil Code, vests no right of action in a nonresident alien; second, that the statute provides for the recovery for the benefit of dependent parents only, and that the evidence fails to show that Helena Bozic was a dependent parent within the meaning of that section; third, that there was a total insufficiency of the evidence to show any negligence on the part of defendant, etc. The learned judge of the lower court indicated that he thought the third ground not well taken, and the first ground well taken, but granted the motion on the second ground, viz. that there was no sufficient showing of dependency to go to the jury. Judgment was accordingly given that the action be dismissed. We have here an appeal by plaintiff from such judgment.

[1, 2] We are of the opinion that a sufficient case for the jury was made in so far as the third ground of the motion was concerned, viz. insufficiency of the evidence to show any negligence, etc., on the part of the defendant. It was admitted that one Walter Kirry was the foreman employed to superintend the work being done by deceased at the time of the accident, occupying a position superior to him and empowered to direct him in his work and give him orders in connection therewith, and that deceased was subject to his orders. Deceased and a fellow workman named Kuharic were engaged in drilling holes for dynamite charges in connection with some blasting that was being done in building a road. On the day before the happening of the accident they had drilled some holes. The evidence tended to show that after they had left work for the night, Kirry charged the same with dynamite and set off the blasts. For some reason all of the dynamite in one hole did not explode. The next morning when the men returned to work the hole was found filled with earth, while the rock around was cracked. There was testimony to the effect that Kirry instructed them to clean out and deepen the hole for the purpose of another blast, telling them that the night before he had put some dynamite in the hole and lit and exploded it—that the dynamite he had placed therein had been exploded—that the explosion was very weak because he had put in too little powder. There was evidence further tending to show that the two men had no reason to doubt the statement that the hole was free of unexploded dynamite. They proceeded to clean out the hole, first with a spoon to remove the loose dirt, and then, because they could accomplish nothing further with the spoon, using a drill, which one held while the other struck it with a hammer. The drill came in contact with the unexploded dynamite, and the explosion followed. Accepting this evidence as true, which we must do in considering the merits of the motion for a nonsuit, it appears that Kirry set these men at this dangerous task, not only without warning them of any danger of an explosion, but with the express assurance that there was no such danger because he himself had exploded the dynamite the night before, and that the failure of the blast was due to the fact that he had not put in enough dynamite. Certainly the jury would be warranted in concluding that Kirry was negligent in this matter. His negligence would be the negligence of his employer, the defendant, for in this matter he was the representative of his employer, and not a mere fellow servant. See Foley v. California Horse Shoe Co., 115 Cal. 194, 47 Pac. 42, 56 Am. St. Rep. 87. We think the observation of the trial judge to the effect that plaintiff had made a sufficient case for the jury in so far as this ground of the motion was concerned was well based.

[3] As to the second ground of the motion. The case appears to have proceeded to this point upon the theory that the only right in the mother of deceased to damages for the death of her son, although such death was caused by the neglect of his employer, is such right as is given by section 1970, Civil Code. That section provides for an action in the cases covered thereby, by the personal representative of the employé, for damages for the benefit, in the absence of wife or children, of "dependent parents" of the employé. It was claimed by defendant and held by the trial court that there was no sufficient showing of dependency on the part of the mother. This was the very point made in the case of Gonsalves v. Petaluma & Santa Rosa Railway Co., 173 Cal. 264, 159 Pac. 724, where dependency was not shown, and where it was claimed, in view of the provisions of section 1970, Civil Code, that such a showing was essential to a recovery for the benefit of a parent. Undoubtedly this would be true if the parent's right is to be determined solely with reference to such section. But it was held in that case that section 377, Code of Civil Procedure, giving a right of action to the heirs or personal representatives of a person, not a minor, whose death is caused by the wrongful act or neglect of another, against such person, or if such person be employed by another who is responsible for his conduct, then also against such other person, in which action "such damages may be given as under all the circumstances of the case may be just," was not in any way superseded by the provisions of section 1970, Civil Code, and that a personal representative of a deceased employé might successfully maintain the action provided by section 377, Code of Civil Procedure, in every case where a right existed independent of certain amendments to section 1970, Civil Code, made in the year 1907. Stats. 1907, p. 119. It was pointed out that these amendments greatly modified the earlier rules touching the assumption of risks and nonliability for injuries occasioned by the negligence of a fellow servant, giving a right of recovery in such cases under circumstances where no such right before existed. It was said:

> "Section 1970 of the Civil Code is to be construed with section 377, not as superseding it, and so construed it means, as declared in Pritchard v. Whitney Estate Co., 164 Cal. 564, 129 Pac. 989, that where section 1970 has created rights of action growing out of the relationship of employer and employé, which rights of action did not formerly exist (the italics are ours), such rights of action by the representative of an employé who has lost his life may be prosecuted for the benefit of the class limited and designated in the section itself."

As to other rights of action, viz. those not created by the amendments to section 1970, Civil Code, but which existed prior to such amendments, the limitations of section 1970, Civil Code, have no effect. In that case the cause of action was founded on the employer's neglect in furnishing the employé a safe place in which to work, and it was held that such a cause of action was not one created and given by section 1970, Civil Code, but one that had always existed under section 377, Code of Civil Procedure, and that consequently proof of dependency on the part of the parents was not essential to a recovery.

There can be no doubt that in the matters constituting the basis of plaintiff's claim, Kirry was acting as the representative of his employer. Just as in the Gonsalves Case, the alleged negligent omission was in the matter of using reasonable care in furnishing to the employé a safe place in which to work. The employer cannot escape liability by a delegation of such a duty to another employé. The foreman to whom the duty was delegated here was the representative of the employer, and any negligence on his part was the negligence of the employer. See Foley v. California Horse Shoe Co., supra; Skelton v. Pacific Lumber Co., 140 Cal. 511, 74 Pac. 13, and cases there cited. The Gonsalves Case explicitly decides that for such negligence section 377, Code of Civil Procedure, has always given an action, and that it is not a cause of action created by section 1970, Civil Code. The action given by section 377, Code of Civil Procedure, is one for the benefit of "heirs" of the employé, and lies, regardless of their condition as to dependency, for any pecuniary loss they may suffer by reason of the death. See Hillebrand v. Standard Biscuit Co., 139 Cal. 236, 73 Pac. 163. As said in Sneed v. Marysville, etc., Co., 149 Cal. 710, 87 Pac. 379:

> "This pecuniary loss may be either a loss arising from the deprivation of something to which such heirs would have been legally entitled if the person had lived, or a loss arising from a deprivation of benefits which, from all the circumstances of the particular case, it could be reasonably expected such heirs would have received from the deceased had his life not been taken, although the obligation resting on him to bestow such benefits on them may have been a moral obligation only."

The second ground of motion for nonsuit was without merit.

[4] That the mother is a nonresident alien is, in our opinion, altogether immaterial. Certainly section 377, Code of Civil Procedure, makes no exception in this regard. Whether section 1970, Civil Code, fails to cover the case of a nonresident alien, the question raised by the first ground of the motion for a nonsuit is immaterial here in view of the fact that the action may be sustained as one under section 377, Code of Civil Procedure, but we are not to be understood as intimating that section 1970, Civil Code, excludes such an alien. The complaint in this case alleged all the facts essential to the cause of action created by section 377, Code of Civil Procedure, and the evidence made a sufficient prima facie case in that regard. Under these circumstances we may not shut our eyes to this and affirm the judgment which is obviously erroneous, simply because counsel for plaintiff have not relied on this section. It is only just to them as well as to the learned judge of the trial court to note that the Gonsalves Case was not decided by this court until after the trial of this cause and the writing of the briefs upon which the cause was originally submitted for decision upon the appeal.

[5-7] In the petition for a hearing in this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal, it was suggested that the appeal must be dismissed because the mother of deceased is a subject and resident of Austria-Hungary, and hence, it is claimed, a nonresident alien enemy. An alien enemy is one with whose country the United States is at war. 2 Corpus Juris, 1043. The judgment appealed from was given on June 11, 1914, nearly three years prior to the beginning of our participation as a belligerent in the present war, and of course the record here shows nothing in this behalf. There has, as yet, been no declaration by either nation of a state of war between the United States and Austria-Hungary, our declaration being limited to Germany. We may concede that a state of war may in fact exist between two nations without any official declaration to that effect by either nation. Whether such is the existing situation as between the United States and Austria-Hungary we do not feel called upon to determine on this appeal. Even if we could properly conclude upon the record and the facts of which we can take judicial notice that a state of war does exist between the two governments, and that the mother is a nonresident alien enemy within the meaning of the rule precluding actions and recoveries by or for persons in that class, a dismissal of plaintiff's appeal would not be proper. Those facts would not warrant a forfeiture of the mother's right of action. The rights of a nonresident alien enemy are simply suspended until the cessation of hostilities. See Hutchinson v. Brock, 11 Mass. 119. Also, 40 Cyc. p. 328, and notes. A dismissal by us of the appeal would be in effect an affirmance of the judgment against the mother, perpetually barring her from pursuing her claim. The judgment against her is erroneous. It should be reversed and the cause remanded to the lower court, where defendant will be at liberty to urge such objections in this regard, by plea or otherwise, as it sees fit.

The judgment is reversed.

KIRTLEY v. PERHAM et al. (S. F. 7046.)

1. SALES 🔑391(7)—DESTRUCTION OF PROPERTY—RIGHTS OF BUYER.

The buyer of newspaper routes, who was to collect money due from subscribers and pay the newspaper proprietors whatever should be due them out of such collections and who, after the newspaper had ceased publication, offered to restore the routes and demanded a rescission, was entitled to recover the money paid the seller as part of the price, less the profits he had realized from the property while he had possession, and to be relieved from the payment of the remainder of the purchase price.

2. SALES 🔑61—CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT—EXECUTORY SALE.

An agreement whereby defendants in consideration of a certain sum agreed to sell, and the buyer agreed to purchase, certain newspaper routes, with the right to collect money due from subscribers and to pay over all amounts properly receivable by them out of the collections, was an executory agreement to sell the routes, to be executed by a final transfer upon payment of the full purchase price.

3. SALES 🔑262½ — NEWSPAPER ROUTES — WARRANTY OF CONTINUANCE OF PUBLICATION.

Under such agreement there was no warranty that the publication of the newspaper should continue.

4. SALES 🔑150(2)—SPECULATIVE CONTRACT—ASSUMPTION OF RISK—NEWSPAPER ROUTES.

The rule that, where the parties knowingly enter into a speculative contract, they are supposed to calculate the chances and assume risks, in the absence of fraud, and that neither party can obtain relief if without his fault the facts upon which the agreement is founded turn out differently from what was expected, does not apply to an executory sale of newspaper routes, as there was nothing more in the nature of a speculation as to the result, or as to the newspaper's continued publication, than in any other case of sale of property which may perish or become extinct.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑909(5)—PRESUMPTIONS—SELLER'S RIGHT.

Under an executory contract for the sale of property, described as certain newspaper routes for the delivery and service of the newspaper, it would be presumed, in the absence of anything to the contrary in the contract or in the record, that the right sold was a right which the seller had acquired under a contract which the publisher could not revoke.

6. JUDGMENT 🔑234 — PARTIES — STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

In an action to recover money paid by purchaser of certain newspaper routes after the newspaper had discontinued publication, it was alleged that one defendant received part of the money as trustee under a certain will, and also as guardian of one of the beneficiaries under the will, and also asked judgment against one of the beneficiaries individually. Before the action was brought, the interests of the parties defendant had changed. Held, that a judgment dividing the amount due among the defendants according to their respective interests, as shown at the time of the trial, was not a fatal variance, and within the power of the court to render, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 578–580.

7. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1170(12) — HARMLESS ERROR—FORM OF JUDGMENT.

An immaterial variance between the allegations and the findings and judgment did not constitute cause for reversal of the judgment, in view of Const. art. 6, § 4½, providing that no judgment shall be set aside or new trial granted for any error of procedure, unless such error resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Marcel E. Cerf, Judge.

Action by C. A. Kirtley against George L. Perham and others, with counterclaim by defendants. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal on the judgment roll. Affirmed.

A. A. Sanderson and Tum Suden & Tum Suden, all of San Francisco, for appellants. Samuel M. Shortridge, Wm. M. Abbott, and Wm. M. Cannon, all of San Francisco, amici curiæ. O'Connor & Schwartz, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The defendants appeal from the judgment, upon the judgment roll alone.

The complaint, as a cause of action against the defendants, alleges that they are jointly indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $4,599.38, for money jointly had and received by the defendants, to and for the use of the plaintiff, and that said sum of money remains unpaid. The defendants, in addition to the answer denying the indebtedness alleged in the complaint, filed a pleading which they denominate a cross-complaint, but which, more accurately speaking, is a counterclaim; it being a cause of action arising out of the transaction set forth in the complaint as the foundation of the plaintiff's claim. Code Civ. Proc. § 438. The main questions presented for decision arise upon the facts set forth in the cross-complaint and the findings of the court thereon.

The money had and received by defendants for which the plaintiff sues was money paid by plaintiff to defendants as part of the price of certain personal property sold by the defendants to the plaintiff in accordance with the terms of a written agreement between them. His claim is that while he was in possession of the property under the agreement of sale, but before the price became due and before he received title to the property sold to him, the property itself, without his fault, ceased to exist, and that as a consequence he was relieved from the obligation to pay the remainder of the price, and became entitled to recover from the defendants the money he had paid thereon, less the profits he had realized from the property during the time he had the possession and use thereof.

The defendants in their counterclaim allege a cause of action for the recovery of the part of the purchase price of the property which had not been paid to them by the plaintiff. They proceed upon the theory that, in the case of a sale of personal property upon an agreement whereby the possession is delivered to the buyer before the price is to be paid, the fact that the property sold is lost, destroyed, or ceases to exist, without fault on their part, before payment is due, does not excuse the buyer from his promise to pay the entire price agreed upon, although the title in the meantime is, by the terms of the contract, to remain in the seller. They also contend that in the present case the title, as well as the possession, was tranferred to the buyer at the time of the execution of the agreement.

The court below held with the plaintiff upon these propositions, refused any relief upon the counterclaim of the defendants, and gave judgment for the plaintiff for the sums he had paid upon the price, less the profits realized, as above stated.

Mr. Williston, in his treatise on Sales, says that where goods sold are delivered to the buyer, but title is retained by the seller until the price is paid, inasmuch as the buyer has the immediate use of the goods, he must stand the loss from subsequent ordinary deteriorations, and that "it seems properly to follow that, if the goods are accidentally destroyed or injured, the buyer must stand the loss; that is, he must pay the price in full at the time agreed. The decisions upon the point are in conflict, but the weight of authority sustains the view here expressed." Williston on Sales, § 304. The defendants rely on this doctrine.

[1, 2] We need not review the authorities said to be in conflict, or examine into the merits of the diverse arguments therein. In this state the question is settled in favor of the plaintiff and in accordance with the decision of the court below. Discussing the case of a sale of personal property to be delivered in the future, where the property, without fault of the vendor, has perished in the interval, the court in Potts v. Benedict, 156 Cal. 334, 104 Pac. 432, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 609, says:

> "The liability to pay the price in such a case, notwithstanding failure to deliver possession, rests upon the fact that the purchaser was the owner of the property at the time of its destruction. It is elementary in the law of sales that, in the absence of special agreement to the contrary, the risk accompanies the title, and that when a present unconditional sale is actually consummated and the title has passed, the property is thenceforth at the risk of the buyer, so far as accidental destruction by fire, etc., is concerned, even though possession thereof has not been delivered" (citing cases). "Where there is a mere agreement to sell, and title therefor has not passed, the loss falls on the vendor for the same reason. In such a case the vendor is excused from the performance of his contract under the rule we have discussed by reason of the destruction of the thing, but he cannot retain money already paid on account of the proposed purchase, or recover moneys remaining unpaid."

The decisions in Smith v. Phœnix Ins. Co., 91 Cal. 323, 27 Pac. 738, 13 L. R. A. 475, 25 Am. St. Rep. 191, Tyson v. Wells, 2 Cal. 122, Hewlet v. Flint, 7 Cal. 265, Girdner v. Beswick, 69 Cal. 118, 10 Pac. 278, Conlin v. Osborn, 161 Cal. 666, 120 Pac. 755, Peatland v. Edwards, 23 Cal. App. 405, 138 Pac. 257, and Waltz v. Silveria, 25 Cal. App. 719, 145 Pac. 169, are to the same effect. The textbooks state the same rule. 35 Cyc. 343; 24 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 1045; 2 Mechem on Sales, § 1413; 3 Page on Contracts, § 1370. And Mr. Williston himself in section 301 states the general rule to be that the loss in such cases falls on him who has the title at the time. And in section 164, on the same subject, he says:

> "If the property is destroyed or injured before the time when it was agreed the title should pass, the buyer cannot be compelled to pay the price, and if he has paid the price in advance it may be recovered."

It is not disputed in this case that the property sold under the agreement, with the exception of an unimportant portion thereof, which the court finds had no substantial value, ceased to exist about two years after the execution of the agreement, without fault of either party. The property, as described in the record, consisted of the right to deliver a morning newspaper published in San Francisco, known as the San Francisco Call, to subscribers residing upon certain streets in San Francisco. The right, as described in the agreement, was either a permanent right or one which was to continue to exist for an indefinite period in the future. Nothing was said therein, or anywhere in the record, as to the term of its continuance. The agreement is dated August 31, 1911, and according to the record it was executed and delivered about September 21, 1911. The publication of the San Francisco Call was permanently discontinued on September 1, 1913, and thereupon the right to deliver the same to subscribers, which was the subject of the agreement of sale, necessarily ceased to have any value whatever and in fact ceased to exist. Publication of the paper has never been resumed.

From the principles above stated, as established by our decisions, it follows that if we assume that the title to this right remained in the sellers, by virtue of the terms of the agreement, at the time such publication was discontinued, the loss must fall upon the defendants, and the plaintiff was entitled to recover the sum which he had already paid on the price thereof. It is necessary, therefore, to determine the effect of the agreement with respect to the transfer of title and the time when the same was to pass to the buyer. The agreement declares that:

> "This contract of sale and the sale of said property herein provided for, and the terms and conditions hereof, are made subject to the approval and confirmation of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, wherein the estate of said Abbie L. Randall, deceased, and the guardianship of said Laurence George Randall, said minor, are pending."

It shows that Perham entered into the agreement as the executor of the estate of Abbie L. Randall, deceased, and as guardian of Laurence George Randall, a minor, and that the defendant, William Edgar Randall, executed it in his own behalf. The agreement of sale was confirmed by the superior court for Perham, as executor, on September 14, 1911, and for Perham, as guardian, on September 21, 1911, and thereupon it became effective as of its date. It states that the vendors, for the sum of $8,000, to be paid to them by said C. A. Kirtley, "hereby promise and agree to sell" to Kirtley, and that Kirtley "hereby agrees to purchase from" the vendors, the property described. It recites that $2,500 was paid in cash on the price, and it provides that Kirtley should have three years from the date of the agreement within which to pay the balance, with the privilege of paying thereon, at any time or times, sums of $100 or more; that if he failed to pay the full price, or in other particulars failed to perform his covenants in the agreement expressed, the amount paid by him should be forfeited, and the agreement should thereupon become null and void; that upon the fulfillment by him of his covenants, and the payment by him of the full price, the vendors agree to execute to Kirtley a proper bill of sale, conveying to him "all the right, title, and interest" of the vendors, "in and to the delivery and service of said newspapers." It further provides that "the possession of said newspaper route and routes, and each of them, shall be, and each of them is hereby, placed with" said Kirtley, and that during the life of the contract and agreement, the delivery and service of said Call newspaper over said routes should be made by Kirtley in compliance with the rules and regulations regarding the same, promulgated and demanded by said newspaper, and that Kirtley should collect the moneys due from subscribers, and pay to the newspaper proprietors all thereof properly due and receivable by them out of said collections. The contract also included the right to serve and deliver, within the territory prescribed, another newspaper known as the California Demokrat. This newspaper has not ceased publication, but the court found that the right to deliver the same formed no material part of the consideration of the plaintiff's purchase, and that the plaintiff was willing to restore that right to the vendors or their successors in interest. It appears that before the beginning of the action the plaintiff offered to restore the same to the vendors and demanded a rescission.

From these provisions of the agreement it is clear that it constituted nothing more than an executory agreement to sell to Kirtley the property described therein, and that the title thereto was to remain in the vendors until Kirtley had paid the full price fixed for the property, and had in the meantime performed all the other covenants of the agreement to be performed by him, and that only upon such performance was the title to be transferred to him. The fact that the agreement declares that it was entered into subject to confirmation by the superior court does not alter its character. The effect of that provision was that it did not become an effective agreement until such confirmation was procured, and the result was that, when the proposed agreement was confirmed, it took effect as an executory agreement only, and that by virtue of its terms it related back to its date for the purpose of fixing the time of the inception of the right of possession by Kirtley and the time for the payment of the price. The agreement constitutes an executory contract of sale, to be completed and executed by a final transfer upon payment of the price. The delivery of possession of the property to Kirtley—that is to say, the turning over to him of the duty of delivering the newspapers and collecting the subscriptions—did not transform the transaction into a completed sale. It is a well-settled proposition that an agreement of sale may transfer the right of possession to the vendee without transferring to him the title. Such was the effect of this agreement. The case, therefore, comes within the rule stated in Potts v. Benedict, supra, that upon an executory agreement of sale, where title is retained in the vendor, although possession is given to the buyer, the loss entailed by the destruction or extinction of the subject-matter, without fault by either party, falls upon the vendor, and that he cannot recover any balance of the purchase price remaining unpaid, and is liable to the buyer for the repayment of the portions of the price previously paid. The authorities, so far as we are advised, do not declare that the buyer in such a case, if he has received possession of the property, can keep the profits received by him prior to its destruction or extinction, where he seeks recovery of advances on the price, and we think equity and justice demand that he should account to the vendor therefor. The court below, therefore, properly deducted the profits from the amounts paid by Kirtley upon the price.

[3] It is suggested that as there was no warranty that the publication of the Call should continue, and, as neither party could foresee its discontinuance, the rule stated in Potts v. Benedict should not apply. There is no force in this argument. In the case of the sale of a horse there may be no warranty as to its length of life, and no one could foresee the time of its death, yet the rule that the loss follows the title applies to such sales. Girdner v. Beswick, supra. No distinction of this character can be made.

[4] Defendants invoke the rule stated in Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence (section 855), quoted and approved in Colton v. Stanford, 82 Cal. 388, 23 Pac. 16, 16 Am. St. Rep. 137, that where parties knowingly enter into a speculative contract—one in which they intentionally speculate as to the result—"they are supposed to calculate the chances, and they certainly assume the risks," where there is no actual or constructive fraud, and neither party can obtain relief if, without his fault, the facts upon which the agreement is founded "turn out very different from what was expected or anticipated." This doctrine does not apply to cases of sales of personal property made under the circumstances shown in the present case. There was nothing more in the nature of a speculation as to the result, or as to the continuance of the publication of the Call, exhibited in the record, than there is in any other case of the sale of property which may die, perish or become extinct.

[5] Since the filing of the closing brief of the appellant, prior to the first submission of the cause, a number of additional briefs have been filed by the attorneys for the parties, and by attorneys appearing amici curiæ in behalf of other parties who claim to be interested in the questions involved. In these briefs it is contended that the subject-matter of the sale was nothing more than a personal agency for the delivery of newspapers for the publishers thereof, which was either not transferable or, if it could be transferred, that the transfer was complete when the publishers of the Call accepted Kirtley as such agent, and allowed him to perform the required service. There is nothing in the record to show how or from whom the plaintiffs acquired the property which the agreement purports to sell. It is there termed "property," and it is described as "all those two certain 'San Francisco Call' newspaper routes for the delivery and service of said newspaper" along the streets specified, including also the right to serve and deliver said "Demokrat" over said routes. It is certainly a legal possibility that the vendors could have possessed an unqualified and unconditional right to serve and deliver said newspapers along those streets for a definite term of years extending beyond the duration of this agreement of sale, under a contract which the publishers could not revoke, except for good cause. Such a right is assignable. There is nothing to the contrary in the agreement of sale or in the record. Hence in aid of the judgment we must presume that the right sold was of that character.

[6, 7] It is further claimed that there is a fatal variance between the allegations of the complaint and the findings and judgment. That there is a variance must be conceded. The complaint charged that the defendants jointly received the money sued for, and prayed judgment against Perham in two distinct capacities: First, as trustee under the will of Abbie L. Randall, deceased, for William Edgar Randall and Laurence George Randall; and, second, as guardian of Laurence George Randall—and also against William Edgar Randall individually. The judgment follows the conclusions of law, and is for $1,199.96, against Perham as trustee under the will of Abbie L. Randall and Laurence George Randall, jointly, for $1,199.96 against Laurence George Randall alone, and for $2,399.92 against William Edgar Randall. The explanation is as follows:

At the time the agreement of sale was made, a one-half interest in the property sold belonged to the estate of Abbie L. Randall, a one-fourth interest to Laurence George Randall, a minor, and one-fourth to William Edgar Randall, an adult, and Perham was executor of said estate and guardian of Laurence. The money paid on the price was, of course, held in the same proportions. The agreement purports to be a joint agreement of sale by all the interested parties, and it does not state whether their ownership is joint or several. Their ownership was in fact a common ownership; the interests being as above stated. The three parties interested as vendors each were to receive the benefit of a like interest or share in the money paid on the price; and, under section 1659 of the Civil Code, the implied promise to repay it, upon which the complaint is based, must be deemed to be joint and several. It was therefore permissible to sue them jointly. Before the action was begun the one-half interest in the property belonging to the estate of Abbie L. Randall, presumably including this money, was distributed to Perham, as trustee for the benefit of said William and Laurence, who were sons of said decedent, and the one-half thereof due to William, being a one-fourth interest in the proceeds of the property sold, had been delivered over to William by said trustee. At the time of the trial and judgment, therefore, William held a one-half interest in the money sued for, Laurence held a one-fourth interest therein, and the other one-fourth was held by Perham as trustee for the use and benefit of Laurence. The total sum found due to plaintiff being $4,799.80 the court divided it according to the respective interests, and gave judgment against each defendant for his proportion thereof.

While this may be a technical variance, so far as the mere form of words is concerned, it is not fatal. It was clearly within the power of the court to give such judgment under the provisions of sections 578, 579, and 580 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and as it was in accordance with the facts, and beneficial, rather than prejudicial, to the defendants, it does not constitute a cause for a reversal of the judgment. Const. art. 6, § 4½. It would perhaps have been more correct to have provided in the judgment that, so far as the judgment was against Perham, it was payable only out of the assets in his hands as trustee for Laurence. But this point is not suggested, and it is to be supposed that it was not considered of any importance. We find no error in the record of sufficient consequence to warrant a reversal.

The judgment is affirmed.

McCANN v. CHILDREN'S HOME SOC. OF CALIFORNIA et al. (L. A. 3976.)

1. CORPORATIONS 🔑29(1)—ATTACKING VALIDITY OF INCORPORATION—PERSONS ENTITLED.

Under Civ. Code, § 358, providing that the due incorporation of any company claiming in good faith to be a corporation and doing business as such or its right to exercise corporate powers shall not be inquired into collaterally in any private suit to which such de facto corporation may be a party, but that such inquiry may be had at the suit of the state on information of the Attorney General, where the persons attempting to incorporate a society carried on business and exercised the powers of a corporation, it was a de facto corporation, and the validity of its organization could not be inquired into collaterally in a private suit because the articles of incorporation were not verified.

2. CORPORATIONS 🔑34(3) — ESTOPPEL TO DENY CORPORATE ORGANIZATION.

The grantor, under a deed describing the grantee as a corporation duly organized, was estopped as against the corporation to deny that it was legally organized.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑882(17)—INVITED ERROR—FINDINGS.

Where the amended complaint alleged that a society which attempted to incorporate in 1891, and which agains incorporated in 1908, had continuously since 1891 exercised all the powers and functions of a corporation, plaintiff could not complain that the court found this fact as alleged by him.

4. CORPORATIONS 🔑499—ACTIONS—RIGHT TO DEFEND—CONDITIONS PRECEDENT.

Under Civ. Code, § 299, requiring every corporation to file a copy of its articles of incorporation in the county in which its property is located, and providing that any corporation failing to comply therewith cannot maintain or defend any action or proceeding in relation to such property until such articles are filed, a de facto corporation which filed its articles of incorporation after the commencement of an action against it, and the filing of an amended complaint, but before the filing of its answer, was entitled to defend the action.

5. CORPORATIONS 🔑387(2)—POWER TO ACQUIRE LAND—RIGHT TO QUESTION POWER.

Under Civ. Code, § 595, providing that no religious, social, or benevolent corporation may own or hold more real estate than may be necessary for its business and objects, not to exceed six lots in any city or town, nor more than 50 acres in the country, provided that any such corporation having the care, custody, control, and maintenance each year, upon an annual average of not less than 100 orphans, etc., shall be entitled to own and possess not to exceed 160 acres in the country, a conveyance of 80 acres of land to a children's home society carrying on the work of finding homes for dependent children and supervising the care of children so placed was not void on its face, and its validity could not be questioned in litigation between the corporation and private persons.

6. CORPORATIONS 🔑577 — PERFECTING ORGANIZATION—IDENTITY OF ORGANIZATIONS.

Where persons attempting to incorporate a society in 1891 thereafter carried on business as a corporation until 1908, when it was discovered that the original filing of articles was invalid for want of verification, whereupon they filed new articles of incorporation and took the other necessary steps to form a corporation under the same name as that formerly used, the new corporation then formed was a continuation of the existing de facto corporation, and the two organizations were identical.

7. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1011(1)—QUESTIONS OF FACT—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

Where, though there was evidence tending to show that a grantor was of unsound mind, this was met by contradictory evidence creating a substantial conflict, a finding that the grantor was of sound mind could not be questioned on appeal.

8. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑231(6)—RESERVATION OF GROUNDS OF REVIEW—NECESSITY OF SPECIFIC OBJECTIONS.

Conceding that it was improper to permit an expert to give his opinion that a grantor was of sound mind after stating that he heard or read all of the evidence introduced by the adverse party, the objection on this ground was not preserved for review where the objection made in the court below was on general grounds.

9. EVIDENCE 🔑558(8)—OPINION OF EXPERT—CROSS-EXAMINATION.

On cross-examination of an expert witness it was not permissible to read a lengthy hypothetical question and a lengthy answer thereto given by a different witness on a former trial, and ask the witness whether the answer so given was correct.

10. EVIDENCE 🔑558(6)—OPINION OF EXPERT—CROSS-EXAMINATION.

A hypothetical question asked an expert on cross-examination was improper where it assumed facts not in evidence.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

Action by Frank McCann, as administrator of Electus Serls, deceased, against the Children's Home Society of California and others. From a judgment for defendants, and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John T. Ryan, of San Francisco, and Joseph Scott, of Los Angeles, for appellant. A. E. Merrill, of Hollywood, Will D. Gould, of Los Angeles, and Wm. G. Griffith, of Santa Barbara, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. The administrator of the estate of Electus Serls, deceased, brought this action to set aside certain deeds made by his intestate, and to obtain a decree that those claiming under said deeds have no title to the property therein described.

On October 28, 1904, Electus Serls was the owner of a tract of land near Lompoc, Santa Barbara county, containing 80 acres. On that day he made and delivered a deed, purporting to convey said tract to the defendant, Children's Home Society of California, reserving to himself a life interest in the property. There was no money consideration. This deed described the grantee as "a corporation duly organized under the laws of the state of California." The said Children's Home Society of California was a charitable or benevolent organization, carrying on the work of finding homes for dependent children and supervising the care of the children so placed. In December, 1891, the persons conducting this organization had attempted to form a corporation under the provisions of title 12 of part 4 of division first of the Civil Code (section 593 et seq.). Articles of incorporation were filed in the office of the county clerk of the county of Los Angeles, a copy thereof filed in the office of the secretary of state, and a certificate of incorporation issued. Thereupon said Children's Home Society of California carried on business as a corporation until 1908, when it was discovered that the original filing of articles was invalid for want of the verification required by section 594 of the Civil Code. Wall v. Mines, 130 Cal. 27, 62 Pac. 386. Thereupon the persons then conducting the affairs of the society filed new articles of incorporation, and took the other necessary steps to form a corporation, under the name of Children's Home Society of California. On April 18, 1908, Serls executed two additional deeds, the one, covering 50 acres of his farm, to the corporation which had just been organized, and the other, covering the remaining 30 acres, to Julius A. Brown. Each of these deeds, like the one of 1904, reserved a life interest to the grantor. Brown, the grantee of the 30 acres, was the president of the Children's Home Society, and he took the conveyance for the benefit of the society. The land was thus conveyed in separate parcels because of the provisions of section 595 of the Civil Code, limiting the quantity of land to be owned or held by religious, social, and benevolent corporations. The defendant J. W. De Wolfe claimed as grantee of Children's Home Society of California and of Julius A. Brown.

The complaint, after setting up the facts surrounding the original attempt to incorporate, and the later incorporation, charged that a certified copy of the articles of incorporation had not been filed in the county of Santa Barbara, where the property was located, as required by section 299 of the Civil Code. It further alleged that, at the time of making said deeds, Serls was of unsound mind, and that the execution of each of said deeds was procured by the exercise of undue influence upon him.

The court found against the allegations of incompetency and undue influence. It found that, from the time of the filing of the certified copy of the first articles of incorporation, in December, 1891, and the issuance of the certificate of incorporation, said association had exercised all the powers of a corporation under the laws of the state of California, and that, on March 23, 1911 (after the commencement of this action), a duly certified copy of said articles of incorporation was filed in the office of the county clerk of the county of Santa Barbara. It found that the second incorporation took place as hereinbefore recited, and that a copy of said second articles was duly filed in the office of the county clerk of Santa Barbara county on March 23, 1911. The findings set forth the making of the three deeds here assailed, and that the Children's Home Society of California and Julius A. Brown, on June 17, 1910, executed to J. W. De Wolfe conveyances of the 50 and 30 acre tracts attempted to be conveyed by Serls in 1908. It was further found that the two deeds given by Serls in 1908 were ineffectual because of the prior conveyance of all of said land by the deed of October 28, 1904. On these findings the court gave judgment that plaintiff take nothing by the action, that J. W. De Wolfe is the owner of said real property, and that the plaintiff has no right, title, or interest therein. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

If the court was right in its conclusion that Serls had divested himself of all interest in the property (except the life estate, which terminated on his death) by the conveyance of October 28, 1904, there is, of course, no occasion to inquire whether the plaintiff showed any good ground for attacking the deeds of 1908, or the subsequent deeds to De Wolfe. The plaintiff, as administrator, stands in no better position than Serls himself would have occupied. It being established that the estate has no interest in the property, the appellant is not concerned with the correctness of the decree determining the title to be in the respondent De Wolfe.

[1, 2] We pass, for the moment, the questions arising on the charges of incompetency and undue influence. There is no merit in the appellant's contention that the defect in the original attempt at incorporation prevented the deed of 1904 from having operative effect. It may be conceded that at the date of this conveyance Children's Home Society of California was not a lawful or de jure corporation. Wall v. Mines, supra. There can be no doubt, however, and, indeed, the appellant concedes, that the exercise by the incorporators of the powers of a corporation created a de facto corporation. It is thoroughly settled that where there is a de facto corporation, the validity of its organization cannot be inquired into collaterally in a private suit, but may be questioned only by the state. Civ. Code, § 358; Spring Valley Water Wks. v. San Francisco, 22 Cal. 434; Bakersfield T. H. Ass'n v. Chester, 55 Cal. 98; Weaverville W. R. Co. v. Board of Supervisors, 64 Cal. 69, 28 Pac. 496; Lakeside Ditch Co. v. Crane, 80 Cal. 181, 22 Pac. 76; Los Angeles Holiness Band v. Spires, 126 Cal. 541, 58 Pac. 1049; Robinson v. Blood, 151 Cal. 504, 91 Pac. 258. Furthermore, the conveyance made by Serls in 1904 described the grantee as a corporation duly organized. It is established law that "one who deals with a corporation as existing in fact is estopped to deny as against the corporation that it has been legally organized." Close v. Glenwood Cemetery, 107 U. S. 466, 477, 2 Sup. Ct. 267, 27 L. Ed. 408; Fresno Canal Co. v. Warner, 72 Cal. 379, 383, 14 Pac. 37; Yancy v. Morton, 94 Cal. 558, 29 Pac. 1111; Camp v. Land, 122 Cal. 167, 54 Pac. 839; 10 Cyc. 245; 2 Cook on Corporations (7th Ed.) § 637. Accordingly, plaintiff cannot avail himself of any defects in the attempted formation of the corporation with which he dealt.

[3] It is contended, next, that upon the filing of the new articles of incorporation in 1908, the activities of the former organization ceased. Several conclusions are sought to be drawn from this asserted circumstance. But, on the record before us, we must take the fact to be contrary to appellant's claim. The court found that the original association had continuously, since the filing of articles in 1891, exercised all the powers and functions of a corporation. The amended complaint so alleged, the averment being denied by the answer. The finding, therefore, was in support of the appellant's own allegation, and he is in no position to complain of the action of the court in finding that the fact was as averred by him. Riverside Land Co. v. Jensen, 73 Cal. 550, 15 Pac. 131; Eaton v. Rocca, 75 Cal. 93, 16 Pac. 529; Samonset v. Mesnager, 108 Cal. 354, 41 Pac. 337. It must be taken as established, for the purposes of this appeal, that the grantee named in the deed of 1904 was continuing to act as a corporation up to the time this litigation was instituted. We do not intend to intimate that, even if it had ceased to perform corporate functions in 1908, its status as a de facto corporation could, by reason of that fact alone, be questioned by any one except the state. See Robinson v. Blood, supra.

[4] The right of the de facto corporation to defend this litigation is assailed upon the ground of its failure to comply with the provision of section 299 of the Civil Code, requiring every corporation to file a copy of its articles of incorporation in the county in which property held by it is located. The section declares that any corporation failing to comply with any of its provisions "cannot maintain or defend any action or proceeding in relation to such property, * * * until such articles of incorporation * * * are filed." It appears that a copy of the articles was filed in the office of the county clerk of Santa Barbara county on March 23, 1911. This was after the filing of the amended complaint in this action, but prior to the filing of the answer thereto. Assuming that section 299 has any application to the case of a de facto corporation, which (as appellant claims is the case here) has never filed valid articles of incorporation, we think the filing on March 23, 1911, was sufficient to authorize the defense of this action. In cases where the corporation is plaintiff, it is settled that a filing of a copy of the articles of incorporation after the commencement of the suit, and before the filing of a plea directed to this defect, will entitle the corporation to maintain the action. Cal. Sav. & Loan Soc. v. Harris, 111 Cal. 133, 43 Pac. 525; Ward Land, etc., Co. v. Mapes, 147 Cal. 747, 82 Pac. 426. Upon like grounds, it should be held that where the certified copy is filed before the defendant makes answer, the right to defend the action is not affected. As was said in the Harris Case, supra:

> "The failure to file this certified copy does not impose upon the corporation a loss or forfeiture of its property, or impair or deprive it of any cause of action or defense it may have in reference to such property."

The provision against maintaining or defending an action was enacted, says the court in the same case—

> "for the purpose of enforcing a compliance by the plaintiff with a statutory requirement. It is limited by its terms 'until' such compliance has been had, and when its object has been effected, its terms prescribing a penalty should be strictly construed and in favor of the corporation."

[5] The point that the corporation was without authority to take and hold the land described in the deed of 1904 is not good. Under section 595 of the Civil Code, corporations of the kind which the de facto corporation assumed to be are empowered to hold property "acquired in any manner," but are prohibited from holding more real estate than may be necessary for the business and objects of the association, not exceeding six lots in any city or town, nor more than 50 acres in the country. There is a proviso that, in certain contingencies, such corporation may own and possess up to 160 acres of land in the country. The appellant claims that the land conveyed by his intestate was not necessary for the purposes of the corporation, and that the conditions authorizing a holding in excess of 50 acres did not exist. But these questions cannot be raised in a litigation between the corporation and private persons. The statute does not declare that any conveyance of land in excess of the statutory limit shall be void, nor does it prescribe any penalty for a violation of its provisions. Although the deed described a tract of 80 acres, it did not show upon its face that it conveyed a greater amount of land than the corporation was authorized to take. Under some circumstances, the holding might have extended to 160 acres, and evidence aliunde was required to show that these conditions did not exist. It is against the policy of the law to permit such inquiry to be made except in proceedings instituted by the state against the corporation. "Although a corporation may be disabled or forbidden from holding land at all, or from holding land except for particular purposes, or from holding land beyond a prescribed limit, yet if it does hold land in the face of such disabilities or prohibitions, its title will be good except as against the state alone, and it will be deemed to have a good title until its title is invalidated in a direct proceeding instituted by the state for that purpose." 5 Thompson on Corporations, § 5795; 3 Cook on Corporations (7th Ed.) § 694; 7 R. C. L. 567. While there are decisions of contrary import (see, for example, Matter of McGraw, 111 N. Y. 66, 19 N. E. 233, 2 L. R. A. 387), the great preponderance of authority supports the rule as just declared. A few citations will suffice. Union Nat. Bk. v. Matthews, 98 U. S. 621, 25 L. Ed. 188; Cowell v. Col. Springs Co., 100 U. S. 55, 25 L. Ed. 547; Jones v. Habersham, 107 U. S. 174, 2 Sup. Ct. 336, 27 L. Ed. 401; Reynolds v. Crawfordsville First Nat. Bk., 112 U. S. 405, 5 Sup. Ct. 213, 28 L. Ed. 733; Fritts v. Palmer, 132 U. S. 282, 10 Sup. Ct. 93, 33 L. Ed. 317; Am. Mortgage Co. v. Tennille, 87 Ga. 28, 13 S. E. 158, 12 L. R. A. 529; Kohlruss v. Zachery, 139 Ga. 625, 77 S. E. 812, 46 L. R. A. (N. S.) 72; Barnes v. Suddard, 117 Ill. 237, 7 N. E. 477; De Witt Co. Nat. Bk. v. Mickelberry, 244 Ill. 77, 91 N. E. 86, 135 Am. St. Rep. 304; Hanson v. Little Sisters, 79 Md. 434, 32 Atl. 1052, 32 L. R. A. 293; note to Page v. Heineberg, 94 Am. Dec. 382. A like conclusion was reached by this court in Natoma W. & M. Co. v. Clarkin, 14 Cal. 544. In deciding that case Field, C. J., used this language, which has often been quoted:

> "Whether or not the premises in controversy are necessary for these [the authorized] purposes, it is not material to inquire; that is a matter between the government and the corporation, and is of no concern to the defendants. It would lead to infinite inconveniences and embarrassments, if, in suits by corporations, to recover the possession of their property, inquiries were permitted as to the necessity of such property for the purposes of their incorporation, and the title made to rest upon the existence of that necessity."

The same reasons preclude inquiry into the question whether the corporation has met the conditions which authorize it to hold country land in excess of 50 and not more than 160 acres. Under these views, there is no occasion to consider whether section 596, relied on by respondents as fortifying their claim that title passed by the deed of 1904, is applicable to corporations of the kind here involved, or whether, as appellant urges, this section refers only to "friendly societies and pioneer associations."

[6] Throughout his brief the appellant insists upon treating the organization which attempted to file articles in 1891 as an entity separate and distinct from the corporation which was formed in 1908. In discussing the legal points made, we have gone upon the assumption that this position was well founded. It is proper to say, however, that the real situation disclosed by the evidence is that the same persons who were conducting the organization from 1891 to 1908 filed articles of incorporation in the latter year for the purpose of correcting the defects in the attempted incorporation of 1891. In fact, the new corporation was a continuation of the then existing de facto corporation, and we are satisfied that if the question were material here, there would be no substantial difficulty in perceiving and declaring that the two organizations were in reality identical.

[7] Having disposed of these technical objections to the right of the Children's Home Society to take title under the deed of 1904, we come to the points urged in connection with the charge of unsoundness of mind and undue influence. We shall not summarize the evidence on these issues. It is enough to say that there was abundant testimony to support the finding of the court that Serls, at the time of making his first deed, was of sound mind and capable of understanding the nature and effect of his acts and of said deed. True, the plaintiff introduced evidence of contrary tendency. This was, however, met by contradictory evidence, so that the situation presented is simply the familiar one of a substantial conflict of evidence, in the face of which this court is not authorized to question the finding of the court below. Granting the sufficiency of the showing to support the finding of the grantor's soundness of mind, there was virtually no evidence tending to prove the exercise of undue influence.

[8-10] The appellant claims that the court erred in a number of rulings on the admission and rejection of evidence. A physician, having qualified as an expert, after stating that he had heard or read all of the evidence introduced on behalf of the plaintiff, was allowed, over objection, to give his opinion that the grantor was of sound mind. It may be conceded that this is not a proper method of eliciting the opinion of an expert. People v. Le Doux, 155 Cal. 535, 555, 102 Pac. 517. But the particular objection which counsel now urges was not stated in the court below, the objection being on general grounds. Apart from this, we are unable to see from an examination of the record that any substantial prejudice could have been worked by the form in which the question was put to the witness. On cross-examination of the same witness, the plaintiff put to him a hypothetical question, covering about four pages of the printed record, together with a purported answer to such question covering over two pages of the record, and asked him whether the answer so given was correct. Apparently the question had been propounded to, and the answer given by, an expert witness on a former trial of the case. The counsel putting the question on this trial stated that his purpose was "to ascertain the qualifications of the witness." The court sustained an objection to the question, and we think it was right in so doing. It is difficult to see how an answer would have tended to accomplish counsel's avowed purpose. In any other aspect the question was manifestly improper, for the reason, among others, that it assumed facts not in evidence.

Various other points are made, but we think none of the rulings assailed, if erroneous, of sufficient consequence to have substantially affected the result of the trial. We shall not take the time to go into these matters in greater detail.

We find no substantial error in the record. The judgment and the order denying a new trial are affirmed.

BASHAM v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. et al.

(Sac. 2253.)

1. Railroads 🔑348(6)—Injuries at Crossing—Negligence of Fireman—Sufficiency of Evidence.

In an action against a railroad for death of one driving a wagon at a crossing, evidence held insufficient to prove negligence of the fireman neglecting to signal the engineer to apply the emergency brake, after he saw decedent and realized, or should have realized, that he probably would not stop before going on the crossing.

2. Railroads 🔑327(11)—Injuries at Crossing—Duty to Stop, Look, and Listen.

It was the duty of one driving a wagon toward a railroad crossing, in the exercise of ordinary care, when approaching the track, even at the slow speed of three miles an hour, to stop, look, and listen for the approach of trains.

3. Railroads 🔑338—Injuries at Crossing—Duty of Road's Employés.

When a person is approaching a place of danger on a railroad, and all the warnings of the danger have been given that reasonable care requires, those in charge of the engine, seeing him thus acting, are not obliged to presume that he will continue in his approach, when he obviously could stop and avoid it with the least care at any time; but they may presume that he will exercise his faculties, and use reasonable care for his own safety.

4. Railroads 🔑338—Injuries at Crossing—"Last Clear Chance."

The doctrine of last clear chance assumes that both parties have been guilty of negligence, the combination of which produces the danger, and places the injured party where he cannot extricate himself, and that such predicament is known or should be known to the other party; and it is not until this takes place that the duty of additional care devolves upon the person causing the injury, and he cannot rely upon dullness to excuse him from knowing that the other party was not warned of danger, as he must be held to know this when the circumstances of which he had knowledge are such as would create in the mind of a reasonable man the belief, or reasonable fear, that the other party was in such a precarious situation.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Last Clear Chance.]

5. Railroads 🔑346(5)—Injuries at Crossing—Last Clear Chance—Burden of Proof.

In an action for the death of a driver at a railroad crossing, the testimony showing beyond question that decedent was guilty of inexcusable want of care in placing himself in peril, the burden of proving that defendant road, after seeing him in such a position, failed to take proper care to avoid injuring him, was on plaintiff.

6. Railroads 🔑348(6)—Injuries at Crossing—Last Clear Chance—Sufficiency of Evidence.

Evidence held insufficient to show that defendant's train crew failed to do all that reasonably ought to have been done to avert the collision, as soon as it was, or should have been, apparent that decedent was not stopping his team in a place of safety.

7. Railroads 🔑335(1)—Injuries at Crossing—Contributory Negligence.

Where the negligently fast speed of a train, and the negligent inattention of one driving a wagon toward a crossing, each contributed to and caused a driver's death in collision, and each continued actively to contribute to that result up to the moment of collision, the railroad was not liable for the death.

Angellotti, C. J., and Lorigan and Lawlor, JJ., dissenting.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Action by Eva M. Coffey, as administratrix of the estate of O. A. Coffey, against the Southern Pacific Company, a corporation, and F. Gehrman. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal; Mary T. Basham, duly appointed administratrix on the death of Eva M. Coffey, after taking of the appeal, having been substituted as plaintiff. Judgment reversed.

L. L. Cory, of Fresno (Henley C. Booth, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellants. F. W. Henderson, of Merced, and F. G. Ostrander, of Oakland, for respondent. E. W. Camp, of Los Angeles, Frank Karr, of San Francisco, and A. S. Halsted, James E. Kelby, and A. R. Baldwin, all of Los Angeles, amici curiæ.

SHAW, J. This action was begun by Eva M. Coffey, as administratrix of the estate of her deceased husband, O. A. Coffey, to recover damages caused by the death of her husband, alleged to have been the result of negligence of the defendants. The verdict was given for the plaintiff, and the defendants appeal from the judgment. After the taking of the appeal Eva M. Coffey died, and Mary T. Basham was duly appointed as administratrix of said estate, and she has been substituted as plaintiff herein.

The accident occurred in the City of Merced, on the main track of the Southern Pacific Railroad, at the crossing of R street. The deceased was traveling on R street from the north toward the south, toward said crossing, at the time the train approached the city of Merced. He was in a farm wagon, driving two horses, and leading two others which were hitched to the rear of the wagon bed. The bed was what is called a grain wagon bed, composed of timbers and planks set upon the running gears, and not extending above the wheels. He was sitting about one-third of the way back from the front of the bed, either on a box or on some sacks. The horses were gentle and entirely under control. They were walking at the rate of about three miles an hour. As the train neared the crossing of R street the engineer whistled for the crossing at the usual place. The train had previously been going at very great speed to make up some lost time, having made up nine minutes of the time in the preceding 14 miles. The track had a very slight down grade at that place, and at a point one mile from the station at Merced, the steam had been shut off, and the train was running on its momentum. After shutting off the steam the brakes were applied at intervals to slacken the speed. At a point from 800 to 1000 feet from R street, the engine whistle was blown for the R street crossing. The fireman was engaged in looking ahead for obstructions upon the track, and giving directions to the engineer regarding them; the engineer was managing the machinery of the locomotive and brakes. These were their respective duties. At that time the fireman saw Coffey approaching the track on R street, leaning forward, with the reins in his hands. The fireman said to the engineer, "Blow your whistle; there is a fellow coming over here and I don't know whether he sees us or not." The engineer then gave several sharp, short blasts of the whistle, as a warning of danger to attract the attention of Coffey. The train was then proceeding at a speed variously estimated at from 15 to 30 miles an hour, and its speed was slackening as it proceeded. At the rate of 30 miles an hour it would take 18 seconds to reach R street. At the time the fireman first saw Coffey, he (Coffey) was about 100 feet from the main track on which the train was running. He continued to approach the track without increasing his speed, in the same attitude, until the team had reached a point some 20 or 30 feet from the track, and the engine was within about 150 or 200 feet from the crossing. Coffey was then giving no sign that he observed the train, or that he intended to stop before driving upon the track. That instant the fireman for the first time realized that he might not be aware of the approaching train. He cried to the engineer, "Hold her; that guy ain't going to stop." The engineer immediately applied the emergency brake and stopped the train as quickly as it could be done. Coffey made no move indicating his knowledge of the approaching train, until his horses had stepped upon the track; then, seeing his danger he arose in the wagon bed, grasped a pitchfork, and began striking the horses to hurry them up. He failed to get across and the engine struck the rear wheels of the wagon, the collision resulting in his death.

It is not seriously disputed that the engine was running at a rate of speed that amounted to negligence at that point in the city of Merced, nor is it seriously disputed that Coffey was guilty of almost gross negligence in going upon the track without having observed the coming of the train, without stopping to listen for its approach, and without hearing the sharp blasts of the whistle to indicate danger. Admitting negligence by the defendants, it must be also admitted that the negligence of the deceased contributed to the accident, and would prevent a recovery unless it can be said that there was sufficient evidence to sustain a finding that, after the fireman had discovered the approach of Coffey, and had realized that he was probably not intending to stop before going upon the track, or when, as a reasonable man, from the conduct of Coffey the fireman should have realized that he was either unaware of his danger or indifferent thereto and did not intend to avoid it, the fireman himself neglected to give the signal to the engineer to apply the emergency brake, and that because of this neglect the accident happened.

[1, 2] We do not think it can be said that the evidence is sufficient to prove such negligence by the fireman. It was the duty of Coffey, in the exercise of ordinary care, when approaching the railroad track, even at the slow speed at which he was going, to stop and look and listen for the approach of trains. His rate of travel was so slow that it is obvious that he could have stopped at almost any moment, up to the time when his horses came within the line of travel of the railroad cars, and by so doing have avoided all danger. At the distance of 20 feet from the track, and from that time until he reached it, he could have seen the train if he had simply turned his head in that direction, and could have stopped his team within a very few feet. The fireman had a right to assume that he would stop before reaching the track, until his conduct gave reason to believe that he would not, and until that moment the fireman cannot be said to have been guilty of negligence in failing to call for the emergency brake.

[3] When a person is approaching a place of danger, and all the warnings of the danger have been given that reasonable care requires, those in charge of the dangerous engine, seeing him thus acting, are not obliged to presume, and it cannot be said that they act unreasonably in not presuming, that the person will continue in his approach until he gets into the very place of danger, when it is obvious that he could at any time, with the least care, stop and avoid it.

[4] The doctrine of the last clear chance assumes that both the plaintiff and the defendant have been guilty of negligence, the combination of which produces the danger, and places the injured party in a predicament from which he cannot extricate himself, and that this predicament is known, or should be known, with the knowledge actually possessed, to the other party. It is not until this takes place that the duty of additional care devolves upon the person causing the injury. The person thus causing the injury cannot rely upon dullness to excuse him for not knowing that the other party was not aware of danger. He must be held to know this when the circumstances of which he has knowledge are such as would create in the mind of a reasonable man a belief, or a reasonable fear, that the other party was in such precarious situation. Thompson v. Los Angeles, etc., Co., 165 Cal. 748, 134 Pac. 709; Harrington v. Los Angeles, etc., Co., 140 Cal. 523, 74 Pac. 15, 63 L. R. A. 238, 98 Am. St. Rep. 85; Everett v. Los Angeles, etc., Co., 115 Cal. 125, 43 Pac. 207, 46 Pac. 889, 34 L. R. A. 350. The persons thus operating a train have the right to presume that the other party will exercise his faculties and use reasonable care for his own safety.

In Holmes v. South Pacific, etc., Co., 97 Cal. 168, 31 Pac. 834, the facts were that, as the train approached, the injured person was walking alongside of the track, and very close thereto. Just before it reached him, the alarm whistle was sounded, and he stepped upon the track and was killed. The bell was ringing all the time. The court said that the persons in charge of the train were not guilty of negligence in not sooner sounding the alarm whistle, and that, "as the deceased was a man of mature years, and nothing to indicate that he was not able to take care of himself—as he was in fact—the engineer might reasonably believe that he knew of its approach, and would, in obedience to the ordinary instinct for self-preservation, move away from the track before being overtaken by the engine." And with respect to the last clear chance, the court said (97 Cal. page 170, 31 Pac. page 836):

> "The defendant was not the only one who could have prevented the accident, but on the contrary, if the deceased had himself used ordinary care at the time, he could not possibly have been harmed by defendant's locomotive, which was confined to the narrow track upon which it ran. Up to the very moment that he was struck by the engine, it was within his power to escape the injury which he received by simply moving to a place of safety upon the sidewalk, and he would have realized the necessity for such action on his part but for his own negligence at the time in not looking or listening for the approach of the train."

Upon the facts, the court applied the principle that the doctrine of the last clear chance "cannot govern where both parties are contemporaneously and actively in fault, and by their mutual carelessness an injury ensues to one or both of them."

In Green v. Los Angeles, etc., Co., 143 Cal. 31, 76 Pac. 719, 101 Am. St. Rep. 68, the injured person was walking along a path which ran across the track, and was approaching the track thereon at the time the defendant's locomotive came along. The path crossed the track at an angle of 30 degrees, and her course was on the path in the direction which caused her face to be turned partly away from the approaching train. The court says that the findings, in effect, declare:

> "That the engineer saw Bessie Green approaching the track along a path which crossed it; that she gave no evidence of knowledge of the approach of the train; and that, notwithstanding such fact, the engineer did not slacken or lessen the speed of the train, or attempt to give said Bessie Green warning of his approach. But during all this time, it will be observed, Bessie Green was in a position of absolute safety; she was not upon the defendant's track, but walking upon the pathway approaching it. There was nothing to indicate to the engineer that she would leave that place of safety and put herself in one of danger. The mere fact that she gave no evidence of a knowledge of the approach of the train while walking along the pathway towards the track did not indicate to the engineer that she was about to place herself in a position of peril. It is a matter of common observation that thousands of people daily cross in front of trains and approach crossings for that purpose, without giving any indication that they are aware of the coming of the train. They proceed, determining for themselves whether they have sufficient time to make the crossings safely or not, solicitous only for their personal safety, and giving no indication to the engineer whether they will hazard the risk of crossing, or pause until the train passes by, or in any manner indicating that they are aware of the approach of the train, or are concerned about it. * * * There is nothing to indicate that, as far as the engineer knew or could have known, Bessie Green might not have been perfectly well aware of the approach of the train and still have given no indication or manifestation of that knowledge. The law cast upon her the duty of looking to see, when approaching the point of danger, whether there was a train in sight which might prevent her crossing the track in safety, and the engineer had a right to assume that she had taken the precaution which the law required to insure her own safety, was aware of the situation, and being in a place of safety would remain there and not pass to a point of danger."

The facts in this case are closely similar. Coffey's horses were approaching the train in a slow walk, they were under control, and did not appear to be in the least excited. The train was necessarily making considerable noise; it had just previously given several short, sharp blasts, to indicate danger; it is conceded that the bell was ringing. Coffey could have stopped his horses within four feet of the track without being in danger, and doubtless could have accomplished the stop within a space of two or three feet before reaching that point; and the fireman had the right to assume, until the conduct of Coffey indicated the contrary, that he knew of the approaching train and would stop before driving into its path. The fireman himself testified that:

> "Time and again you will see a team driving along and they pay no attention to your signals. They will come up and stop in the clear of the track, and wait for you to go by."

This testimony accords with what the court says is common knowledge in the quotation just made. There is no evidence to contradict these facts, and no circumstances which throw doubt upon them.

There was, to be sure, some discrepancy in the figures given by the different witnesses regarding the relative locations of the train and the wagon at the moment when the warning signal was first sounded. Such variations in estimates of distances are neither unusual nor surprising. But, giving to the respondents the full benefit of the testimony offered by them, we think the record was not such as to warrant a conclusion that the facts were materially different from our statement of them. Granting that the train may have been less than 800 feet from the crossing when the warning signal was given, and that the fireman's estimates of Coffey's location were not exactly accurate it appears from a fair consideration of the entire record, that the warning signals were sounded when Coffey was still in a place of safety. The "last clear chance" doctrine can have no possible application, unless there was evidence tending to show that the fireman neglected to take steps which due care would have required, when he saw the team and wagon in a position which would have indicated to a reasonable man that Coffey was already in danger, or was immediately about to enter the danger zone. The testimony established beyond question that Coffey was guilty of inexcusable want of care in placing himself in peril.

[5] The burden of proving that the defendant, after seeing him in such a position, failed to take proper care to avoid injuring him, was on the plaintiff. She seeks to sustain this burden by pointing to the testimony by one or two witnesses, to the effect that the horses were already on the track when the danger signals were blown, and that the train was then within 150 or 200 feet of the crossing. This testimony, vague and uncertain at best, is contradicted not only by that of other witnesses on both sides, but by the inherent probabilities of the situation. Even if it be accepted as sufficient to form the basis of a finding, it does not meet the needs of the plaintiff's case, unless supplemented by evidence that the fireman was at fault in not then doing what a reasonably careful man would have done to avert the impending collision. It is argued to this end that the testimony of the fireman and the engineer shows that the fireman did not call for the application of the emergency brake until some period of time had elapsed after the giving of the warning signal. During this interval, it is said, the fireman failed to take any steps to slow the train so as to permit Coffey to cross in safety. The argument thus made assumes the truthfulness of the fireman's testimony with respect to the directions to the engineer to blow the whistle and apply the brakes. It assumes, on the other hand, that he did not testify truthfully to the conditions existing when he gave the respective orders. The hypothesis is that the brakeman told the engineeer, in effect, that a man was approaching the track, and that a whistle should be blown to warn him to stop, when he saw the man already on the track, or so near as to make it plain that he would presently be on it. If the situation was as testified to by the fireman, his statement to the engineer was in accord with the facts, and his conduct was reasonable and intelligible. If the situation was as plaintiff now claims, the fireman's direction to the engineer was obviously futile and meaningless. It would require an unduly strained construction of the evidence to hold that the jury was warranted in accepting the part of the fireman's testimony which described what he did, and rejecting that part which gave purpose and sense to his actions. Moreover, if the fireman's second warning was so soon after the first, and when the train was so near the crossing as this theory implies, the discovery that Coffey was going to cross the track must have come too late, and when it was made the collision had already become inevitable. The failure to discover it sooner might, in that case, constitute original negligence, but it would not be a ground for applying the doctrine of the last clear chance.

[6] The record convinces us that there is no substantial evidence that the train crew failed to do all that reasonably ought to have been done to avert a collision, as soon as it was, or should have been, apparent that the driver was not stopping his team in a place of safety.

[7] With respect to the engineer who was operating the train and Coffey, the negligently fast speed of the train, and the negligent inattention of Coffey, each contributed to and caused the injury, and each continued actively to that result up to the very moment of the collision, thus bringing the case within the rule stated in Holmes v. South Pacific, etc., Co., supra. The plaintiff cannot recover for an injury so caused.

With regard to the last clear chance doctrine, it cannot be said that the fireman was guilty of negligence in failing sooner to realize that Coffey was probably oblivious of his danger. The staccato notes of the danger whistle just then sounded, as the evidence shows, had attracted the attention and aroused the alarm of almost every one in the vicinity, although none of them had as much need or occasion to be alert thereto as Coffey. The bell of the engine was continuously ringing. The moving train itself must have made considerable noise. The horses were in a slow walk. The lines were in Coffey's hands. The horses were under his control. He could have come to a standstill in a second. Under all these circumstances, it would be extremely unreasonable for any one to suppose that he was unaware of the approaching train, and did not intend to stop before reaching the track, as he could easily have done, and as is the frequent custom. When the fireman did, nevertheless, begin to entertain a fear that Coffey was inattentive, he at once gave the urgent order to the engineer to stop. It cannot be said either that he did realize the danger sooner, or that, in reason, with his knowledge, he had cause to realize it sooner. Hence the last clear chance doctrine never came into operation, and the case comes within the scope of the case of Green v. Los Angeles, etc., Co., supra.

This conclusion renders it unnecessary to determine the other questions presented by the record and argued in the briefs. The evidence was insufficient to support the verdict.

The judgment is reversed.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. (dissenting). I dissent.

I concur in what is said in the opinion on the question of the negligence of the deceased, and I have no objection to the statements as to the law in regard to the last clear chance doctrine. But it does seem to me, after a full consideration of the record, that the evidence was such as to sufficiently support the conclusion of the jury and trial judge that facts existed which make the railroad company liable under the last clear chance doctrine, and that the reversal of this judgment is in violation of our well-settled rule that this court will not interfere with the conclusion of the jury and trial court on questions of fact where the evidence is substantially conflicting.

There was much testimony as to the giving of the warning signal, and, so far as its character is concerned, there is no conflict in the evidence. The short, sharp blasts of the locomotive apparently attracted the attention of and alarmed the whole neighborhood. But on the question of the distance of the locomotive from the crossing at the time the first of these blasts was sounded, as well as on the question of the distance of Coffey therefrom, there is much conflict in the evidence, some of the testimony being substantially to the effect that the locomotive was within 200 feet and Coffey just beginning to cross, while other testimony was to the effect that he was then within about 20 feet of the track, the fireman's testimony placing him still further away. Of course, with the testimony conflicting on these points, the jury were not bound to accept as correct the evidence of the engineer and fireman that the warning was given as much as 800 feet west of R. street. They might fairly conclude, in accord with the evidence to that effect, that the train was then only 200 feet from the crossing, and that Coffey, at least so far as the heads of his horses were concerned, was already practically within the danger zone. According to the evidence of the fireman, Coffey showed no indication of knowledge of the approaching train until the front wheel of the wagon was about to go over the north rail, but sat with his head down, jogging along at the same gait, until that time. This situation is absolutely inconsistent with any theory that the danger blasts were sounded at as great a distance from R street as 800 feet, for it is incredible that Coffey would not have heard them, and certainly the jury may fairly have concluded that he did hear them when they were blown, and as soon as he could get at it adopted the only course apparent to him of avoiding a collision. That Coffey was not asleep is evidenced by the testimony that he had driven out around the projecting car on Track No. 5. It is undisputed that the locomotive struck the rear wheel of the wagon, which was some 20 feet from the heads of the horses. The jury may well have concluded that there was no increase in Coffey's rate of speed at any time before being struck, for although at the very last he did his best to urge his team forward, there was testimony that at least one of the led horses at the rear held back, and in the nature of things it would take a moment or two for the horses at the rear to respond to the sudden start of the horses in front, even if they did not hold back because frightened by the train, which was then so near at hand. At that rate he would have traveled in five seconds only about 22 feet. I think it is apparent from the record that there is sufficient support for a conclusion by the jury that the danger blasts were not commenced until the train was within 200 feet of the crossing, and that at that time Coffey was already in a position of danger. Indeed, it is my opinion, after an exhaustive consideration of the record, that the substantial weight of the evidence is to this effect.

If this was apparent to the fireman, or should have been apparent to him as a reasonable man with the knowledge he actually had, it was incumbent on him to do what he could then reasonably do to avoid the threatened injury. For the consequences of any neglect on his part in this regard, defendant railroad company would be liable under the last clear chance doctrine. It must be accepted as sufficiently established by the evidence of both fireman and engineer that the fireman did not call upon the engineer to stop the train or reduce the speed immediately upon the giving of the danger blasts, and that there was no application of the emergency brake for some appreciable time thereafter. It is obvious that the difference of even a second in the application of the brake would have so reduced the speed as to have avoided a collision with any part of the wagon.

In view of the testimony of the fireman that Coffey was constantly under his observation, except for a second or two when his view was obstructed by cars, from a point where he was 100 feet from the track until the time of the collision, I do not see how it can fairly be held that there was no sufficient support for a conclusion by the jury that at the time the danger blasts were commenced the fireman had actual knowledge of facts from which he should have concluded, as a reasonable man, that Coffey was already, owing to his ignorance of the approach of the train, in a position of danger; that even if his advancing horses' heads were not even then within the space that would be covered by the overhang of the locomotive as it passed, they would inevitably be within such reach in a second or two at most; that the situation was such that Coffey, for some reason, had been without knowledge of the approach of the train, and that the time was so short that he could not be brought to a realization of his dangerous position in time to enable him to stop his team clear of all danger; and that the only hope of avoiding injury lay, not only in endeavoring to attract his attention by the danger blasts, but also in reducing the speed of the train as much as possible. If this be so, the question was one for the jury. Of course, Coffey could be in a position of great peril although his horses' heads were not, as yet, actually within three or four feet of the northerly rail. See Harrington v. Los Angeles, etc., Co., 140 Cal. 520, 74 Pac. 15, 63 L. R. A. 238, 98 Am. St. Rep. 85. If he was actually in such a position, and that fact was apparent to the fireman, and the fireman, nevertheless, failed to use what, under the circumstances, would be ordinary care to avoid the threatened injury, and the exercise of such care would have avoided the injury, all of which the jury had the right to conclude from the evidence, the failure to use such care must be held to be the sole cause of the injury, notwithstanding the previous negligence of Coffey. Such previous negligence ceased to be a factor in the eyes of the law as soon as Coffey was, to the knowledge of the fireman, actually in a position of peril, and he failed to use ordinary care to avoid the accident. I have in mind the well-settled rule that ordinarily the circumstances are such that one operating a train has the right to assume that one walking or riding towards a railroad track is able to and will care for himself by taking all necessary precautions to observe the approach of the train, and that he will not place himself on the track at such a time as to be injured thereby. See Green v. Los Angeles, etc., Ry. Co., 143 Cal. 44, 76 Pac. 719, 101 Am. St. Rep. 68; Lambert v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co., 146 Cal. 236, 79 Pac. 873. But, of course, there is no room for any such assumption where the circumstances are such as to show that the person approaching is already in such proximity to the track as to reasonably raise the question whether he will be able to get out of the way of the train. See Harrington v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., supra; Everett v. Los Angeles, etc., Ry. Co., 115 Cal. 125, 43 Pac. 207, 46 Pac. 889, 34 L. R. A. 350.

I am therefore of the opinion that in view of the last clear chance doctrine, as was held by the learned district court of appeal, the verdict against defendant railroad company has sufficient support in the evidence.

ZENZ et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. (Sac. 2714.)

Commerce 🔑27(4)—"Interstate Commerce"—Transportation of Mail—"Common Carrier by Railroad."

The interstate transportation of mail by a railroad under a contract with the federal government is "interstate commerce," and covered by the federal Employers' Liability Act (Act April 22, 1908, c. 149, 35 Stat. 65 [U. S. Comp. St. 1916, §§ 8657–8665]), which imposes liability for injury to employés engaged in interstate commerce on every "common carrier by railroad," since the quoted expression is used in its generic definitive sense, to designate the class of employers subject to the act, and where an employer is within the designated class, and is engaged in interstate commerce, it is immaterial whether it is so engaged as a common carrier or as an agency of the government.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Interstate Commerce.]

In Bank. Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 279) by Cyriakus Zenz and others to obtain compensation for the death of Frederick Albert Zenz. Compensation was denied, and the claimants petition for a writ of review. Order to show cause discharged, and proceedings dismissed.

Cushing & Cushing, of San Francisco, Hatton & Scott, of Modesto, and Erwin E. Richter, of San Francisco, for petitioners. Chris. M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondent Commission. E. W. Camp, Robert Brennan, U. T. Clotfelter, Paul Burks, and M. W. Reed, all of Los Angeles, for respondent Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. The petitioners, alleged dependents of Frederick Albert Zenz, deceased, who received injuries in the course of and arising out of his employment by the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Company, which caused his death, sought from the Industrial Accident Commission an award against the railway company under the Industrial Compensation Act. After a hearing the commission found that the injury arose out of and happened in the course of employment, while the injured employé was performing service growing out of and incidental thereto, in the following manner:

"While delivering pouches of mail from the depot at Riverbank to a train he was run down by another train."

It, however, dismissed the proceeding for want of jurisdiction; the railway company having pleaded and established to the satisfaction of the commission that the injury occurred while deceased was employed by the railway company in interstate commerce, and that, therefore, by reason of the act of Congress relating to the liability of common carriers by railroad to their employés, the act generally known as the federal Employers' Liability Act, the commission was without jurisdiction.

On the application of petitioners an order to show cause why a writ of certiorari or other appropriate writ should not issue was made. Answers have been filed both by the commission and the respondent railway company, and the matter has been submitted upon such petition and answers. It appears that the commission also found as follows:

> "That at said time the defendant was a common carrier by railroad engaged in commerce between different states of the United States and said Frederick Albert Zenz was engaged by the defendant in such commerce; that this commission is therefore without jurisdiction in this proceeding."

It was stipulated at the hearing before the commission that the occupation of deceased—

> "was that of a call boy and delivering United States mail from the defendant's depot to defendant's trains and vice versa, taking United States mail from defendant's trains to defendant's depot, and that, while in the performance of this duty of carrying United States mail from the defendant's depot to defendant's train, the deceased employé met with injuries, causing subsequent death."

It is not disputed, as set up in the answers, that the railway company was a common carrier by railroad engaged in interstate commerce, operating trains between the state of California and other states of the United States, and that the train to which decedent was delivering the mail at the time of his injury was an interstate train engaged in interstate commerce, which had stopped at Riverbank on its way to its destination in the state of California. It is further set up in each of the answers that evidence was produced before the commission to the effect that the article being handled by the decedent at the time and place of injury, viz., United States mail, consisted in part of communications and mail destined to points without the state of California.

The real contention of petitioners, as stated in their petition, is that, inasmuch as the carriage in regard to which the employer was engaged, in so far as any service of deceased was concerned, at the time he received his injury, was the carriage of United States mail, it was not and could not be, with respect to such service, a common carrier engaged in interstate commerce, within the meaning of the act of Congress referred to, with the result that, such act having no application, the jurisdiction of the Industrial Accident Commission was complete. "If the federal statute was applicable, the state statute was excluded by reason of the supremacy of the former under the national Constitution." St. Louis, etc., Ry. v. Seale, 229 U. S. 156, 33 Sup. Ct. 651, 57 L. Ed. 1129, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 156. If the federal statute was not applicable, the Industrial Accident Commission had jurisdiction.

Basing their claim upon certain decisions to the effect that a railroad company in carrying United States mail is not, with respect to such service, acting as a "common carrier," with the corresponding rights and liabilities of that relation, but is, in that particular service, serving as an agency of government (see Atchison, etc., Ry. Co. v. United States, 225 U. S. 640, 32 Sup. Ct. 702, 56 L. Ed. 1236; Bankers' Mutual Casualty Co. v. Minneapolis, etc., Ry. Co., 117 Fed. 434, 54 C. C. A. 608, 65 L. R. A. 397; Banking Co. v. Lampley, 76 Ala. 357, 52 Am. Rep. 334; Boston Insurance Co. v. Chicago, etc., Co., 118 Iowa, 423, 92 N. W. 88, 59 L. R. A. 796), it is urged by petitioner that the federal Employers' Liability Act can have no application here. It is urged by counsel that the act applies only to such service as is being performed by the railroad company under such circumstances as make it a "common carrier," with all the resultant legal rights and obligations, with relation to the person for whom the service is performed. The language of the act is:

> "That every common carrier by railroad while engaging in commerce between any of the several states or territories * * * shall be liable in damages to any person suffering injury while he is employed by such carrier in such commerce, or, in case of the death of such employé, to his or her personal representatives," etc.

No one of the cases cited by learned counsel for petitioners arose under the federal Employers' Liability Act, and cannot be taken as authority upon its proper construction. The first case cited (Atchison, etc., Ry. Co. v. United States, supra) had to do solely with the question of the relations of the carrier of mail to the government, its rights and liabilities in regard thereto, and it was held that with relation to the government it was not "acting as a common carrier, with corresponding rights and liabilities," but as an agency of the government under contract with the government. In the other cases the litigation involved the question of the liability of the carrier to senders and addressees of mail matter. It was held that the carrier of mail was not, with respect to senders and addressees of mail, "a common carrier," with corresponding rights and liabilities, but, with regard to them, was acting solely as a government agency. We think this distinction, so important when we are considering the question of the rights and obligations of the railroad carrier with relation to the government, and the senders and addressees of mail, is unimportant here. In enacting the federal Employers' Liability Act Congress was endeavoring to cover the whole field of the relations between carriers by railroad engaged in interstate commerce and their employés, with respect to their obligations to the employés, and the remedies of the latter for any violation of those obligations. Whether in a particular case one primarily engaged in the business of a common carrier is carrying particular goods in that capacity rather than as a mere agent or under some other kind of contract is of importance only as relates to his obligations and liabilities to those for whom he carries, a matter having no real pertinency to the subject-matter of this legislation. To our minds, the expression "common carrier by railroad" was used simply to designate the class of employer subject to the act, and, as put by counsel for respondents, "in the generic definitive sense" as including only common carriers "by railroad" as distinguished from common carriers by other means of transportation. If the employer is primarily engaged in the business of transporting passengers and freight for hire by railroad as a common carrier, it comes within the act, as to its railroad of course, provided always that it is subject to the act only while engaged in interstate commerce, and only on account of injuries or death suffered by an employé while he is employed by such carrier in such commerce. That the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railroad Company was primarily a "common carrier by railroad," actually engaged in its business as such at the time of the accident, is not questioned. The remaining question is, then, whether in the matter of the transportation of this mail it was engaged in interstate commerce, entirely regardless of whether it transported such mail, so far as its relations with the government are concerned, as a common carrier or as an agency of the government.

We think there can be no serious question, in view of the decisions, that the transportation of mail between different states and territories is interstate commerce. It was said in the case of Pensacola Tel. Co. v. Western Union Tel. Co., 96 U. S. 1, 24 L. Ed. 708, that:

> "Since the case of Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 1, 6 L. Ed. 23, it has never been doubted that commercial intercourse is an element of commerce which comes within the regulating power of Congress. Post offices and post roads are established to facilitate the transmission of intelligence."

In that case it was held that the transmission of intelligence by electricity is interstate commerce. The transmission of wireless messages between states is held to be interstate commerce (Marconi Wireless Tel. Co. v. Com., 218 Mass. 558, 106 N. E. 310, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 214), as is also the transmission of information between states through the mails by correspondence schools (International Textbook Co. v. Pigg, 217 U. S. 91, 30 Sup. Ct. 481, 54 L. Ed. 678, 27 L. R. A. [N. S.] 493, 18 Ann. Cas. 1103). There can be no doubt that the transmission of letters or parcels by a railroad for an express company between states is interstate commerce.

We are of the opinion that the fact that the transportation of mail is for the federal government can make no difference in this respect. When mail is transported from one state to another, such transportation is interstate commerce, although the carrier be acting under contract with the government and as one of its agencies. This was expressly decided by the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts in the recent case of Lynch v. Boston & M. R. R., 227 Mass. 123, 116 N. E. 401.

It follows, from what we have said, that the Industrial Accident Commission did not err in its conclusion that it was without jurisdiction to make an award in this matter.

The order to show cause is discharged, and the proceeding dismissed.

KLUMPKE v. ALL PERSONS, etc.

(S. F. 7535.)

1. TRUSTS ⚷110—CONSIDERATION—EVIDENCE—GIFTS—CONSTRUCTIVE TRUST.

Evidence held sufficient to support a finding that the real consideration for a deed to a wife was love and affection, and that same was a valid gift, and not a constructive trust, although the deed recited a consideration of $10, which was never paid.

2. TRUSTS ⚷44(2)—HUSBAND AND WIFE—CONVEYANCES OF LAND.

Evidence held sufficient to support a finding that a deed of the homestead to the wife was not a trust in the husband's favor after her death.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR ⚷854(1)—FINDINGS OF FACT—GROUNDS OF FINDINGS.

Where the memorandum of the court below does not state its reason for a finding, on appeal it will be upheld, if there is any reasonable ground on which it can be supported.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by John G. Klumpke under the McEnerney Act (St. Ex. Sess. 1906, p. 78) against all persons, etc. Judgment for certain defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 139 Pac. 1062.

R. H. Countryman, of San Francisco, for appellant. McCutchen, Olney & Willard, J. M. Mannon, Loewy & Loewy, Elmer Westlake, and McGowan & Westlake, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

SHAW, J. Plaintiff began an action under the so-called McEnerney Act to declare and establish his title to a parcel of land in San Francisco. Certain persons, claiming to be devisees of Bernardina Klumpke, the deceased wife of said plaintiff, appeared and opposed the plaintiff's claim of title. The judgment was that the plaintiff was not the owner of the property, and that the said devisees were the owners thereof. The plaintiff has appealed from said judgment.

The findings declare, among other things, that the land was acquired by plaintiff in 1881, as his separate estate, and prior to his marriage to Bernardina Klumpke; that in February, 1889, the plaintiff by a grant, bargain, and sale deed conveyed said land to his wife, Bernardina; that said deed stated a consideration of $10, but that in fact there was no consideration therefor, other than love and affection; that he and his wife resided on the land from that time until her death, on November 1, 1902, and that plaintiff thereafter continued to reside thereon until the beginning of this action, using it as his home; that by her last will, which has been duly probated, said Bernardina Klumpke devised said land to respondents; and that they, and not the plaintiff, own the same.

[1] Appellant claims that the finding that the consideration of the deed was love and affection only is contrary to the evidence. We think it was supported by sufficient evidence. Klumpke was appointed executor of the estate of his said wife. In his inventory of said estate he declared under oath that the land belonged to his wife at the time of her death. In many other papers sworn to by him, and filed by him in the course of the administration of said estate, he repeated, either expressly or by implication, the statements that this land was the property of the estate of his said wife. On the other hand, he testified at the trial that the deed of 1889 was not intended by him as a gift to his wife, but was intended by him to convey it to her to be held as community property, and that no money or other valuable consideration therefor was given or rendered by his wife. Upon this and other testimony of the plaintiff his counsel contend that the land was held by his wife until her death, upon either a resulting or a constructive trust for his use, or as the community property of the marriage. The court below was not bound to accept the plaintiff's sworn statements at the trial as the truth, rather than his repeated statements to the contrary, made under oath during the administration of her estate. There were many circumstances proven at the trial, which we need not here state more fully, from which the court might have concluded that his testimony at the trial was not to be credited at all, and that his statements as executor declared the truth. We must therefore hold that the finding in question was supported by the evidence.

[2] The appellant assigns as error an alleged ruling of the court striking out testimony of the plaintiff and another witness, Mrs. Horgan, purporting to relate conversations with Bernardina Klumpke after the execution of the deed of 1889, and conversations between her and plaintiff at the time of, before, and after its execution, regarding the consideration thereof, the reasons for its execution, and the understanding between the two concerning the same. The testimony, when offered, was admitted subject to a motion to strike out to be subsequently made. The motion was made and the ruling reserved.

The testimony of the witness Mrs. Horgan, though vague and indefinite, tended in some degree to prove that Klumpke conveyed the land to his wife, in order that, if he died before his wife, she would have the property free from interference from his children by a former wife. She had no children. The testimony of Klumpke himself was to the effect that he told his wife that he would execute the deed in order to make the land community property, so that she would have an interest in it if she survived him. He said he informed her that in that event she would take a one-third interest in it, but that if he survived her she would have no interest in the property, but that he would then take it through her will, which she had previously made, devising all her property to him. He also said that she did not promise that she would not afterwards change her will, and, further, that the agreement between them at the time of the execution of the deed was that she was to have a one-third interest in the land if she survived him, but that if he survived her she was to have no interest.

The record does not show that the court struck out this testimony, as claimed. It shows that the court considered it, so far as it tended to show that there was no gift from the husband to the wife, and so far as it tended to show a resulting or constructive trust in the wife in favor of the husband with respect to the land, and held it incompetent so far as it tended to vary the terms of the deed as a conveyance of the title. As to the trust, the court said that the evidence was insufficient to create any trust in favor of the husband, because it did not appear therefrom that the wife had agreed to do anything respecting the land, or that she omitted doing anything which she had agreed to do. We need not decide whether this view is correct or not. We have already considered the effect of the deed as a gift, and of the testimony of the husband tending to show the contrary. The same considerations apply to the evidence introduced to prove a trust, and the holding as community property. That of Mrs. Horgan was vague and unsatisfactory. That of the plaintiff was contradictory in itself, in some respects absurd in its statements of his belief as to the law, and altogether of a character to engender suspicion of its truth. The court was not bound to accept it, but could take, as more trustworthy and as better evidence, his voluntary statements under oath that the land belonged to his wife at her death.

[3] The memorandum filed in the court below as to its views concerning the insufficien-cy of the evidence to establish a trust does not purport to state all the reasons for the findings against the plaintiff. On appeal this court must uphold it, if there is any reasonable ground on which it can be supported. It is therefore to be presumed that the court below discredited this evidence and accepted the previous admissions of the plaintiff as the truth. This comprises all the substantial questions arising in the case. We find no substantial errors in the record.

The judgment is affirmed.

MAGINNIS v. HURLBUTT. (Civ. 1676.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 30, 1917.)

1. QUIETING TITLE 🔑44(1) — BURDEN OF PROOF.
Plaintiff, in action to quiet title, has the burden to establish title otherwise than by relying on the weakness of defendant's title.

2. QUIETING TITLE 🔑44(4) — EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.
Evidence held insufficient to establish title of plaintiff in action to quiet title.

3. WATERS AND WATER COURSES 🔑111—PATENT—PRESUMPTIONS.
Prima facie a patent to lands adjoining a lake conveys only the land described.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lake County; M. S. Sayre, Judge.

Action by J. H. Maginnis against Emeline W. Hurlbutt. Decree for plaintiff, and order denying motion for new trial, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Ornbaun & Fraser, of San Francisco, for appellant. C. M. Crawford, of Lake Port, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Plaintiff brings the action to quiet title to certain lands of which he claims to be the owner and entitled to possession. The complaint was filed December 1, 1913. The land is described as situated in the county of Lake and bounded and described as follows:

> "Fraction in S. ½ of N. E. ¼ and fraction in N. ½ of S. E. ¼ and fraction in N. E. ¼ of S. W. ¼ of section 36, all in T. 14 N., R. 9 W. M. D. M.; and more particularly described in field notes of the survey thereof as follows: Beginning at a point on the meander line of Clear Lake, in front of section 36, in T. 14 N., R. 9 W. M. D. M. 25.24 chains east of the quarter section corner between sections 35 and 36 and run east 14.76 chains, to center of section; thence north 5.66 chains to margin of Clear Lake; thence along margin of lake, south 63¼ degrees east 9.42 chains; thence north 57½ degrees east 5.47 chains; thence north 78½ degrees east 5.16 chains; thence south 65 degrees east 7 chains; thence south 7¼ degrees west 11.99 chains, to meander line of Clear Lake; thence following the meander line north 80 degrees west, 23 chains; thence north 70 degrees west 15.77 chains, to the place of beginning, containing 30.56 acres."

In her amended answer, defendant denies plaintiff's ownership or right to possession of the land, and admits that she claims an interest therein. For separate answer and defense, she alleges that for more than 15 years continuously next preceding the commencement of this action, she and her predecessors in interest have been and now are in the open, notorious, and exclusive possession of the property in dispute, and during all of said time have paid the taxes levied and assessed against the property. For still further separate answer and defense defendant alleges that she deraigns title through a certificate of purchase for said land from the state of California to Hosea B. Guernsey, and through a patent from the state of California to Nathaniel Hurlbutt, and by a deed of said Hurlbutt to Emeline W. Hurlbutt, defendant herein.

The cause was tried by the court without a jury, and the following findings of fact were made: That each and all of the allegations of the plaintiff's complaint are true, and each and all of the allegations of the defendant's answer are untrue. The court specifically found that the defendant has not any estate, right, title, or interest whatever in said land; that she has not for more than 15 years continuously, or at all, next preceding the commencement of this action, "possessed in any manner or to any extent the said land * * * or any part thereof; and that neither the said defendant nor her predecessors have ever been in the adverse possession of, or possessed the said premises adversely to the said plaintiff, to any extent, or for any length of time, whatever, or at all." The court also found specifically that defendant did not deraign title to said land, or any part thereof, through a certificate of purchase, as alleged in the answer, or through any other of the sources stated in defendant's answer.

As conclusion of law the court found that the plaintiff "is now, and was at the time of the filing of the complaint herein, had been for a long time prior thereto, the owner of, and entitled to the possession of, the lands and premises described in the complaint, and of the whole thereof, and is entitled to judgment herein forever quieting his title thereto," and a decree was accordingly entered.

Defendant moved for a new trial on the following grounds: (1) Irregularities in the proceedings of the court, and abuse of discretion by which defendant was prevented from having a fair trial; (2) insufficiency of the evidence to justify the decision; (3) that the decision was against law; (4) errors in law occurring at the trial and excepted to by the defendant. The motion was denied, and defendant appeals from the judgment and from the order denying her motion for a new trial.

Plaintiff claims title through one John C. Fishel, to whom the United States issued patent dated August 1, 1871, to lands therein described as follows:

> "Lots one, two, three, and four and the southeast quarter of the southwest quarter of section thirty-six (36) in township fourteen (14) north of range nine (9) west Mount Diablo meridian in district of lands subject to sale at San Francisco, California, containing (138) one hundred and thirty eight acres"

—which is the aggregate acreage of the four lots exclusive of the land in dispute. Plaintiff claims that these lands border on Clear Lake, and that the meander line of the lake coincides with the said northerly boundary of lots 1, 2, 3, and 4, as shown on map or plat introduced in evidence by plaintiff. Plaintiff claims title to the land lying between said meander line and low-water mark on the shores of said lake, consisting of 30.56 acres. Fishel, the patentee, conveyed the lands to Elijah Reeves by the description given in the patent. By decree of distribution in the estate of Elijah Reeves, the land passed to his widow, Martha C., who, on October 13, 1886, conveyed the property to plaintiff by the same description and also conveyed to him certain contiguous land. Defendant introduced in evidence in support of her title a certificate of purchase of the state of California to Hosea B. Guernsey, dated July 24, 1889, 14 years prior to the commencement of the action. The description of the land given in the said certificate is as follows:

> "Fraction in S. ½ of N. E. ¼, fraction in N. ½ of S. E. ¼ and fraction in N. E. ¼ of S. W. ¼ of section 36 in township No. 14 north, range No. 9 west Mount Diablo meridian, containing 30.56 acres."

This description apparently refers to land lying north of the said so-called meander line.

On October 8, 1900, said H. B. Guernsey assigned said certificate to his wife, Lizzie Guernsey, and she, on November 14, 1903, assigned the same to N. Hurlbutt, describing the land as in the certificate of purchase. On November 20, 1904, the state issued a patent to N. Hurlbutt which was introduced in evidence and purports to grant, bargain, and sell to him the land mentioned in said certificate and in the patent by the same description as given in the certificate, further reciting:

> "And more particularly described in the field notes of said location as follows" (continuing as hereinbefore quoted from the complaint. After the words, "containing 30.56 acres," is the sentence: "Run by the true meridian, magnetic variation 17° 29′ east").

This description is the same as is shown on the plat introduced in evidence as correctly describing the land in controversy. On October 14, 1912, Nathaniel Hurlbutt conveyed the land to his wife, Emeline W. Hurlbutt, by the same description as given in the state patent.

The contention of plaintiff was at the trial and now is, and the court so found, that the patent to Fishel conveyed not only the acreage contained in said lots 1, 2, 3, and 4, but also conveyed all the land lying between the said meander line and low-water mark on said lake, and that through mesne conveyances plaintiff became and is now the owner thereof.

Appellant now urges that she has title by virtue of a valid state patent under the act of March 24, 1893 (Stats. 1893, p. 341), found as a part of the codification of that act in section 3493m of the Political Code. She also makes claim of title by adverse possession, and that plaintiff has lost all right by laches. Section 1 of said act provides as follows:

> "Any person desiring to purchase any of the lands now uncovered or which may hereafter be uncovered by the rescission or drainage of the waters of inland lakes, and inuring to the state by virtue of her sovereignty, or the swamp and overflowed lands not segregated by the United States, must make an application therefor to the surveyor general of the state" (stating the facts to be included in the application and describing the land by legal subdivisions, or by metes and bounds if the legal subdivisions are unknown).

Section 2 of the act provides that upon filing the application when the land has not been sectionized, the surveyor general must authorize the county surveyor of the county where the whole or the greater portion of the land lies to survey the same, and he shall make an actual survey thereof. This act seems to deal with two classes of lands: First, those uncovered by the recession or drainage of the waters of inland lakes "and inuring to the state by virtue of her sovereignty"; and, second, as to swamp and overflowed lands not segregated by the United States. The state patent recites that it was issued under an act of the Legislature of the state entitled "An act regulating the sale of the lands uncovered by the recession or drainage of the waters of inland lakes, and unsegregated swamp and overflowed lands, and validating sales and surveys heretofore made," approved March 24, 1893.

We do not find it necessary to consider defendant's alleged title by adverse possession. Neither need we pass upon the point raised that plaintiff is estopped by his laches from maintaining the action. Some facts of more or less significance are found in affidavits read at the hearing of the motion for a new trial which cannot now be considered for the reason these facts were not shown at the trial.

[1, 2] The burden was upon plaintiff to establish title which he could not do by relying on the weakness of defendant's title. Sears v. Willard, 165 Cal. 12, 130 Pac. 869. In our opinion the evidence is insufficient to establish title in plaintiff to the land in dispute. The United States patent to Fishel, through whom plaintiff claims title, calls for certain lots 1, 2, 3, and 4 and the S. E. ¼ of S. W. ¼ of section 36, T. 14 N., R. 9 W. Plaintiff introduced in evidence, as stated by counsel, "for purposes of illustration, and of showing the relative position of the land in controversy, to surrounding lands and to Clear Lake, the following map":

This map purports to show the meander line of the lake and the boundary of lots 1, 2, 3, and 4 thereon. The map shows the continuation of this meander line through section 36 and crossing the west line of the section 9.65 chains from its northwest corner. From the map it appears that there is a swamp and overflowed land location, No. 33, lying east of this meander line and east of lots 1 and 2. West of the disputed land and lying on both sides of the meander line of the lake marked on the map is swamp and overflowed land location No. 31. This land in location 31 was patented to Elijah Reeves by the state and was conveyed to plaintiff by the same deed which conveyed to him lots 1, 2, 3, and 4 of section 36. The disputed land lies between these two locations, and is marked location 578. Apparently all three of these locations are swamp and overflowed land locations. The land embraced in location 31, now owned by plaintiff, consisting of 78.12 acres, is about equally divided by the so-called meander line of the lake. The lands lie on both sides of this meander line.

Witness Neal testified that he made the map introduced in evidence; that he was familiar with the land in dispute and adjoining lands and that the map "is a true representation of the land in controversy, and its surroundings"; that the land "borders on Clear Lake," and that "Clear Lake is a navigable body of water about 25 miles long and an average of 5 or 6 miles wide." Upon the foregoing evidence plaintiff rested his case.

Plaintiff introduced no government field notes or official plats establishing the location of the meander line of the lake or that the land described in the Fishel patent was meandered by Clear Lake. The statement of witness Neal that the land "borders on Clear Lake" is not sufficient to show the location of the meander line of the lake. The map introduced by plaintiff locates the only meander line shown as running through the middle of a tract of land which plaintiff claims as swamp and overflowed land under a state patent, and some of this land is directly adjacent on the north and some directly adjacent on the west to the land in dispute. We think this map wholly insufficient to establish the location of the meander line of the lake and the northerly boundaries of the lots patented to Fishel. Plaintiff claims under the statute, section 830, Civil Code, which provides that:

> "Where land borders upon a navigable lake or stream, where there is no tide, the owner takes to the edge of the lake or stream, at low water mark."

Plaintiff introduced no evidence to establish the edge of the lake at low-water mark to which he claimed the right to hold under the Fishel patent, nor was there any evidence that the land in dispute lies between such low-water mark and the said meander line of the lake. Nor was evidence introduced as to the character of the land in dispute—whether or not uncovered by recession of the lake or whether or not swamp and overflowed. Conceding that this meander line was established, the concession would carry no presumption that the land claimed by plaintiff was part of the lots mentioned in said patent.

[3] The edge of the lake at low-water mark in front of these lots as designated in the Fishel patent may or may not extend to and follow the lines marking the boundaries of the land in dispute. A glance at the map will show it to be highly improbable that the boundaries of the disputed tract bear any relation to "the edge of low-water mark" of the lake. Lots 1, 2, 3, and 4 are fractional parts of the section with acreage of each given. Prima facie the patent conveys only the land described. In Niles v. Cedar Point Club, 175 U. S. 300, 20 Sup. Ct. 124, 44 L. Ed. 171, it was claimed that the fact that a meander line was run amounts to a determination by the land department that the surveyed fractional sections bordered upon a body of water, navigable or nonnavigable, and that, therefore, the purchaser of these fractional sections was entitled to riparian rights. The court said:

> "But there is no such magic in a meandered line. All that can be said of it is that it is an irregular line which bounds a body of land, and beyond that boundary there may be found forest or prairie, land or water, government or Indian reservation."

And it was held, in Chapman v. Bigelow, 77 Ark. 343, 92 S. W. 534, that where land is claimed through riparian rights, the burden is on the claimant to show the character or condition of the land before he will take beyond the meander line. The principle of these cases is that the meander line is not conclusive of rights to land lying beyond it and outside of the described land. It is quite conceivable that there may be bodies of land beyond "the edge of the lake at low-water mark," properly classable as swamp and overflowed land, along the borders of Clear Lake. The state has proceeded upon this assumption; plaintiff holds state title to such land immediately adjoining the land in controversy. Before we should feel justified in disturbing these titles, we should have clear and convincing proof that the law compels it.

The judgment and order are reversed.

SAWYER v. BERGER. (Civ. 2161.)

OFFICERS 🔑100(1)—SALARIES—DIMINISHING DURING TERM.

Under county charter providing that salaries of constables, etc., shall be fixed by the board of supervisors prior to election and shall not be increased or diminished during the term, where plaintiff township constable was elected in November, 1914, and thereafter duly qualified, and at noon on the 4th day of January, 1915, entered upon the duties of his office for the term beginning that day the supervisors could not, by ordinance passed after noon of such day, change his salary; the adoption of the charter not suspending Pol. Code, § 4237, subd. 15, as to salary.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; H. T. Dewhirst, Judge.

Mandamus proceeding by Jedd F. Sawyer against S. G. Berger. Writ issued, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

T. W. Duckworth, Dist. Atty., and John L. Campbell, both of San Bernardino, for appellant. Henry M. Willis and William Guthrie, both of San Bernardino, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. In this case a writ of mandamus issued to the defendant Berger as auditor of the county of San Bernardino requiring him to issue to the plaintiff a warrant on the treasurer of San Bernardino county in the sum of $75 for plaintiff's salary for the month of May, 1916, as constable of Upland township. The defendant appeals from the judgment.

On November 3, 1914, the plaintiff was elected to said office of constable. Thereafter he duly qualified and at noon on the 4th day of January, 1915, entered upon the duties of the office for the term beginning that day. Ever since the date last mentioned he has been the duly elected, qualified, and acting constable of Upland township. He is entitled to the salary claimed by him, amounting to $75 per month in accordance with the provisions of section 4237 of the Political Code, unless the salary to which he is entitled was reduced to the sum of $65 per month by virtue of an ordinance of the board of supervisors of the county of San Bernardino, which ordinance was "passed, adopted and approved as an urgency measure," after noon on the 4th day of January, 1915, which was the first Monday after the first day of that month. By the terms of that ordinance the compensation of constables in the various townships in the county of San Bernardino was declared to be a fixed salary, and it was provided that the constable in and for Upland township should receive $780 per annum. The monthly installments of such salary would be $65. Upon due proceedings had as permitted by section 7½ of article 11 of the Constitution of the state of California, a charter for the county of San Bernardino was adopted at the general election of November, 1912, which charter was duly approved by the Legislature in April, 1913. Stats. of 1913, p. 1652. By article 3, § 3, of the charter it is provided that the salaries of justices of the peace and constables shall be fixed by the board of supervisors, and that such salaries need not be uniform. Other provisions of the charter, pertinent to the present inquiry, are the following:

> Article 7, § 1: "In all cases in which the board of supervisors are authorized by law or by this charter to fix the compensation of any officer, such salary shall be fixed prior to the election or appointment of such officer, and shall not be increased or diminished during the term for which such officer shall be elected or appointed."
> Article 7, § 6: "This charter, in so far as it relates to the nomination and election of supervisors and township officers, shall take effect and be in force from and after the time of its approval by the Legislature, and as to all other matters it shall take effect and be in force from and after 12 o'clock noon, of the first Monday after the first day of January, 1915."

Article 7, § 5, referring to persons in office "at the time this charter goes into effect," says:

> "Nor shall anything in this charter be construed as changing or affecting the compensation of any such officer during the term for which he shall have been elected."

Counsel for appellant contend that until the adoption by the board of supervisors after noon of January 4, 1915, of an ordinance prescribing the salary for the office held by respondent, there was no salary attached to that office. With that proposition we do not agree. Section 7½ of article 11 of the Constitution, under which the San Bernardino county charter was framed, contains the following declaration:

> "Whenever any county has framed and adopted a charter, and the same shall have been approved by the Legislature, as herein provided, the general laws adopted by the Legislature in pursuance of sections 4 and 5 of this article, shall, as to such county, be superseded by said charter as to matters for which, under this section it is competent to make provision in such charter, and for which provision is made therein, except as herein otherwise expressly provided. * * *"

Sections 4 and 5 referred to in the foregoing quotation are the sections under which the Legislature is directed to provide for township organizations, and is authorized to regulate the compensation of township officers. The general law establishing the compensation of the office here in question was the law contained in section 4237, subdivision 15, of the Political Code. That section provides a schedule of salaries which, as applied to Upland township, amounts to $75 per month for services rendered in criminal cases, together with the right of the constable to receive and retain for his own use such fees as are allowed by law for services performed by him in civil actions. At noon of January 4, 1915, when the plaintiff's term of office began, the provisions of that statute were in force in the county of San Bernardino notwithstanding the adoption of the county charter. The matter involved was one for which the charter had made no provision which could be effective at that moment. From and after that time, whenever it chose to do so, the board of supervisors could adopt an ordinance fixing the salaries of constables, but until the taking effect of such ordinance the salary established by general law remained in force.

The board of supervisors promptly used its authority to pass a salary ordinance. We may assume the validity of that ordinance, since it is not attacked in this case. The only question remaining to be determined here is whether or not the change of salary applies to the plaintiff in this case. It does not so apply, since the charter itself declares that the salary of his office shall not be changed or affected, under its provisions, during the term for which he was elected.

The judgment is affirmed.

CORPORATIONS ⟹80(11) — AGREEMENT TO PURCHASE CORPORATE STOCK—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In a corporation's suit for the full amount of the contract price of its shares alleged to have been contracted to be purchased by plaintiff, evidence held to support the trial court's finding that the contract in question was not executed between the defendant and another as agent of plaintiff corporation, and that defendant was induced to execute it and to deposit certain oil stock with a third person, intervener, in reliance upon certain of his representations which were positive assertions of that which was not true or not warranted by his information.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by the Sterilization Company of California, a corporation, against A. J. Tucker, wherein Guy Wilkinson intervened. From a judgment that plaintiff and intervener take nothing, and an order denying their motions for a new trial, they appeal. Judgment and order affirmed.

Jos. K. Hutchinson, of San Francisco, for appellant Sterilization Company of California. Nat. Schmulowitz, of San Francisco, for appellant intervener. Purcell Rowe, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LENNON, P. J. This is an appeal from a judgment that plaintiff and intervener take nothing, and from the order denying plaintiff's and intervener's motions for a new trial.

Plaintiff's complaint alleged the execution of a contract between the plaintiff and the defendant, by the terms of which plaintiff was to sell and the latter was to purchase 64,650 shares of the plaintiff's capital stock; the repudiation of the contract by the defendant, and plaintiff's election to hold said shares of its capital stock for the benefit of the vendee and sue for the full amount of the contract price. The trial court found, in effect, that the contract in question was not executed between defendant and plaintiff, and the only question raised by plaintiff on this appeal involves the sufficiency of the evidence to support that finding.

The record discloses in part that defendant Tucker entered into an agreement with one Hanus to buy 64,650 shares of the capital stock of the Sterilization Company of California at 50 cents per share, and deposited with one Wilkinson, the intervener, 10,000 shares of the capital stock of the Pantheon Oil Company as security for his performance of the said contract. He entered into the agreement at the solicitation of Wilkinson, who represented to him that he (Wilkinson) was the owner of certain patented rights, which were of great value in treating citrus fruits with a gas; that he had organized the Sterilization Company for the purpose of employing the patent in California, and had entered into a contract with the corporation plaintiff to sell it certain machines. Wilkinson made the further representations to defendant that Hanus had undertaken to finance the Sterilization Company, for which he received about two-thirds of the company's stock, but that he was about to fail in his undertaking, in which case the Sterilization Company would be unable to keep its contract with Wilkinson, and that Wilkinson was in a position to take any right that Hanus or the Sterilization Company had in reference to the gas process. To protect Hanus and enable him to perform, Wilkinson requested defendant to carry on his negotiations through Hanus.

While there is evidence to the effect that Hanus was the secretary and managing agent of the Sterilization Company with power to contract for it, on the other hand, there is evidence to support the finding of the trial court that Hanus was not the agent of the corporation in the execution of the contract in question. Thus it was shown that defendant dealt with Hanus solely as the agent of Wilkinson; that defendant's negotiations from the first were had with Wilkinson; that, in addition to being secretary to the Sterilization Company, Hanus was working for Wilkinson and had his offices with Wilkinson; that Wilkinson himself dictated the terms of the contract and drew up the letter embodying those terms, which letter was addressed to Hanus, not to the corporation, and the letter accepting those terms was signed by Hanus. These two letters, in effect, constituted the contract in controversy. Furthermore, the evidence shows that the Sterilization Company, between November 9, 1911, and November 21, 1911, during which period the transaction in question was negotiated and concluded, did not have more than approximately 33,000 shares of stock in its treasury, and consequently was not in a position to sell to defendant the 64,650 shares of stock in question.

The fact that the evidence shows without any substantial conflict that Hanus was the owner in his own right of but 33,333 shares of the stock which was the subject-matter of the contract, and that the remaining 31,317 shares stood in his name and were held by him merely in trust for the Sterilization Company for promotion purposes, will not suffice to disturb the trial court's finding that Hanus did not execute the contract in question as the agent of the Sterilization Company. While this fact might tend to show that Hanus had made an unauthorized disposition of the stock held by him in trust, yet under all of the circumstances of the transaction it would not compel the conclusion that the contract was entered into by Hanus in his capacity as agent of the Sterilization Company. Wilkinson, as intervener, sought to quiet his alleged title to the 10,000 shares of Pantheon Oil Company's stock, deposited with him by the defendant as a security for the faithful performance of the terms of the contract in controversy. The execution of the contract, however, was alleged by the defendant to have been induced by the false and fraudulent misrepresentations of Wilkinson, the intervener.

The findings of the trial court that defendant was induced to execute the contract in controversy and to deposit the 10,000 shares of oil stock with the intervener, in reliance upon certain representations of the intervener, which were positive assertions of that which was not true and not warranted by the information possessed in that regard by him, are supported by the evidence, and these findings, in turn, support the judgment against the intervener.

MARTIN v. SHARP & FELLOWS CONTRACTING CO. (Civ. 1889.)

1. PARTNERSHIP ⚷55 — EXISTENCE — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In a contractor's suit to recover a balance due defendant corporation, for which the work was done, setting up payment to a third person, whom it claimed was plaintiff's partner, evidence held to justify the court's finding that no partnership existed, but that the third person's status, aside from a leasing of mules and equipment, was that of one who in consideration of half the net profits loans a certain amount to enable another to prosecute work.

2. PARTNERSHIP 🔑13—EXISTENCE OF RELATION—STATUTE.

Under Civ. Code, § 2395, defining a partnership as the association of two or more persons to carry on business together and divide its profits, where a third person, in consideration of half the net profits from a contract, loaned plaintiff a sum of money to enable him to prosecute the work, the fact that after all the money had been advanced, when the work was largely completed, and the possibility of loss appeared negligible, the third person agreed, on plaintiff's giving him security for payment of the money advanced, to bear half of any loss incurred, did not change the relation between plaintiff and the third person into one of partnership, since a mere participation in profit and loss does not necessarily constitute a partnership.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Partnership.]

3. PAYMENT 🔑4—PAYMENT OF LOAN—JUSTIFICATION.

Though a corporation which had let a contract to plaintiff knew that a third person was loaning plaintiff money with which to prosecute the work, that fact could not justify the corporation in assuming payment of such loan to the third person, in the absence of authority so to do from plaintiff, or an order of court justifying the action.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leslie R. Hewitt, Judge.

Action by James Martin against the Sharp & Fellows Contracting Company, a corporation. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying its motion for new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Isidore B. Dockweiler and Thomas A. J. Dockweiler, both of Los Angeles (Wilbur D. Finch, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant. W. N. Goodwin, Hunsaker & Britt, Le Roy M. Edwards, and Samuel Poorman, Jr., all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Action to recover a balance of $1,487.09 for work and labor done by plaintiff as a subcontractor of defendant. Judgment went for plaintiff, from which, and an order denying its motion for a new trial, defendant appeals.

It appears that defendant, exacting a bond conditioned to protect it from loss in so doing, paid the sum in question, concededly earned by plaintiff in the performance of the work under the terms of a contract made by him with defendant, to one John Mulligan. The defense interposed by answer to plaintiff's recovery thereof was: First, that the payment so made to Mulligan was pursuant to an assignment of such balance made by plaintiff; and, second, that Mulligan was a partner of plaintiff and as such entitled to receive and receipt for moneys due the copartnership.

[1] With regard to the assignment, the evidence conclusively shows, as found by the court, that plaintiff did, on March 31, 1913, assign to Mulligan any and all sums of money due or to become due to him on account of the work and labor the performance of which was called for by his said contract with defendant; that said assignment was made to secure the payment of certain indebtedness then due from plaintiff to Mulligan, all of which indebtedness, long prior to the time of the payment made by defendant to Mulligan, was liquidated and fully paid; due notice of which facts was, in writing, given defendant, with instructions, likewise in writing to pay said balance to no one other than to plaintiff. In his presentation of the case on appeal, counsel for appellant does not, and indeed, in our opinion, could not, upon the facts stated, urge the making of the assignment as justifying defendant in making payment of said sum to Mulligan. His chief contention is that plaintiff and Mulligan were partners, as to which fact, however, the court made an adverse finding. It is to the alleged want of evidence to support this finding that appellant directs his argument.

[1, 2] While the evidence touching the subject is conflicting, it tends strongly to establish the following facts: Defendant had a contract for the grading of a line of railroad, a subcontract to do a part of which work it let to plaintiff, whose equipment of stock and tools it seems was inadequate for the purpose, and he was likewise without sufficient funds at the commencement of the work to prosecute the same. Mulligan had been engaged in railroad construction, and was a man of some means, and his brother Dave Mulligan owned a lot of mules and railroad construction equipment which the evidence tends to show were in fact controlled by John Mulligan. Both the Mulligans expressed a desire that plaintiff should obtain a contract of sufficient size and importance to enable him to use the Mulligan equipment during the winter, and John Mulligan, as an inducement to plaintiff to accept the contract for the work and hire the mules and equipment of the Mulligans at $25 per pair per month, plaintiff to receive a like sum for the use of such mules owned by him as he might contribute in the performance of the work, agreed to advance to him such moneys as he might require in the early prosecution of the work and until he received installments of his contract price, due at intervals upon estimates of work done in the progress thereof, in consideration of which John Mulligan was to have one-half of the net profits derived from the contract. Plaintiff and defendant alone were parties to the contract, Mulligan in no way being recognized therein, and it appears that he took no part or interest in the making of the contract or the performance of the work, other than on occasions of infrequent visits when he manifested an interest in the management and use of his work stock. Upon entering into the contract, in January, 1913, plaintiff commenced the work, and up to March, 1913, Mulligan advanced to him some $8,000, in evidence of which plaintiff executed and delivered to him a promissory note therefor. Early in March, months before the work was completed, differences arose between plaintiff and Mulligan, due in part to prior transactions between them involving a $2,500 note maturing March 1st, and Mulligan insisted upon plaintiff at once repaying the advances he had made, and on March 3d wrote him a letter, saying, "I wish you would arrange to clear up with me altogether," and further saying:

> "I think, when I am paid back the money I furnished to start the business, that there will not be enough left to pay up everything unless you have quite a little bank account of your own." (Italics ours.)

On March 31st a meeting was had between plaintiff and Mulligan, resulting in an extension of time being granted plaintiff for the payment of two notes for $2,500 each, then due, given by plaintiff to Mulligan for the purchase price of stock, and an assignment from plaintiff to Mulligan of moneys due or to become due from defendant on account of the grading contract, which it was agreed should not be presented save upon notice of intention so to do being first given to Martin. At the same time an agreement was executed by them, reciting that plaintiff had the grading contract; that Mulligan had furnished certain money in the prosecution thereof, and that to secure Mulligan "against any bills that may be contracted by the said James Martin," the latter had given the written orders referred to for money due him, and providing that upon completion of the work an accounting should be had, and "any balance that may be due after all bills incurred by this contract (so made by plaintiff with defendant) have been liquidated, is to be divided equally between the parties to this agreement," and any deficiency "liquidated equally by the parties hereto." These and other facts which the evidence tended to prove and the reasonable inferences deducible therefrom justify the conclusion, as found by the court, that no partnership existed between Mulligan and plaintiff, but that his status, aside from leasing the mules and equipment, was solely that of one who, in consideration of one-half of the net profits, loaned plaintiff (not to a copartnership) a certain sum of money to enable him to prosecute the work. The fact that, after all the money had been advanced, the work largely completed, and the possibility of a loss appearing negligible, Mulligan agreed, upon plaintiff giving him security for payment of the money so advanced, to bear one-half of any loss incurred does not change the situation. By section 2395, Civil Code, a partnership is defined to be:

> "The association of two or more persons, for the purpose of carrying on business together, and dividing its profits between them."

Under this definition, a mere participation in profit and loss does not necessarily constitute a partnership. There must be such a community of interest as empowers each party to make contracts, incur liabilities, manage the whole business, a right which, upon the dissolution of the partnership by death of one, passes to the survivor, and not to the representatives of the deceased. Dwinel v. Stone, 30 Me. 384. To like effect are Coward v. Clanton, 122 Cal. 451, 55 Pac. 147, Vanderhurst v. De Witt, 95 Cal. 57, 30 Pac. 94, 20 L. R. A. 595, and Nofsinger v. Goldman, 122 Cal. 609, 55 Pac. 425, in the former of which it is said that profit sharing is not the true test of partnership. The association must be for the purpose of jointly carrying on the business. Mulligan was not interested in the conduct of the business, except in so far as it affected the profits, one-half of which he was to receive for the use of the money, not advanced to the partnership but loaned to Martin.

[3] It is next claimed that the evidence shows that plaintiff by his acts and conduct led defendant to believe that a partnership existed between him and Mulligan, and that, so believing, defendant paid the sum in controversy to Mulligan as plaintiff's partner. The doctrine of equitable estoppel, which appellant seeks to invoke, finds no support in the record, which is barren of any evidence of representations or acts on the part of plaintiff calculated to lead defendant to believe that such partnership existed. Moreover, there is an absence in the answer of any allegations constituting an estoppel as to plaintiff. Such theory is wholly inconsistent with the fact that plaintiff notified defendant to make payment to no one but himself; that all estimates and payments made thereon, other than the one in controversy, were made to plaintiff; that the accounts were kept with plaintiff; that defendant's manager testified that in their business it was their practice to have all persons with whom they dealt and looked to sign the contract where they were known; in addition to all of which, defendant, as a condition of making the payment in question, exacted from Mulligan a bond to protect it from any loss by reason of so making the payment. While defendant, as Martin testified, knew that Mulligan was loaning him money with which to prosecute his work, such fact could not justify it in assuming payment of such loan, in the absence of authority so to do from plaintiff, or an order of court justifying such action.

There are no other errors requiring notice.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

FRAUD 🔑58(1)—MISREPRESENTATIONS—FINDINGS—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Where the complaint for false and fraudulent representations, claimed to have been the inducing cause of plaintiff's execution of a contract with defendant, stated a cause of action for fraud, evidence amplifying in detail the allegations of fraud, and in substantial accord therewith, is sufficient to support the findings of fraud.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by A. J. Tucker against Guy Wilkinson. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Jos. K. Hutchinson, of San Francisco, for appellant. Purcell Rowe, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for damages, alleged to have resulted to him from certain alleged false and fraudulent representations, which were claimed to be the inducing cause of the execution of a certain contract between the plaintiff and defendant.

The briefs filed upon behalf of appellant presented several points for a reversal of the judgment, but, during the discussion of the case between the court and counsel for the appellant upon oral argument, it was conceded that none of the points made, save the alleged insufficiency of the evidence to support the trial court's findings of fraud, were well taken, and it was stipulated in open court that only the latter point need be considered and decided.

Since the oral argument we have again reviewed the evidence adduced at the trial, and, upon the question of its sufficiency to support the findings mentioned, it will suffice, we think, for us to say that we find there is much evidence in the record which although amplifying in detail the allegations of fraud set out in the complaint, is nevertheless in substantial accord therewith; and it being conceded that the misrepresentations pleaded in the complaint suffice to constitute a cause of action for fraud, it follows that the evidence supports the findings.

Judgment appealed from is affirmed.

BLUM v. SIMPSON. (Civ. 2146.)

LIBEL AND SLANDER 🔑120(1) — RIGHT TO NOMINAL AND PUNITIVE DAMAGES—INJURY IN BUSINESS.

Where defendant, engaged in distribution of circulars, in the course of a conversation with a customer of plaintiff, who was in the same business, called attention to the fact that police officers had complained to him as to the manner in which circulars advertising the customer's business were being circulated, there being a mere relation of the fact, and it making no impression whatever on the customer, who testified that he would continue to deal with the plaintiff, the latter was not entitled to nominal and punitive damages against the speaker for the alleged slander.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Wm. S. Wells, Judge.

Action by J. Blum against L. C. Simpson. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

L. A. Blum and M. D. Wolff, both of San Francisco, for appellant. Dunn, White & Aiken, of Oakland, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This action was for slander. Plaintiff is engaged in the business of house to house distributing of circulars and advertising matter throughout the county of Alameda and elsewhere. Defendant is engaged in a similar business. In support of his action for damages, plaintiff claims that defendant called upon a certain firm, one of plaintiff's customers, and without being in any way requested, volunteered information to one of the members thereof which was derogatory to the character and business ability of plaintiff, and which tended directly to injure plaintiff's reputation, and to shake the confidence the members of such firm had in plaintiff, and which further tended to cause to plaintiff irreparable loss. Judgment went for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

There are no specifications of error, but it is insisted that the evidence entitled plaintiff to at least nominal and punitive damages and costs. We cannot so conclude. The evidence shows that defendant called upon a firm known as Smith Bros. to solicit work, and during the course of a conversation had with one of the members of the firm called attention to the fact that police officers in Oakland and Berkeley had complained to defendant concerning the manner in which circulars advertising Smith Bros.' business were being circulated, believing that defendant was doing the distributing. That the police officers had complained to defendant is not disputed; and the record fails to show that the defendant did anything more than merely relate the fact during the course of the conversation. There is no evidence to show that this statement resulted in any damage to the plaintiff; but, on the contrary, it affirmatively appears that it made no impression whatever on John Smith, to whom it was made, for he testified that he had confidence in the plaintiff and would continue to deal with him as he had theretofore. Plaintiff sustained no loss by reason of the statement, nor was he in any manner prejudiced by it.

Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. CRANE. (Cr. 387.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 11, 1917. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court. Nov. 8, 1917.)

1. EMBEZZLEMENT 🔑44(2) — WEIGHT AND SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—TIME OF FORMING INTENT.

Evidence showing that defendant, the guardian of certain minors, induced their mother to become their guardian by representations that he could loan the funds of the wards at a higher rate of interest if some one else was guardian, that after her appointment he turned the funds over to her and they were immediately redelivered to him, and that he subsequently deposited them in an account in his wife's name, on which both he and his wife were authorized to draw checks, and subsequently drew checks thereon, reducing the deposit to a comparatively small amount, supported a conviction for embezzlement, as the jury were not bound to conclude that he formed the intent to appropriate the money to his own use before receiving it from the mother, but were justified in concluding that such intent was not formed until after he received the money, so that he was guilty of embezzlement, instead of larceny.

2. EMBEZZLEMENT 🔑49—VERDICT—IMPLIED FINDINGS.

A verdict finding defendant guilty of embezzlement was equivalent to an implied finding that defendant did not intend to steal the funds of the wards until after he received them from the mother.

3. EMBEZZLEMENT 🔑35—ISSUES, PROOF, AND VARIANCE — NATURE OF PROPERTY EMBEZZLED.

Evidence that defendant received a draft from a guardian for the purpose of loaning the proceeds of the draft, that he deposited it in an account in his wife's name on which he and his wife were authorized to draw checks, and that checks were subsequently drawn against the account, reducing it to a comparatively small sum, warranted a conviction for embezzlement of money, as alleged, as against the objection that it showed an embezzlement of the draft, rather than money.

4. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑564(7) — WEIGHT AND SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—VENUE.

Such evidence warranted the jury in finding that the embezzlement was committed in the county in which the draft was deposited, and not in the county in which it was delivered to defendant.

5. EMBEZZLEMENT 🔑11(1) — ELEMENTS OF OFFENSE—DEMAND AND REFUSAL.

A demand for the return of property or money intrusted to a bailee or trustee, followed by a refusal to return the property or money, is merely evidence of an embezzlement; and where there is other proof of the felonious conversion of the money or other property, a demand and a refusal are not essential elements of the crime.

6. EMBEZZLEMENT 🔑36 — MATTERS TO BE PROVED—TIME OF OFFENSE.

Evidence showing that the crime of embezzlement was committed within the statutory period within which an indictment or information for such offense may be found or filed supported a conviction, without proof of the precise time of the commission of the embezzlement.

7. EMBEZZLEMENT 🔑10—ELEMENTS OF OFFENSE—CAPACITY IN WHICH MONEY IS RECEIVED.

If, as the jury found, a guardian delivered money to her attorney, for which he gave his notes, on the clear and specific understanding or agreement that the money was to be loaned to some other party, and the notes were given as evidence of good faith or as security for the faithful execution of the trust, and the return of the money and accumulated interest upon the falling due of the notes, the relation between the guardian and the attorney was not that of debtor and creditor, but of a fiduciary character, so that the attorney's conversion of the money to his own use constituted embezzlement.

H. Stanley Crane was convicted of embezzlement, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Walter F. Lynch, of Stockton, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. Appellant was convicted, in the superior court of San Joaquin county, of the crime of embezzlement, and was sentenced to 10 years' imprisonment in the state prison. He appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The information charged that, on or about the 17th day of November, 1915, defendant, as the agent, servant, and employé of one Harold King, embezzled the amount of $569.50, the property of said Harold King. On May 4, 1914, one John King died in San Joaquin county, leaving an estate therein, and leaving surviving him a widow, Matilda King, and six children, three by his said widow and three by a former wife, the sister of said Matilda. Of these children, four were minors; their names being, respectively, Harold W., a son by the first wife, and Edna V., Edward L., and Enid King, issue of the second marriage. On June 1, 1914, defendant was appointed administrator of the estate of John King, deceased, and, on February 24, 1915, he was appointed guardian of said minor children. He filed an account of his guardianship on October 23, 1915, which showed a balance in his hands, to the credit of said minors, of $1,494.97. Said account was settled on November 15, 1915, and the resignation of the defendant as guardian was accepted. On the following day Matilda King was appointed guardian of said minors, and on November 17th receipted to appellant for said sum of $1,494.97. On September 10, 1915, defendant wrote a letter to Miss Ethel L. King, a daughter of John King by his first marriage, who was a school-teacher at Los Banos, stating that he would call upon her shortly and talk over the guardianship matter with her. Pursuant to said letter he called upon said Ethel in the latter part of September. She testified that the following conversation occurred between them:

> Defendant told her he had seen her aunt (who was also her stepmother), Matilda King, at Salinas, where she was residing. "Mr. Crane wanted to lend the money out at 8 per cent., and I told him I didn't want it loaned out at 8 per cent., you couldn't get good security at 8 per cent.; and he said he knew a place where he could get good security, and I still objected, and he said that, well, to make it doubly secure, he knew that the security he could get was good enough, but to make it doubly secure, he would give his note, too. And he led me to believe that he was still acting as the guardian of the estate, although it was going to be transferred over to my aunt; and I asked him why he couldn't do that without transferring the guardianship over to my aunt, and he said that he could not do it—he could do it as my aunt's attorney, but he could not do it while he was guardian of the estate. * * * He told me to write and advise my aunt to become the guardian of the estate, so that he could act as her attorney and lend this money out to some one else. I wrote her and told her that Mr. Crane had done our business before, and that it was all right to let him go on and tend to the business the way he wanted to, as he was guardian—he told me he was guardian now, and he ought to be able to look after the interests of the children as he thought best while he was guardian, and if we didn't do it the way he wanted to he would turn the money over to the courts, and they would get practically all of it; * * * the lawyers would get it all. Q. Did Mr. Crane at any time say anything at all about him borrowing the money himself? A. No; he did not. He was always going to borrow it for some one else. He was merely going to give his note as double security."

On September 27, 1915, defendant wrote Mrs. Matilda King, at Salinas, stating that he had called on Ethel King and had suggested:

"By reason of the fact that you could put out the money belonging to the four minor children at 8 per cent. interest, that it would be better to have you appointed guardian at Salinas and then I could attend to all the other matters for you thereafter. I told Miss Ethel that I would have you appointed guardian without any expense to you in the matter. After going over the matter fully with Miss Ethel, she agreed with me that it would be to the advantage of the four minors to have you appointed guardian, and she said that she would write you on Tuesday and advise you to act in this matter according to my advice."

He suggested that he would go to Salinas the following week with the necessary papers. Other letters from defendant to Ethel King were introduced in evidence, in one of which appears the sentence:

"I received a card from Mrs. King a few days ago, saying that she would write me as soon as she had heard from you and had received your advice."

And, on November 4, 1915, he wrote that he was going to Salinas "next Tuesday, at which time I will have Mrs. King appointed guardian."

Mrs. Matilda King testified that defendant called upon her in Salinas twice, once in the latter part of September and again on November 10, 1915. As to the conversation occurring at the first visit, Mrs. King testified:

"He told me that he wanted to appoint me guardian over the children, and I asked him why; and he said that to loan out the money, as him being a lawyer he couldn't loan it out; I asked him why that was; because, he said, he was a lawyer, because he was the guardian over them, that he could not loan it out. * * * He said he could loan it out for 8 per cent., while the bank was only paying 4. * * * He said it was lying idle in the bank, wasn't bringing any interest in at all. * * * I thought it was a good idea, because it would be earning more for the children, as he said he could loan it out at 8 per cent."

As to what transpired on November 10th, Mrs. King said that she gave defendant $600 of her own money to be by him loaned at 8 per cent. Defendant handed Mrs. King a draft, dated November 9, 1915, for $1,494.97, the amount shown to be due from him to the minors. This draft was drawn by the San Joaquin Valley Bank, of Stockton, on the Wells Fargo Nevada National Bank, of San Francisco. Mrs. King indorsed it, and immediately returned it to the defendant, whose indorsement also appears upon it under that of Mrs. King. The testimony of the cashier of the Commercial and Savings Bank of Stockton was that the draft was deposited in that bank on November 16th to the credit of the account of the wife of defendant, but that the account was so arranged that either the defendant or his wife could check against it. The cashier further testified that immediately before and at the time the deposit was made as indicated there was an overdraft in the account of the Cranes of $451.77; that said overdraft was credited from the draft deposited by Crane, leaving in the account the sum of $1,043; that this amount, through checking against it, was, on the following day—November 16, 1915—reduced to the sum of $820; that from time to time thereafter until the 18th day of December, 1915, the account, with small deposits added thereto at different times, was so drawn upon that, on the date last mentioned, there remained in the account the sum of $38.74 only. A perforation in the draft shows that it was paid on March 18th. Mrs. King testified that defendant delivered to her four promissory notes, each signed by him, dated November 17, 1915, and made payable to the order of Matilda King, with interest at 8 per cent. per annum. The first of said promissory notes was for the sum of $569.50 (the amount charged in the information to have been embezzled from Harold King) and was payable on April 2, 1919. Each of the remaining notes was for the sum of $344.50, being payable, respectively, in 1921, 1926, and 1929. Mrs. King testified that Harold would become of age on April 2, 1919, the date of the maturity of the first note, and that the other three minors would become of age, respectively, at the dates when the remaining notes would mature. Asked concerning the conversation between herself and defendant on his second visit to her, Mrs. King said:

"He was going to loan the money out at 8 per cent. for the children, and he asked me if I had any to loan out. Q. How did he come to give the notes, how did that happen? A. He said he would give me his personal notes for the money. Q. Now, did he say he was borrowing this himself, or going to take it from you to loan to somebody else? A. He said he was going to loan it out; he didn't say he was borrowing it for himself; that he would loan it out at 8 per cent."

There is some conflict in the record regarding the precise time at which the second conversation above referred to and the delivery of said instruments occurred. While Mrs. King testified that the date was November 10th, her receipt to defendant is dated November 17th, and the notary public, before whom she acknowledged her signature thereto and before whom she took the oath of office as guardian, testified that November 17th was the date upon whhich he took her acknowledgments, though the oath of office contained the certificate that it was "subscribed and sworn to before me this 16th day of November, 1915." The notary also said that Mr. Crane was present with Mrs. King on November 17th, when she acknowledged said instruments. Mrs. King stated that she noticed the notes were "dated ahead." The testimony of the defendant, given upon the examination of the case before a magistrate, was that he delivered the draft and the promissory notes to Mrs. King on November 17th and that the conversation testified to by her was held on the same day. As seen, the draft was deposited in the bank at Stockton on November 16th. However, as no point is made as to any discrepancy in the dates, we will make no attempt to reconcile them.

A reversal is urged on these several grounds: (1) That the evidence shows that the crime, if any at all was committed, is larceny and not embezzlement; (2) that there was and is a variance between the allegations of the information and the proof, in that, if the crime of which the defendant was convicted was committed at all, the evidence discloses that it was the embezzlement of a draft, and not of money, as charged; (3) that the crime charged, if committed, was committed in Monterey, and not in San Joaquin, county, hence the court below was without jurisdiction to try the accused; (4) that the crime of embezzlement is not consummated until a demand for a return of the property or money is made upon the bailee or trustee, and that the evidence fails to show that any such demand was made; (5) that the evidence shows that, the defendant having given Mrs. King his promissory notes for the money, the relation of debtor and creditor was thus created between the parties as to said money, and that therefore there can be no embezzlement by the mere failure or refusal by the defendant to pay said notes or repay said money; (6) that the failure to prove the precise time at which the alleged embezzlement occurred is fatal to the verdict and judgment.

The information is based on section 506 of the Penal Code, which is as follows:

"Every trustee, banker, merchant, broker, attorney, agent, assignee in trust, executor, administrator or collector or person otherwise intrusted with or having in his control property for the use of any other person who fraudulently appropriates it to any use or purpose not in the due and lawful execution of his trust, or secretes it with a fraudulent intent to appropriate it to such use or purpose, * * * is guilty of embezzlement."

[1, 2] 1. As to the first of the above enumerated propositions for which a reversal is urged, the theory of the defendant is that, if any crime was committed by him in the transaction from which this prosecution arises, it is larceny by trick and device, and the argument in effect is: That, if the defendant conceived a corrupt motive and purpose in the transaction, it must have been before he finally obtained possession of the money under the circumstances above indicated, and that his resignation as guardian of the minor children, his suggestion and procurement of the appointment of Mrs. King to that office, and thereupon his turning of the money over to her, followed by his insistence that she redeliver the money to him upon the pretext or representation that he could and would let it out at a high rate of interest, and the giving of his notes for the money, tended to disclose, if any crime at all, larceny by trick and device.

It may be conceded that the evidence is such that a verdict convicting the defendant of grand larceny might legally be sustained. In other words, it might well and justly be inferred from the evidence that the means resorted to by the defendant to secure a redelivery to him of possession of the money constituted a scheme through which a previously conceived intent to steal the money might the more readily be executed. But the evidence is not so conclusive upon that proposition as to compel no other conclusion, or to force the conclusion that, from the very beginning of the transaction from which this prosecution directly ensues, the defendant formed or had formed the intent feloniously to steal or appropriate the money to his own private or personal use or purposes. The evidence, so far as the intent of the defendant was concerned, or as to when, if at all, the felonious intent was by him formed to appropriate the money to his own use, is necessarily circumstantial, and, under it, the jury could justly and consistently have arrived at either one of two conclusions, viz.: (1) That the defendant had, by trick and device, obtained possession of the money with the intent to appropriate it to his own personal use, which would constitute his crime that of larceny; or (2) that he had no such intent when first he obtained redelivery of the possession of the money to misappropriate it or divert it from the purpose for which it was so transferred to his possession, but that, having obtained such possession for a specific purpose, which was to be for the benefit of the owner, he unlawfully, and contrary to the terms of his trust, himself used the money or diverted its use to his private purposes.

The court, in language of singular perspicacity, explained to the jury the essential elements of the crime of embezzlement, as defined by section 506 of the Penal Code, and further instructed them that the evidence should be such as to show beyond a reasonable doubt that all those elements were present in the act of the defendant in the handling of the money; otherwise, their verdict should be one of acquittal. Thus, it is manifest, the issue whether the act and the intent of the defendant, as shown by the evidence, did or did not constitute the crime of embezzlement, was squarely put up to the jury, and their verdict of guilty of embezzlement as charged necessarily implies that the jury concluded, after a consideration of the evidence by the light of the instructions, that the evidence disclosed the commission of the crime of embezzlement and not that of larceny. As is well suggested by the Attorney General, there may be a number of implied findings embraced within the general finding of guilty of the crime as charged, and in this case, in which there were no special findings made, one of the findings necessarily implied is that the defendant did not intend to steal the draft, or its equivalent in money, at or before the time he received it, but that his intention to embezzle it, or appropriate it to his own private use, was conceived and became existent after he received the possession of it. As in effect above declared, the fact as to the precise point of time at which the defendant conceived or formed the intention to take the money and use it for his own purposes was one of the essential issues submitted to the jury, and the finding of that fact is necessarily comprehended within the general finding of guilty as charged.

The case of People v. Lewis, 141 Cal. 543, 75 Pac. 189, is interesting in connection with the question of the effect of a general verdict in a criminal case in which, as here, either one of two inconsistent conclusions upon some vital fact might with perfect legal propriety be arrived at and sustained. In that case the defendant was charged with and convicted in the superior court of Alameda county of the crime of taking away a female under the age of 18 years from her father, without his consent, for the purpose of prostitution. Pen. Code, § 267. Her father lived in San Benito county, from where the defendant took the girl to Alameda county, in which the venue of the crime charged was laid in the information. The principal point in the case involved the challenging of the jurisdiction of the superior court of Alameda county to try the case. In support of that point it was claimed that the evidence showed that, if the defendant committed the offense, it was committed entirely in San Benito county, and that therefore the superior court of Alameda county had no legal authority to try the case. Although the Supreme Court held that the offense defined by said section 267 is complete when there is a taking for the purpose of prostitution, and that the actual placing of such female in a house of prostitution is not by the statute made an essential element of the crime, the point as to jurisdiction was not sustained, the court saying that if the evidence was such as to compel the conclusion that the defendant took the girl from her father in San Benito county, with the intent to use her for the purposes of prostitution, it would then be necessary to hold that the offense was wholly committed in said county, and that no crime within the venue of the superior court of Alameda county would be shown, but that the evidence was such as to sustain the finding of the jury "to the effect that at the time the girl was given into the charge of defendant by her father there was no intent on defendant's part to use her for purposes of prostitution, and that such intent was not conceived by him until some time after their arrival in Alameda county, while the girl was still in his actual charge, committed thereto by the father for a proper purpose." So in this case, if the evidence compelled the conclusion that the crime of larceny and not that of embezzlement had been committed, a much different situation would confront us, but, as shown, and as is plainly true, the evidence is such as amply to support the verdict as found and at the same time is such that it might perhaps properly be held sufficient to sustain a verdict of guilty of larceny had such a result been reached by the jury.

[3] 2. The claim that there is a further variance between the information and the proof in that the information charges the embezzlement of money and the evidence shows that the defendant did not receive money but a bank draft, cannot be sustained. It is true that the defendant in the first instance received a draft for the money in Monterey county; but it is also true, as has been seen, that he deposited the draft in the name of his wife in a bank at Stockton immediately after he had received it, and thus it became a part of his account in said bank, available for his and his wife's purposes. In substantial effect, it became cash or money the moment he deposited the draft in his wife's name, for it was kept there subject to be paid out on the checks of either himself or his wife. In the case of People v. Whalen, 154 Cal. 472, 98 Pac. 194, where the defendant had been convicted of obtaining money by false pretenses, and where it was made to appear that the prosecuting witness had given the defendant a check for a certain sum of money, a similar point was urged, and the court said:

> "It may be conceded that, if nothing more had been shown than the giving of the check, it would not prove the charge of having obtained the money; but we think the jury were fairly justified in concluding from the entire evidence that the check thus given was cashed by the defendant and the money obtained thereon. * * * There was nothing disclosed by the evidence to indicate that the defendant experienced any difficulty or delay in obtaining payment of the check. The facts concerning the payment of the money were all elicited upon the examination in chief of the two witnesses. There was no cross-examination on that subject, nor any attempt, at any stage of the case, to show that the check had not been paid in the usual course of business."

In this case, the testimony of the bank cashier discloses that the defendant and his wife, after the draft was deposited in the latter's name by the former, checked against their account, of which the draft had been made a part, until said account was reduced to the sum of $38.74. That the draft was in fact turned into cash, and the cash used by the defendant for his own private purposes, it seems to us the evidence unquestionably shows.

[4] 3. The jury were justified by the evidence in finding that if embezzlement of the money was committed by the defendant such crime was committed in San Joaquin, and not in Monterey, county, as the defendant contends. Without considering whether, in any event, the venue of the alleged crime was in San Joaquin county by virtue of the provision of section 781 of the Penal Code, providing that "when a public offense is committed in part in one county and in part in another, or the acts or effects thereof constituting or requisite to the consummation of the offense occur in two or more counties, the jurisdiction is in either county," a conclusive reply to the contention is that, as has been shown, the undisputed, and, indeed, the indisputable, evidence discloses that the act of depositing the draft in the bank in the name of the wife of the defendant by the latter occurred in the city of Stockton, in San Joaquin county, and that, from this circumstance, the jury were justly warranted in concluding that the intent thus to misappropriate the money was formed in San Joaquin county. As is obviously true, no one can look into the human mind and interpret its operations, and, quite obviously, the intent with which an act is done, or the time at which such intent is conceived and formed, can be learned only from external circumstances so connected with the act itself as to afford reasonable ground for a reasonably definite inference as to the nature of the intent, if any, which accompanied the act, and as to the time, approximately, that such intent took on a definite form in the mind of the person committing the act. The intent may be formed, practically, concurrently with the commission of the act. In this case, there is no particular circumstance, except the fact of securing possession of the draft under the circumstances above shown, tending to indicate that the defendant, when he received the draft in Monterey county, intended to handle the money available on the draft in a dishonest way, or that his intention with respect to the transaction was then corrupt or dishonest. On the other hand, the act of depositing the draft in the bank at Stockton in such manner as to facilitate the withdrawal of the money thereon by his wife and himself does, as stated, constitute a circumstance tending to disclose that he formed the criminal intent with respect to the draft or money in San Joaquin county. Of course, these observations are not to be understood as implying a negative of the proposition, above stated, that the evidence, taken in its entirety, might be held to be sufficient to sustain a verdict of grand larceny in this case, if such a verdict had been returned.

[5] 4. The contention that no embezzlement of the money could take place without a demand by the owner for its return having been previously made upon the defendant is untenable. A demand for the return of property or money intrusted to a bailee or trustee, followed by a refusal to return the property or money, is not itself an element of the crime of embezzlement, but constitutes mere evidence of embezzlement. It is true that a demand, followed by a refusal, is sometimes indispensable evidence of embezzlement; but it is the fraudulent and felonious conversion of the money or other property that constitutes the offense, and that may often be proved without a demand. People v. Bidleman, 104 Cal. 608, 38 Pac. 502; People v. Royce, 106 Cal. 173, 37 Pac. 630, 39 Pac. 524; People v. Gordon, 133 Cal. 328, 65 Pac. 746, 85 Am. St. Rep. 174; People v. Ward, 134 Cal. 301, 304, 66 Pac. 372; People v. Goodrich, 142 Cal. 216, 220, 75 Pac. 796; People v. Fisher, 16 Cal. App. 271, 275, 116 Pac. 688; Wharton's Criminal Law, § 1030.

The cases—particularly those cited from our own Supreme Court—do not, as we understand them, hold that a demand for a return of the money or property, followed by a refusal to return it, is an essential prerequisite to the consummation of the crime of embezzlement. In the case of People v. Tomlinson, 66 Cal. 344, 5 Pac. 509, cited here by the defendant, it appeared that a party having no interest whatever in the money intrusted to the defendant, and of the embezzlement of which the accused was convicted, made a demand on the latter to return the money to its owner. The court very properly held, not that a demand by the owner upon the defendant to return the money and a refusal by the latter to return it constituted essential acts in the completion of the offense of embezzlement, but that the demand made in that case and upon which the prosecution relied to prove the felonious conversion was not made by the party to whom the money belonged, nor by the evidence shown to have been upon his authority or for him. The other California cases cited by the defendant are People v. Wyman, 102 Cal. 556, 36 Pac. 932, People v. Royce, 106 Cal. 177, 37 Pac. 630, 39 Pac. 524, and People v. Page, 116 Cal. 396, 48 Pac. 326.

These cases hold, as the cases first above referred to declare, that the fact of demand and refusal is only an evidentiary matter, and constitutes mere proof of the unlawful and felonious conversion, and in some cases may, as before stated, be indispensably necessary to the proof of the crime; but none of them holds that where, as in this case, there is other proof than that of demand and refusal sufficient to establish the felonious conversion of the money or other property intrusted to the defendant, it is essential to the consummation and establishment of the crime to show that there had been a demand made upon the defendant by the owner of the money or property for a return thereof and a refusal by the defendant to comply with such demand.

[6] 5. The objection that the conviction cannot be upheld, because the precise time at which the alleged embezzlement was committed was not proved, is without legal force. The evidence shows that the alleged crime was committed within three years before the filing of the information, which is the statutory period within which an indictment or information charging an offense of the character of the one charged here may be found or filed (Pen. Code, § 800), and it was sufficient to show that the crime was committed at any time within the period of limitation as prescribed by the section named.

[7] 6. The last point urged is, as above shown, that, as to the money alleged to have been embezzled, the relation of debtor and creditor subsisted between the defendant and Mrs. King. This proposition proceeds from the fact, as shown, that the defendant, upon receiving the draft, executed and delivered to Mrs. King his several promissory notes for the same, payable at different times, or when her minor children, to whom some of the money represented by the draft belonged, arrived, respectively, at their majority. But the answer to the proposition is to be found in Mrs. King's testimony, which the jury evidently, and, indeed, presumptively, accepted and believed, that the money was not in fact loaned to the defendant, but was delivered over and intrusted to him with a clear and specific understanding or agreement between them that the money was by the defendant to be loaned to some other party at a high rate of interest, and that the defendant's promissory notes, voluntarily made and delivered by him, were to be only in the nature of evidence of the good faith of the transaction, or, in effect as stated by him, as security for the faithful execution of his trust and his final discharge therefrom by the return of the money and the accumulated interest upon the falling due of said notes. At no time, according to the testimony of Mrs. King, did the defendant claim, represent, or pretend that he was to receive the money for his personal use, but, on the contrary, at all times declared and represented to Mrs. King, that, in securing the money, his only purpose and sole intention were to loan the money to some other party, so that the minor children might derive some benefit from it before they were entitled to receive it; Mrs. King, as seen, further testifying that upon that representation and understanding alone she turned the draft over to the accused. Thus the jury were legally at liberty to find, as certainly they did find, that the relation created in the transaction between the defendant and Mrs. King was of a fiduciary character—that is, that the money was delivered to and held by him in trust for the benefit of Mrs. King, as the duly appointed and acting guardian of the minor children of herself and deceased husband, and was not loaned to the accused or delivered to him to be applied to his personal uses and purposes.

After a most painstaking examination of the record, and the points pressed upon us for a reversal, we have not been able to discover any error justifying interference with the judgment and the order appealed from, and they are accordingly affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; BURNETT, J.

PEOPLE v. HAACKE. (Cr. 393.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 3, 1917. Rehearing Denied Oct. 3, 1917.)

1. Criminal Law 🔑404(3)—Bottles of Liquor as Evidence.

In a prosecution for selling liquor, where it appeared that bottles of wine, purchased of defendant by a stool pigeon, were turned over to the constable, who placed them, just as received, in a trunk at his home, and removed them only when necessary to produce them before the grand jury and at the trial though the trunk was rarely locked, and all of the constable's family had access to it, and the bottles passed through the hands of several other persons, each of whom testified he had not altered the contents, the bottles were admissible in evidence, the constable testifying positively that he never changed their contents, that there were no indications that they had been tampered with, and that it appeared to him to be the same stuff.

2. Criminal Law 🔑865(1) — Coercion of Jury.

Where the judge, after the jury requested that the expert testimony be read to them again, stated that he took it to be a good sign that they were still working at the verdict, and had not concluded they could not agree, and that the court would be there until about 15 minutes after 9, and that, if they had agreed at that time, the court would accept their verdict and discharge them that night, the language used by the judge was not improper as coercing the jury to return verdict.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; J. Q. White, Judge.

William Haacke was convicted of selling alcoholic liquor in no-license territory, and from judgment of conviction and an order denying his motion for new trial, he appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

Charles Kasch and J. C. Hurley, both of Ukiah, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BURNETT, J. The defendant was charged by indictment by the grand jury of the county of Mendocino with the crime of selling alcoholic liquor in no-license territory. He was thereupon duly tried and convicted of the offense charged. He moved for a new trial, which motion was denied, and he was thereupon sentenced to pay a fine of $500 and to imprisonment in the county jail for a term of six months. Defendant prosecutes this appeal from the order and the judgment.

But two points are urged by appellant: (1) That the court erred in overruling objections to the admissibility of evidence, and (2) that the court was guilty of misconduct, in that it made a statement to the jury which had the effect of thereafter bearing improperly upon their verdict.

[1] Briefly the facts appear as follows: It being suspected that defendant Haacke was "blind-pigging," one William Lair was employed by Mr. Vann, the constable, to purchase liquor from defendant. Two bottles, securely wrapped in newspaper, of what was supposed to be wine and sold as such were purchased and promptly turned over to Mr. Vann. This occurred on July 23, 1916. Vann placed the bottles, just as he received them, in a trunk at his home, and removed them only when it was necessary to produce them before the grand jury and at the trial. It appears that the trunk was rarely locked, and that all of Vann's family had access to it. It does not appear that any one else had access to the trunk. The hearing before the grand jury was held in December, 1916, and the trial had on January 18, 1917. Upon the offer of the two bottles, together with their contents, in evidence, objection was made by defendant that no foundation had been laid, that there was no preliminary showing that the contents were the same on the day of trial as when originally taken. An examination of the record, however, discloses sufficient evidence to justify the admission of the bottles. Though Vann admits that his wife and children "could" have got at the bottles, the clear inference from his testimony is that they did not. He testifies positively that he never changed the contents; that the original paper was still around the bottles just as when they were purchased; that there were no indications whatever that the bottles had been tampered with; and that it appeared to him to be the same "stuff." Though the bottles passed through the hands of several other persons, each took the stand and testified that he had not altered the contents. At most defendant shows a mere possibility for one to have molested the bottles. But as declared in Tebbe v. Smith, 108 Cal. 101, 41 Pac. 454, 29 L. R. A. 673, 49 Am. St. Rep. 68:

> "The law cannot guard against a mere possibility, and no judgment of any of its courts is ever rendered upon one." While the bottles "should be admitted only after clear and satisfactory evidence of their integrity, yet, when they have been admitted, this court will not disturb the ruling, unless we in turn are as well satisfied that the evidence does not warrant it." Tebbe v. Smith, supra.

[2] The utterance of the judge, which is claimed to have improperly influenced the verdict appears from the following:

> "Court: Gentlemen, have you agreed upon a verdict?
> "Foreman: No, sir; some of the members of the jury would like to hear the testimony of the expert witnesses read. (At this time the reporter read the testimony of the experts.)
> "Court: Is there anything else, gentlemen?
> "Foreman: That's all, I think.
> "Court: Well, I take this to be a good sign that you are still working at it, haven't concluded you couldn't agree, and so keep working at it, gentlemen, and agree if you can and the court will be here till about 15 minutes after 9, gentlemen, and if you have agreed at that time the court will accept your verdict and discharge you to-night. You may retire now."

Defendant claims that the reasonable inference from these words is that the jury were threatened with a night in the jury room unless they reached a verdict by 9:15, and that in that respect they were coerced. We cannot agree with defendant's interpretation. It is not an unusual thing for a judge to tell a jury at what time of night he is going home, so that they may know when he is available if they wish to call him during the night. There is nothing in the language used by the judge which would indicate to the jury that he had a fixed and definite conviction in regard to the verdict or which would create the impression that he thought the jury ought to convict upon the evidence before them. He appears merely to have expressed satisfaction at the effort being made by the jury to reach a fair verdict.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

HOUTS v. FIRST TRUST & SAVINGS BANK et al. (Civ. 2148.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Sept. 12, 1917.)

1. HUSBAND AND WIFE 🔑249—COMMUNITY PROPERTY.

Where a husband and wife joined in a deed to O., immediately gave the wife a lease for 40 years, which was not recorded, and transferred the property to a corporation owned by the husband, O. receiving no consideration, the property became community property.

2. HUSBAND AND WIFE 🔑221—MORTGAGES 🔑154(3)—DWELLING HOUSE—OCCUPANCY OF WIFE AS NOTICE OF CLAIM.

Where record title to a dwelling place of husband and wife was in a corporation owned by the husband, a mortgagee is not called upon to investigate the rights of the wife in such property to make her a party to the foreclosure action; the husband being the head of the family, and the dwelling being in his possession in the eyes of the world.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; T. W. Harris, Judge.

Action by Jessie E. Houts against the First Trust & Savings Bank, a corporation, and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Jas. P. Sweeney, of San Francisco, for appellant. Gibson & Woolner, of Oakland, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This is an action in which the plaintiff sought to restrain the defendants from enforcing a writ of assistance for the eviction of herself from the possession of the premises involved in the action.

The facts of the case were these: Prior to January 7, 1907, the plaintiff and her husband, W. A. Houts, were the owners of the premises in question and occupied the same as their family residence. On the above date they joined in a deed to the property to one Edward O'Gara upon the understanding between themselves and their grantee that he would at once execute a lease thereof to the plaintiff for the term of 40 years at the nominal rental of $1 per annum, and, apparently, upon the further understanding that he would presently convey the property to a corporation known as the Traders' Investment Company. The said O'Gara immediately executed said lease, delivering the same to the plaintiff, who in turn gave it to her husband, who put it away in his safe deposit box. This lease was never recorded. A few days later O'Gara conveyed the property to the Traders' Investment Company. There was no consideration moving to O'Gara for any of these transactions, and the Traders' Investment Company was simply a name or mask under cover of which said W. A. Houts, husband of the plaintiff, conducted some portions of his business. Having thus acquired the title to the property the Traders' Investment Company proceeded to mortgage the same to the defendant First Trust & Savings Bank for a loan of $9,500. This loan not being repaid the mortgagee brought an action to foreclose its mortgage, to which action the said W. A. Houts and his wife, the plaintiff herein, were not made parties, and in due course of the proceedings obtained a judgment of foreclosure directing a sale of the property, at which sale the said mortgagee became the purchaser thereof for the amount of the judgment debt, and, the time for redemption having expired, received a deed to the premises. During all of this time the said W. A. Houts and his wife had been occupying the premises as their residence, but without disclosing to any one, and particularly to the mortgagee, the fact of the existence of the plaintiff's lease, up to the time when the latter sought to enforce its right of possession by the eviction of Houts and his wife from the property; whereupon the present action was instituted to restrain the enforcement of the writ of assistance issued in that behalf. The trial court held the transaction by which the claims of the plaintiff as to her right of possession under said lease arose to be fraudulent, and refused the plaintiff the relief she sought.

[1, 2] We are entirely satisfied that the trial court committed no error in its ruling in this regard. Whether W. A. Houts and his wife held the title to the property prior to January 7, 1910, as community property or in the relation of tenants in common is immaterial, for the reason that when they joined in a deed conveying it to O'Gara upon the understanding that he was to transfer it to the Traders' Investment Company—which was simply another name for W. A. Houts—it then lost its former quality and became community property, and for the further and perhaps better reason that the property was the family dwelling place, and as such was in the possession of W. A. Houts, the head of the family; and whatever occupancy the plaintiff had therein amounted merely to the possession of the property not by herself but by her husband to the eyes of the outside world. This being so, the First Trust & Savings Bank when it took the mortgage upon the property was in no wise put upon notice that the plaintiff herein had or asserted any claim or interest in the premises adverse to the possession of her husband, and was not therefore required to investigate the nature of her occupancy as the wife of the apparent owner, nor was the said mortgagee required to make her a party to its foreclosure action in order that she might be bound by the judgment obtained therein.

In the present action the defendant First Trust & Savings Bank pleaded and proved in detail the foregoing facts, and the court found the transaction out of which grew the plaintiff's asserted lease to be fraudulent from its inception and said lease to be void.

A closely analogous case to the case at bar is that of Bush & Mallett Co. v. Helbing, 134 Cal. 676, 66 Pac. 967, wherein the Supreme Court held a similar transaction to be fraudulent and void. Upon the authority of that case, the judgment and order are affirmed.

RHOADES v. LYONS et al. (Civ. 1876.)

1. HUSBAND AND WIFE 🔑255—COMMUNITY PROPERTY — SEPARATE PROPERTY TRANSACTION.

An automobile, bought by a wife out of her separate property, on a transaction in which the husband had no interest, was not community property, and was not subject to attachment in an action against the husband.

2. SALES 🔑476 — CONDITIONAL SALES — ASSIGNMENT OF CONTRACT—DEFAULT.

Where, on a conditional sale of an automobile, the vendor assigns his contract to another without knowledge of the purchaser, and payment of an installment is mailed to such vendor in time, the purchaser is not in default, although the assignee did not receive the installment on time.

3. REPLEVIN 🔑8(1)—RIGHT TO POSSESSION—LOST BEFORE TRIAL—EFFECT—PLEADING.

In an action for possession of personalty, the right of the plaintiff will be decided as of the date of commencement of the action, unless a supplemental answer is filed, showing plaintiff's subsequent loss of right.

4. SALES 🔑479(7)—CONDITIONAL SALE—LOSS OF RIGHTS AFTER COMMENCEMENT OF ACTION —PLEADING.

A defense, in the answer in an action for possession of personalty, that plaintiff had defaulted in payments thereon, does not entitle defendant to show defaults occurring subsequent to commencement of the action.

5. SALES 🔑479(8)—CONDITIONAL SALE—RECOVERY OF PROPERTY—FINDINGS.

In an action for possession by a seller on conditional sale, a finding that plaintiff was the owner and entitled to possession was a sufficient affirmative finding as to a defense that plaintiff had defaulted in installments due, as such finding was wholly inconsistent with such an averment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank G. Finlayson, Judge.

Action by Minnie Rhoades against George Lyons and the Fletcher Collection Agency. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Geo. P. Cook, of Los Angeles, for appellants. H. G. Bittleston and Robert Whitson, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. This is an action to recover possession of an automobile. Defendants appeal from the judgment. The record was prepared under the provisions of sections 953a and 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure. Accordingly we shall assume that counsel have inserted in their printed briefs all those portions of the record which they desire that we shall consider.

The plaintiff, Minnie Rhoades, is the wife of W. M. Rhoades. Defendant Lyons is a constable of Los Angeles township in Los Angeles county. On the 8th day of June, 1914, an action was pending in the justices' court of Los Angeles township by Fletcher Collection Agency, plaintiff, to recover from W. M. Rhoades money claimed to be due on a contract. In that action and on that day, and pursuant to a writ of attachment against the property of W. M. Rhoades, the automobile now claimed by the plaintiff, Minnie Rhoades, was seized by Lyons as constable and was by him taken from her possession. On July 8, 1914, Mrs. Rhoades commenced this action, which was tried on May 18, 1915. Thereafter the court entered judgment awarding possession of the automobile to Mrs. Rhoades, with the usual form of alternative judgment for the value of the property in case delivery thereof could not be had.

[1] As applied to the rights of the parties on July 8, 1914, the evidence is sufficient to support the court's finding that Mrs. Rhoades was entitled to the possession of the automobile. On June 8, 1914, when the property was taken by the constable, it was in her rightful possession under a contract of conditional sale made to her by one R. C. Haskett. All payments on that contract had been made by Mrs. Rhoades out of her own separate property and she had made the contract as a separate property transaction. Her husband, W. M. Rhoades, had no interest in the automobile and it was not community property. It follows that it was not subject to attachment in the action against W. M. Rhoades, and it was wrongfully taken from the possession of Mrs. Rhoades.

[2] On July 8, 1914, the rights of Mrs. Rhoades under her contract had not been impaired in any degree. To understand the situation it is necessary to mention some other facts. The Haskett-Rhoades contract provided for payment of the consideration in monthly installments, beginning on March 4, 1914, the date of the contract, and ending with the final payment due on December 4, 1914. The deferred payments were evidenced by promissory notes. Under date June 12, 1914, for a valuable consideration, Haskett executed a bill of sale purporting to transfer the automobile to one Herbert T. Brown. Nothing was stated therein concerning the Rhoades contract, but Brown knew the terms thereof and that the notes had been given. The contract seems to have been delivered by Haskett to Brown, for Brown had it in his possession the next day, but it does not appear that the notes were delivered to him. On June 13, 1914, for a valuable consideration, Brown execcuted to Fletcher Collection Agency a written assignment of the bill of sale and also a written assignment of the contract, and delivered therewith both of said assigned documents.

Mrs. Rhoades had duly paid all of the notes, to and including the note due on June 4, 1914. It does not appear that on the 2d day of July, 1914, Mrs. Rhoades had been informed by any one that Haskett had parted with his interest in the automobile or in the contract or in the notes; in fact, so far as appears, the notes were still in Haskett's possession. Acting upon the assumption that the next note was payable to Haskett, she sent to him on the 2d day of July a post office money order, payable to the order of Haskett for the amount of that installment. As the 4th day of July was Saturday, the payment could not be delinquent if made at any time on or before the 6th. Civ. Code, § 11. No objection was made to the money order as not the equivalent of legal tender of the money, nor is any question of that kind presented here. Upon receiving the money order Haskett sent it to Brown, who received it at least as early as July 6th and held it until July 9th. On that day Brown sent it back to Haskett, with a letter requesting that he indorse the money order and mail it to Fletcher Collection Agency. Instead of complying with that request, Haskett took the money order to the office of the attorney, who at that time was representing the plaintiff in this action. Thereupon that attorney, with Haskett and Mrs. Rhoades and her husband, went together to the office of the Fletcher Collection Agency, where they waited an hour for the manager of the agency to arrive. As he did not come, they then went away. No further payments of the notes appear to have been made. Upon the state of facts above shown, we are of the opinion that Mrs. Rhoades, when she commenced this action on July 8, 1914, had not defaulted on the July payment of her contract, and that she then had a good cause of action to recover from the defendants the possession of the automobile.

[3] But there is a further contention by appellants that the judgment should be in their favor, because at the time of the trial the right of possession of the disputed property had been lost by plaintiff and had passed to Fletcher Collection Agency. Appellants refer us to decisions holding that, even though one of the parties has the right to possession at the time of commencement of a possessory action, he cannot recover if such right of possession has ceased before trial. The cited cases are Bolander v. Gentry, 36 Cal. 105, 95 Am. Dec. 162, and Pico v. Pico, 56 Cal. 453. In Bolander v. Gentry the court said:

> "In order to maintain the action, a right to the possession must have existed in the plaintiff at the time of the commencement of the action. But, if before the trial of the action his right to the possession has ceased, and the defendant has been required to deliver, and has delivered, the property to the party entitled to its possession, we do not see why that fact may not be set up, so as to defeat a recovery of the possession, or the value of the property. O'Connor v. Blake, 29 Cal. 316. It might not defeat a recovery of the costs of the action, or damages accrued up to the time the contingency happened, but why not defeat a recovery of the possession, or the value, of the property? * * * Section 67 of the Practice Act provides that, 'where circumstances, occurring subsequently to the commencement of the action, render it proper, the same may be presented by supplemental pleadings, and issue taken thereon in the same manner as in the case of original pleadings.'"

In that case the facts upon which the claim of the defendant depended had been presented by a supplemental answer. The language used by the Supreme Court plainly implies that without such supplemental matter, the defendant's answer would be construed as corresponding to the allegations of the complaint in that it would relate to the time of filing the complaint. This is a just rule, since the plaintiff's right to recover depends upon the existence of the cause of action at the time of commencement of the action, without which plaintiff cannot recover. Section 464 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which most nearly corresponds to section 67 of the Practice Act, reads as follows:

> "The plaintiff and defendant, respectively, may be allowed, on motion, to make a supplemental complaint or answer, alleging facts material to the case occurring after the former complaint or answer."

[4] As we have determined above, the plaintiff at the time of commencement of this action was entitled to recover possession of the automobile. The only affirmative allegation contained in the answer of the defendants is:

> "That the said plaintiff leased and rented said personal property under a contract of conditional sale providing that the title thereto would not pass until same was fully paid for; that the said plaintiff never completed the payments provided for in said contract of sale, but defaulted in same prior to the commencement of this action and thereby forfeited all her right, title, and interest in and to the said personal property."

In that state of the pleadings the court was not called upon to find facts relating to transactions which may have occurred while the action was pending. The judgment is partly based upon finding II, which states:

> "That the plaintiff is, and at all times mentioned in the plaintiff's complaint was, the owner of and entitled to the possession of the automobile described in the plaintiff's complaint."

[5] Appellants contend that the judgment must be reversed because the court failed to make any finding upon the affirmative facts referred to in the foregoing quotation from their answer. There is no specific finding directed to that allegation, but an adverse finding thereon is necessarily implied in finding II above stated. Finding II could not be true if the plaintiff had defaulted in her payments prior to the commencement of this action, or if she had thereby forfeited all her interest in the property, and if (which was not alleged in the answer) the vendor, or any successor of him as such vendor, had exercised the option given him by the terms of the contract authorizing him to take possession of the automobile. Assuming that the affirmative matter pleaded was sufficient to constitute a defense, yet it was of a similar nature to that in Churchill v. Baumann, 95 Cal. 541, at page 545, 30 Pac. 770, 771, of which the court said:

> "This was not such new matter as is required to be specially pleaded, since neither its purpose nor effect was to discharge or avoid a cause of action theretofore existing, but to prove that the alleged cause of action never did exist, by showing that the material allegation of injury and damage to the plaintiff was not true. Bliss on Code Pleading, § 352 et seq., and authorities cited. An affirmative finding of facts inconsistent with an averment, and from which it necessarily follows that the averment is not true, is a sufficient finding that the averment is not true. * * * In the case at bar, however, the averment of injury to plaintiff was specifically denied, and the facts found, being wholly inconsistent with the averment, are equivalent to a direct negative thereof, and are sufficient to support the judgment."

So here the allegations of the complaint covering the matter of the plaintiff's right to possession were specifically denied, and the facts found, being wholly inconsistent with the affirmative averments of the answer made in aid of those denials, are equivalent to a direct negative of such affirmative averments, and are sufficient to support the judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

LOCKE v. COWAN et al. (two cases). (Civ. 2136, 2137.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Sept. 11, 1917.)

1. Municipal Corporations ⟹373(7) — Street Work—Enforcement of Lien.

A substantial compliance with jurisdictional requirements of the statutory provision for street work must be shown before the enforcement of a lien arising out of a contract for the doing of the work can be had.

2. Municipal Corporations ⟹373(7) — Street Work — Enforcement of Lien — Pleading—Statute.

As a matter of pleading, it is not essential to the statement of a cause of action for foreclosure of a lien arising out of a contract for the doing of street work to plead the particulars of the jurisdictional proceedings which are an essential prerequisite to making the contract, it being sufficient, under Code Civ. Proc. § 456, to plead such jurisdictional prerequisites in general terms and according to their legal effect, as by alleging that, "Upon and pursuant to due and legal proceedings had and taken by the council of the said city of S. R., a contract in due form and containing the matters and the conditions prescribed by law was made and entered into by and between the plaintiff and the said city for the doing of certain [described] work."

3. Municipal Corporations ⟹339(3) — Street Work—Resolution of Intention—Burdening Property Owner.

The requirement of a city's resolution of intention to have street work done that the contractor should exercise ordinary care to protect the public from danger imposed no obligation on him more onerous than his ordinary legal duty, and added nothing to his responsibility under the contract, and so could not have tended to increase the cost of the work, and thereby burden the property owners beyond the statutory requirements.

4. Municipal Corporations ⟹339(3) — Street Work—Resolution of Intention—Burdening Property Owner.

A clause of a city's resolution of intention to have street work done, requiring the contractor to execute a bond to the city in the sum of $1,000, running for three years after acceptance of the work by the council, conditioned to do the work according to plans and specifications, did not require the contractor to give a bond guaranteeing for three years the quality of the work done under the contract, the bond actually given and accepted having contained no reference to the time within which it was to run, so that the clause had no tendency to increase the cost of the bond for doing the work, and did not operate to increase the burden on the property owners along the line of the work.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Thos. C. Denny, Judge.

Actions by W. H. Locke against W. F. Cowan and E. C. Rand. From judgments for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. F. Cowan, of Santa Rosa, for appellants. Hilliard Comstock, of Santa Rosa, for respondent.

LENNON, P. J. These two actions were instituted in the superior court of the county of Sonoma by the plaintiff against the defendants for the foreclosure of certain assessment liens, arising out of street work performed in the city of Santa Rosa, pursuant to proceedings instituted by the city council under the provisions of the city charter. The plaintiff secured a judgment in each case, decreeing the foreclosure of the respective liens, from which the defendants have appealed in each case, and both cases are here upon a single record.

[1, 2] The demurrer to the plaintiff's complaint was properly overruled. Generally speaking, a substantial compliance with the jurisdictional requirements of the statutory provisions permitting and pertaining to the inauguration and performance of street work must be shown before the enforcement of a lien arising out of a contract for the doing of the work can be had. But as a matter of pleading, it is not essential to the statement of a cause of action for the foreclosure of such lien to plead the particulars of the jurisdictional proceedings which are an essential prerequisite to the making of the contract. It will suffice to plead such jurisdictional prerequisites in general terms and according to their legal effect. Code Civ. Proc. § 456. This was done in the cases before us by alleging that:

> "Upon and pursuant to due and legal proceedings had and taken by the council of the said city of Santa Rosa, a contract in due form and containing the matters and the conditions prescribed by law was * * * made and entered into by and between the plaintiff and the said city for the doing of certain [described] work."

This mode of pleading jurisdictional prerequisites in cases of this character has frequently been held to be sufficient. Pacific Paving Co. v. Bolton, 97 Cal. 8, 31 Pac. 625; Himmelman v. Danos, 35 Cal. 441; Williams v. Bergin, 127 Cal. 578, 60 Pac. 164; Gurnsey v. Northern California, etc., Co., 7 Cal. App. 534, 545, 94 Pac. 858.

The contention that the lien in suit in the second action expired before the commencement of that action is not sustained by the record, which shows that that action was instituted on July 1, 1914, and that the lien was filed for record July 16, 1913. The action, therefore, was commenced within the statutory time. City Charter § 81; Stats. of 1905, p. 896.

[3] The requirement of the resolution of intention to the effect that the contractor should exercise ordinary care during the performance of the work to protect the public from danger and accident imposed no obligation on him greater or more onerous than that ordinarily required of him by the law. This being so, it added nothing to his responsibility under the contract, and consequently could not have tended in any degree to increase the cost of the work and thereby burden the property owner beyond the statutory requirements. Blochman v. Spreckels, 135 Cal. 662, 665, 67 Pac. 1061, 57 L. R. A. 213; Woollacott v. Meekin, 151 Cal. 701, 91 Pac. 612.

[4] The same thing may be said of that clause of the resolution of intention which required the contractor to execute a bond to the city in the sum of $1,000, "conditioned to do said work and improvements according to said plans and specifications; said bond to run for the period of three years from and after the date of the acceptance of said work by the council. * * *" Conceding that the requirement of the resolution of intention that the bonds should run for three years was unauthorized by the city charter or the general law relating to street work, still we do not construe it to mean, as is contended, that the plaintiff, as contractor, was required to give a bond guaranteeing for three years the quality of the work done under the contract. The meaning and purpose of this provision of the resolution of intention is not readily apparent. In fact, it may be said to be without purpose, unless it was designed to cover the progress of particular portions of the work, which might be completed from time to time, prior to the completion of the entire work called for by the contract, which, perchance, might continue for a period of three years. But, however that may be, it is evident, from the fact that the bond actually given and accepted contained no reference to the time within which it was to run, that neither the city council nor the plaintiff as contractor construed and considered the provision in question to be an essential requirement of the bond. And that such provision was not intended to be a requirement that the bond should contain a three years' guaranty of the work to be performed under the contract is made evident, we think, by the fact that the bond given did not guarantee nor purport to guarantee the work beyond the time of its completion.

The provision in question, not being a requirement that the plaintiff would give a bond guaranteeing the work for three years, had no tendency to increase the cost of plaintiff's bond for the doing of the work, and consequently did not operate to increase, improperly or otherwise, the burden of taxation of the property owners along the line of the work. This disposes of all of the points made upon this appeal which we deem worthy of discussion.

The judgment in each case is affirmed.

NORTON v. LEWIS, County Auditor.

(Civ. 2437.)

1. COUNTIES ⚷43—OFFICERS—"NEGLECT" TO QUALIFY—SALARY—"FAIL."

Under Pol. Code, § 907, providing that, "whenever a different time is not prescribed by law, the oath of office must be taken, subscribed, and filed within thirty days after the officer has notice of his election or appointment," and section 947, providing that "every official bond must be filed in the proper office within the time prescribed for filing the oath," and section 996, subd. 9, providing that an office becomes vacant upon refusal or neglect to file the official oath or bond within the time prescribed, where a supervisor, whose term expired January 8, 1917, and who was re-elected on November 7, 1916, and given notice thereof 20 days later, did not file his official bond until February 28, 1917, or take his oath until April 23, 1917, the office was vacated, and he was thereafter holding under the extended term, and only entitled to the salary provided for such term; the word "neglect," in section 996, being used in the sense of "fail."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Fail; Neglect.]

2. OFFICERS ⚷92—SALARIES—DE FACTO AND DE JURE OFFICERS.

Pol. Code, § 936, permitting de facto officers to receive salary while title to the office is being contested, does not apply where there is no contest; and petitioner, holding under an extended term, is not entitled to salary, unless he is a de jure officer.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

Petition for a writ of mandamus by Richard H. Norton against Walter A. Lewis, Auditor of Los Angeles County. Judgment denying petition, and petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Gesner Williams and Vere Radir Norton, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. A. J. Hill, Co. Counsel, and David R. Faries, Deputy Co. Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Petitioner appeals to this court from a judgment denying his petition for a writ of mandate. Respondent claims that petitioner is entitled to a salary of only $250 per month ($3,000 per year), and that petitioner is merely holding over as incumbent of a term which began in January, 1913. Petitioner claims that he is in office for a term beginning on the first Monday after the 1st day of January, 1917, and that therefore his salary, as established by law, is $5,000 per year. Counsel for respondent, in their brief, have furnished us with a copy of the opinion written by Hon. Curtis D. Wilbur, judge of the superior court, wherein he stated the reasons for his decision. As that opinion contains a full and correct statement of the law as we understand it to be, it is hereby adopted as expressing the views of this court. The opinion is as follows:

"The petitioner was elected a member of the board of supervisors at a salary of $3,000 per annum and mileage for a term of four years, expiring January 8, 1917. Thereafter, on November 7, 1916, he was re-elected for a four-year term. He did not file his official bond until February 28, 1917, nor did he take the oath of office until April 23, 1917, although he received notice of his election on November 24, 1916. Section 907, Political Code, provides: 'Whenever a different time is not prescribed by law, the oath of office must be taken, subscribed, and filed within thirty days after the officer has notice of his election or appointment.' Section 947 of the Political Code provides: 'Every official bond must be filed in the proper office within the time prescribed for filing the oath.' Section 996, Political Code, provides: 'An office becomes vacant upon the happening of either of the following events before the expiration of the term. * * * Subdivision 9: His refusal or neglect to file his official oath or bond within the time prescribed. * * *'

"If any doubt existed as to the meaning of these provisions of the law they have been settled by a long line of decisions, commencing with Payne v. San Francisco, 3 Cal. 122. These decisions are collected in People v. Perkins, 85 Cal. 509, 511, 26 Pac. 245, 246, as follows: 'The first of the sections referred to (that is, section 907) provides that when a different time is not prescribed, the oath of office must be taken, subscribed and filed within 10 days after the officer has notice of his election or appointment, or when no such notice has been given, then within 15 days from the commencement of his term of office; and the other section provides that an office becomes vacant upon the happening of certain events, one of which is the refusal or neglect of one who is elected or appointed to an office to file his official oath or bond within the time prescribed. These provisions of the law are mandatory. The official oath or bond must be filed within the prescribed time or the right to the office becomes forfeited. Citing People v. Taylor, 57 Cal. 620; Payne v. San Francisco, 3 Cal. 122; People v. Brite, 55 Cal. 79; Hull v. Superior Court, 63 Cal. 174; People v. Hartwell, 67 Cal. 11 [6 Pac. 873]. See also Ball v. Kenfield, 55 Cal. 320, and People v. Perry, 79 Cal. 105 [21 Pac. 423].' In Lorbeer v. Hutchinson, 111 Cal. 272 [43 Pac. 896], it is said: 'The failure to qualify—if he did so fail—ipso facto created a vacancy. People v. Shorb, 100 Cal. 537 [35 Pac. 163, 38 Am. St. Rep. 310].'

"Petitioner herein contends that the proper construction of section 996 of the Political Code requires that the word 'neglect' should be given the significance ordinarily attached to the words 'negligently fail,' and that a mere failure, in the absence of a finding of negligence, would not create a vacancy. I think it plain, however, that the word 'neglect' is used in the sense of 'fail,' and the decisions of our Supreme Court uniformly so hold. In the case of People v. Taylor, 57 Cal. 620, the petitioner had, subsequent to his election, but after the time fixed by statute, filed his official oath and bond. The court there said: 'It is conceded that the relator, by reason of his failure to file his oath of office and official bond within 10 days after receiving notice of his election, is not, by virtue of said election, entitled to the office. Political Code, §§ 907, 947, 996.' This concession was no doubt made by reason of the previous decisions of the Supreme Court above referred to. The court, however, was required, notwithstanding the concession, to analyze the meaning and the effect of these provisions of the Code, and said: 'It is the duty of the court to give to this provision the force and effect which it was intended by the Legislature that it should have, if such intention can be ascertained; and we think that, without doing violence to the language of the statute, we may construe it to mean that the refusal or neglect of a person duly elected to an office to file his official oath or bond within the time prescribed by law creates a vacancy as soon as the term for which he is elected commences, which may be filled by the proper appointing power.'

"Counsel for petitioner states that he has found no case in which there has been an attempt made to cure the default on the discovery by the officer of the failure to file the oath or the bond in time. In the case of People v. Taylor, supra, it was said concerning the elected officer: 'Before the first Monday of March, 1880, he filed his oath of office and official bond. Neither the said oath or bond was filed within ten days after he received notice of his election, the time prescribed by law for filing them. On the 4th of March, 1880, the board of supervisors, deeming said office vacant, appointed Showers, the relator, to fill said vacancy.' It was under these conditions that it was said: 'It is conceded that the relator, by reason of his failure to file his oath of office and official bond within 10 days after receiving notice of his election, is not, by virtue of said election, entitled to the office.'

[1] "The cases in California too clearly hold that a failure to file an official oath and bond within time vacates the office to justify this court in construing the statute otherwise. The court is compelled to find both on the law and on the facts that the petitioner herein failed and neglected to qualify as provided by law, that he, therefore, holds his office as supervisor not by reason of his election thereto in November, 1916, but by reason of his election four years previous thereto and the statute which permits and requires him to remain in office until his successor duly qualifies. He is therefore holding under the extended term, due to the failure of his successor to qualify, and is entitled to the salary provided by law and by charter for such term. Rice v. National City, 132 Cal. 354 [64 Pac. 580].

[2] "It is suggested that the petitioner is holding de facto as to the second term, and therefore, under section 936 of the Political Code, is entitled to the salary for the new term as provided in the charter. So far as this proceeding is concerned the defect in this reasoning is, if it is correct, that the petitioner is not entitled to any salary at all, for in order to entitle him to receive a salary it is essential that he be a de jure officer. Section 936 of the Political Code, which in some instances permits a de facto officer to draw salary while his title to the office is being contested, does not apply to this situation, where there is no contest whatever over the office. It has been expressly so held by the Supreme Court. Bannerman v. Boyle, 160 Cal. 197 [116 Pac. 732]."

The judgment is affirmed.

CRUSE v. ADAMS. (Civ. 2178.)

REPLEVIN ⚷103(4) — ALTERNATIVE JUDGMENT.

The alternative portion of judgment in replevin for defendant, who justified retention under mortgage, is properly for value of property, without regard to amount due on mortgage, not involved or litigated.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Action by W. E. Cruse against C. W. Adams. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. O. Traber and A. Ellenberg, both of Fresno, for appellant. Ernest Klette, of Fresno, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This action was in claim and delivery to recover possession of certain personal property. Defendant admitted ownership in the plaintiff, but justified his retention of the property under a chattel mortgage executed by plaintiff. Upon the institution of the proceedings the sheriff took possession of the property and subsequently delivered the same to plaintiff.

The trial court rendered judgment in favor of the defendant for the return of the property, or, in the event that delivery thereof could not be had, then for the sum of $937.50, the value thereof.

It is the claim of the appellant that the alternative portion of the judgment represents a sum in excess of the amount due on the indebtedness existing between the parties and secured by the chattel mortgage. We have no means of determining this fact. That question was not involved in the action nor determined therein, which was purely possessory in its nature, and the only question litigated was the right to the possession of the property. The form of judgment was the only one authorized.

Judgment affirmed.

BAMBERGER-STERN CO. v. BAER. (Civ. 2088.)

APPEAL AND ERROR ⚷1010(1) — REVIEW — FINDINGS OF FACT.

Judgment will not be disturbed for insufficient evidence, there being some evidence supporting the findings, which support the judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by the Bamberger-Stern Company against Hermine Baer. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Henry A. Jacobs, of San Francisco, for appellant. Herrington & Clausen, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The judgment in this case was against the defendant upon a complaint for the purchase price of goods sold and delivered by the plaintiff to her. The findings of the trial court were to the effect that both the defendant and Joseph Baer, her husband, each ordered and each individually agreed to pay for the goods so sold and delivered; and the only point involved upon the appeal is the sufficiency of the evidence to support these findings as to the defendant. An examination of the record discloses some evidence supporting them in this particular; and, as they in turn support the judgment, it follows that this court will not disturb it.

Judgment affirmed.

THOMPSON v. SAN FRANCISCO GAS & ELECTRIC CO. (Civ. 2172.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Sept. 20, 1917.)

STATUTES ⚷72 — UNIFORM OPERATION — LIGHTING COMPANIES—CORPORATIONS AND OTHERS.

Civ. Code, § 629, imposing on corporations, but not on natural persons or firms, engaged in supplying to the public artificial light, penalty for noncompliance with demand for light, contravenes Const. art. 1, § 11, requiring all laws of a general nature to have a uniform operation.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by Henry Thompson against the San Francisco Gas & Electric Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Leo H. Susman and Wm. B. Bosley, both of San Francisco, for appellant. Seth Mann and Henry Thompson, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. It is conceded that the judgment in this case, awarding the plaintiff the sum of $540, was made in accordance with the provisions of section 629 of the Civil Code. That section imposes a penalty upon corporations engaged in supplying illuminating gas or electric light (of which the defendant is one) for a failure to comply with its terms when a demand under certain conditions is made upon them to furnish such gas or electric light; but it will be observed that the section leaves free from such penalty natural persons and copartnerships conducting the same business who may be chargeable with a like omission. It was contended in the lower court and is contended here upon behalf of the defendant that because of this discrimination between corporations and natural persons and copartnerships the section of the Code in question is repugnant to section 11 of article 1 of the Constitution, which provides that "all laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation." We think this contention must be sustained. The state has no more power to deny to corporations the equal protection of the law than to individual citizens; and there is no reason in law or in the nature of things why a natural person or firm engaged in the business of supplying to the public artificial light should not be subjected to exactly the same penalties as corporations so engaged. This proposition is supported, we think, by the cases of Johnson v. Goodyear Mining Co., 127 Cal. 4, 59 Pac. 304, 47 L. R. A. 338, 78 Am. St. Rep. 17, and Gulf, etc., Railway Co. v. Ellis, 165 U. S. 150, 17 Sup. Ct. 255, 41 L. Ed. 666.

It follows that the section of the Civil Code under consideration as it then existed—it having apparently since been repealed—was unconstitutional, and, that being so, the penalty or liquidated damages which the judgment appealed from purports to allow to the plaintiff had no foundation in law; and, the court having found that no actual damage resulted to the plaintiff because of the omission of which he complains, and that finding not being assailed here, it follows that the judgment appealed from must be reversed; and it is so ordered.

JACOBI v. C. A. SMITH LUMBER CO. OF CALIFORNIA. (Civ. 2124.)

WHARVES ⚷21—PERSONAL INJURIES—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

In an action for the death of a person falling into the water from a wharf rudely constructed with planks of uneven length and with a hole from 7 to 10 inches wide, evidence held insufficient to show, as a matter of law, that he knew of the condition of the wharf and was negligent in stepping into the hole or off the edge of the wharf, but to make his negligence a question of fact for the jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; A. B. McKenzie, Judge.

Action by Isadora Belle Jacobi against the C. A. Smith Lumber Company of California. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Samuel Knight and F. E. Boland, both of San Francisco, for appellant. Clarence N. Riggins, of Napa, and J. E. Rodgers, of Martinez, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The defendant, C. A. Smith Lumber Company, was the owner and in exclusive control of a wharf at Bay Point, on Suisun Bay, which was used for the loading of lumber upon vessels coming to that wharf from various points. The decedent—the husband of the plaintiff—brought to the wharf a schooner for the purpose of having it loaded with lumber which was to be taken to some inland point. He and his companions were in charge of the schooner, and arrived at the wharf upon a certain Sunday. The decedent had never loaded lumber from that wharf, at least not from that portion of it concerned in this case. During the Sunday on which they arrived, the crew, including the decedent, were in their boat resting and sleeping at least part of the day—just exactly how much does not very clearly appear—and on the following Monday morning began loading lumber upon the boat, which was brought down to or near the point where it was to be loaded upon trams of the defendant company which ran along a tramway near the edge of the wharf. The wharf itself seems to have been somewhat rudely constructed with planks of uneven length—the difference in some cases being as much as 13 or 14 inches—extending out beyond the tramway, and from a foot to two feet beyond the point where the cars themselves protruded over the tramway. There was also, it appears in the evidence, a hole in the wharf of some 7 or 8 or 10 inches wide extending to the track; at any rate, in addition to the shortness of the planks in general there was this hole which extended clear into the track. The decedent and his companion took the lumber from these cars as it was brought down to them on this day, and loaded it upon the boat. The point of loading on to the boat was not immediately opposite this hole in the wharf, but some little distance further down. During the operation of loading the decedent, according to the testimony of his associates, during the day was in the boat receiving the lumber from his associate who was upon the wharf. In the evening more cars were brought down, evidently with the idea that they were to be loaded on during the course of the evening and during the period when the tide was at a favorable height. It was during the course of loading these cars on in the evening, but while it was not yet dark, although in the twilight probably, that the decedent walked down along the wharf to where the last car was standing, and undertook to push it along the wharf to the point of loading; and it was while engaged in pushing this car along the wharf that he either stepped into the hole and lost his balance, or stepped upon a point where one of these short planks was. At any rate, just how he met his death does not clearly appear except that he did fall into the water. There is some evidence on the part of his associate that the car had been standing over the place where the hole in the wharf was. There is no evidence in the record that the decedent, at any time during the period that he was at the wharf, actually saw the hole in the wharf, or actually observed the shortness of the planks at the point where it is surmised that he fell overboard.

The defense to the action is contributory negligence; and we are asked by the appellant (defendant in the court below) to say as a matter of law from the evidence in the case that the decedent must be held to have known of the condition of the wharf; and consequently that he was guilty of contributory negligence in stepping either into the hole or off the edge of the wharf, and for that reason the plaintiff, his widow, cannot recover.

We do not feel justified in holding, upon the facts before us as above set forth, that contributory negligence is as a matter of law to be imputed to the decedent. None of the cases cited by the appellant go this far; and we feel that upon the foregoing facts this is a case for the application of the general rule that contributory negligence is a question of fact for the jury.

This being the only point in the case, it follows that the judgment must be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

Under the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, pp. 279, 283), § 12, the question whether an injury occurred or arose out of and in the course of the employment, or was the direct result of willful misconduct, involves jurisdictional facts.

2. Master and Servant 🔑417(3) — Workmen's Compensation Act—Review by Certiorari.

An award of the Industrial Commission under the Workmen's Compensation Act, unsupported by evidence, will be set aside by the courts, on certiorari, as involving an act in excess of jurisdiction.

3. Master and Servant 🔑405(1) — Workmen's Compensation Act—Award—Sufficiency of Evidence.

To justify an award under the Workmen's Compensation Act, there must be sufficient competent evidence to support every jurisdictional fact essentially involved in the application for compensation.

4. Master and Servant 🔑371—Workmen's Compensation Act—Injury "Arising Out of the Employment."

Under the Workmen's Compensation Act, an injury arises out of the employment when there exists a causal connection between the conditions under which the work is required to be performed and the resulting injury.

5. Master and Servant 🔑373—Workmen's Compensation Act—Injury "Arising Out of the Employment."

A school-teacher received an injury "arising out of the employment," within the Workmen's Compensation Act, where she was injured in shoving over a heavy desk not in its accustomed place to enable her to get a book from a case, required to facilitate her school work.

6. Master and Servant 🔑380—Workmen's Compensation Act—Imprudent Acts.

A female teacher was not as a matter of law guilty of "willful misconduct," within the Workmen's Compensation Act, in shoving aside a 458-pound desk to get a necessary book from a case, and injuring her spine.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases First and Second Series, Willful Misconduct.]

Proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Edith L. Hoag to obtain compensation for personal injuries, opposed by the Elk Grove Union High School District, the employer. Compensation was awarded. Certiorari by employer to review the award of the Industrial Accident Commission of the state of California, A. J. Pillsbury, Will J. French, and Meyer Lissner, as members constituting such commission. Award affirmed.

H. B. Bradford, Dist. Atty., and J. R. Hughes, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Sacramento (Stephen F. Otis, of Sacramento, of counsel), for petitioner. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondents.

HART, J. Upon the application of the petitioner, a writ of certiorari was issued by this court for the purpose of reviewing an award entered by the Industrial Accident Commission upon findings in favor of the applicant, Edith L. Hoag, that she had suffered physical injury while engaged in her employment as a teacher of the petitioner, and that such injury arose out of and in the course of such employment.

The principal or most important question submitted for decision here is whether the evidence does or does not support the finding that the accident whereby the applicant sustained the physical injury for which she was awarded compensation by the respondents arose out of and in the course of her employment as a teacher of the petitioner, Elk Grove Union High School.

[1-3] Preliminarily to the examination of the question thus propounded, it may be well to restate the following legal propositions which have been settled by the decisions, with respect to the powers of the Industrial Accident Commission under the law creating that body: (1) That the question whether the accident causing the injury complained of occurred or arose out of and in the course of the employment of the applicant, as well as the question whether the accident was or was not the direct result of the willful misconduct of the injured party, involve jurisdictional facts; (2) that an award by the commission which is unsupported by the evidence will be set aside by the courts, on certiorari, as involving an act in excess of the jurisdiction of the commission; (3) that to justify the upholding of an award, there must be sufficient competent evidence to support every jurisdictional fact essentially involved in the application for compensation. Com., 170 Cal. 793, 151 Pac. 421; Kimbol v. Indus. Acc. Com., 173 Cal. 351, 160 Pac. 150, L. R. A. 1917B, 595; Section 12, Workmen's Compensation, etc., Act; Stats. 1913, pp. 279, 283.

The uncontradicted testimony in this case reveals these facts: That the applicant, Miss Edith L. Hoag, had been employed by the trustees of the petitioner, Elk Grove Union High School District, as a teacher therein. Her duties were to teach three classes in history, one in English, one in cooking, and one in hygiene. The social activities of the students were carried on in the school building. These affairs consisted of literary and dramatic entertainments and dancing parties. When any of these social diversions was given, it was necessary, of course, to remove the desks, seats, tables, and other furniture used for the purposes of the school from their proper and accustomed positions in the room in which the entertainment was to take place. On the evening of the 2d day of June, 1916, a dancing party was held in one of the rooms of the school building. To obtain the most available space for that purpose, the desks, seats, etc., were moved to various parts of the room, some of them being placed in front of and against the cases in which the books used in the school were kept. These cases were in sections and were placed one on top of another and thus were made to form, practically, a single case.

On the opening of the school on the Monday morning following the occasion just referred to, the seats and desks were still in the positions in which they had been placed preparatory to the carrying on of the dance on the preceding Friday night. Miss Hoag arrived at the school building on said Monday something near half an hour prior to 9 o'clock a. m., at which hour the school was to open. She suggested to some of the boys who had gathered in the room that they proceed to replace the seats in their proper positions in the room. "They moved one," testified Miss Hoag. "I was superintending them and I saw that I did not know very much about it, * * * and then we decided to wait until Mr. Smith [principal of the school] came, and let him move the rest." Immediately after the boys had, upon her suggestion, ceased further attempt to replace the seats and desks, Miss Hoag, having occasion to examine a certain book preparatory to taking up her class that morning upon the subject treated by said book, went to the bookcase to procure the same. She discovered that she could not open the case and so procure the particular book she then desired without moving from in front of the case one of the sections of desk and seats which had on the previous Friday been placed there to facilitate the dancing party held in the room on that evening. She thereupon, unaided by any one, attempted to move the particular section which prevented her from opening the case, and for that purpose put her weight upon the desk and thus succeeded in moving it. Instantly she experienced a sudden, dull pain in her back, and from this she suffered for the remainder of the three weeks of the school term. Although she made no complaint of her injury to the principal of the school or to the trustees thereof at any time during the remainder of the term, she did complain of her pain to one of her associate teachers and a student at the school, and, after sustaining the injury, refrained from further active participation in the social affairs of the school in which, prior to the accident, she had quite uniformly taken a lively and prominent part.

The injury from which Miss Hoag suffered by reason of the accident was in the spine and technically described by Dr. Baldwin, a specialist in orthopedic surgery, as a "dislocation of a lumbar sacral articular joint" —that is, the displacement of one of the smaller joints between the sacrum and the lumbar vertebræ—an injury requiring the placing of the patient in a plaster of paris cast.

Miss Hoag testified that, on occasions when, for the purposes of the social functions of the school, the desks were removed from their proper places in the schoolroom, the students usually replaced them, sometimes assisted by Mr. Smith, the principal; that she never knew of the janitor performing that duty; that the teachers were not expected to remove the desks on such occasions, or having been moved, to replace them in their proper positions in the room; that it was no part of her work to move or replace the desks.

Robert Nicholls, a trustee of the petitioner, school district, and P. B. Smith, principal of the school at the time of the employment of Miss Hoag as a teacher, each testified that she was employed wholly as a teacher, and that the removal of the desks and the performance of like duties in connection with the management of the school were not included within the scope of her employment; that the school had a janitor whose duty it was to do all janitor work, "but this one act of moving the seats the janitor did not do because the seats were too heavy to move without help." There was other testimony given by the trustees and by the principal and one of the associate teachers of Miss Hoag, that it was not within the duties of the subordinate teachers to see that the desks, when removed from their accustomed places in the rooms, were replaced or to take a hand in moving them. In fact, it may be stated that the fact that no such duty was cast upon Miss Hoag or any of the teachers may be accepted as fully established in this case.

S. R. Gage, a trustee of the district, testified that, assisted by other members of the board of trustees, he weighed one of the sections of the seats and found it to weigh 458 pounds, and that all the other sections, save as to the number of seats of which they consisted (some consisting of five and others of seven seats), were in every respect precisely like the one weighed.

We have now given herein an abridged but accurate statement of all the facts brought to the attention of the accident board in this case.

[4] As to what we esteem the pivotal question in this case, viz. whether the injury, as the evidence shows it to have occurred, arose out of and in the course of the applicant's employment, it may well first be observed that, while, as has been well said in the cases, it is not easy to give a comprehensive definition of the words, "arising out of the employment," which shall actually embrace all cases within the act, and with precision exclude those not within its terms, it may nevertheless safely be laid down that an injury may be said to arise out of the employment when there exists a causal connection between the conditions under which the work is required to be performed and the resulting injury. Kiser's Workmen's Compensation Acts, pp. 73, 74, and cases cited in the footnotes. "A risk," continues the same author in the same connection, "is 'incidental to the employment' when it belongs to or is connected with what a workman has to do in fulfilling his contract of service. * * * There must be a causal connection between the employment and the injury, and the injury must be the rational consequence of some hazard connected with the employment." And at page 82 of the same work, the author announces this rule:

> "Where, at the time of the injury, the employé is engaged in a voluntary act not accepted by or known to his employer and outside of the duties for which he is employed, the injury cannot be said to be in the course of his employment."

[5, 6] The proposition here then is whether the evidence discloses a causal connection between the conditions under which the act culminating in the injury to the applicant was done and her employment as a teacher, or, in other words, was the act in the performance of which the injury was sustained reasonably within the contract of employment? We think the answer must be in the affirmative.

Recapitulating briefly and in a general way the facts as they were discovered by the undisputed evidence, we find the situation here to be this: That connected with the school and for its purpose a library of books appropriate and necessary to the profession of teaching is maintained in the school and located in a room adjacent to that in which the applicant instructed her classes; that, on the Friday preceding the Monday on which the accident occurred, the desks were, preparatory to the carrying on of a dancing party on that night, moved from their proper positions in the room, and some of them stacked up in tiers near and against the sectional cases constituting the bookcase; that, on the Monday morning following that social event, and before and at the time school was opened for the day, these desks had not been returned to their proper positions in the room, but were still stacked up against the case containing the books used by the teachers; that Miss Hoag was employed to teach some five or six branches of the school's curriculum, among which was medieval and modern history; that she had previously had assigned to the class in history certain references in medieval history which were to be taken up and recited that morning. She reached the schoolroom at about half past 8 o'clock a. m. on that day, and, desiring to refresh her memory upon the particular topics to which she was scheduled first to address her instruction that morning, went to the bookcase for the purpose of obtaining the book upon the text of which the lesson was to be founded. Finding the section of the case in which the book she desired and required for the prosecution of the work first in hand so barricaded by one of the sections of seats as to make it impossible for her to open the case and so procure the book, she put her weight on one end of the desk and thus succeeded in moving it from its position sufficiently to enable her to get into the case. In doing this act, she suffered the injury complained of. These are the simple facts of the case, and their mere statement is sufficient to demonstrate that the applicant not only did what she had a right to do, but did what her duty as a teacher in the school required her to do, if, as the evidence clearly warranted the accident board in inferring was true, the book she desired was necessary for her use that morning in properly and intelligently instructing the history class over which she had control. If, while in the act of opening the bookcase under the usual or normal conditions, her object being to procure a book necessary to be used by her in instructing her classes, she had suffered a physical injury, no one would be found to say that the injury would not be one arising out of and in the course of her employment. We can discern no difference in such a situation and the one presented here. The unusual or adverse conditions under which she attempted to perform that part of her duty were not of her own creation, and if, to discharge in a proper way her duty as a teacher, it was necessary, as was clearly so, for her to remove those unusual conditions, then as declared, she had the right and, indeed it was her duty, to do so, and the risk so taken, if any, was necessarily incidental to her employment. Therefore, in the act of removing the section of seats, her fault, if any, lay, not in the fact that she transcended the scope of her employment, but in the fact that she thus undertook a task, in furtherance of her duty, with which she found herself physically unable to cope. She might have acted imprudently in doing the act. She probably did. But a person is not to be denied compensation under the Compensation Act merely because his injury has been superinduced by mismanaging the duties of his employment, unless such mismanagement amounts to willful misconduct.

But counsel for the petitioner insist, and upon the proposition so urged they rest their entire argument against the validity of the applicant's claim that her injury was received out of and in the course of her employment, that, in moving the seats, Miss Hoag went beyond her duties and engaged in janitorial work—duties wholly foreign to her employment and which are peculiarly and exclusively those of a janitor. Counsel, according to our conception of the case as it was made by the proofs, have thus fallen into a misapprehension of the evidence. Of course, it is true and very clear that it was no part of the duty of the applicant to move the seats or desks about from one place to another in the schoolroom. But, manifestly, when injured, Miss Hoag was not so engaged. As the evidence plainly shows, she was, when hurt, merely endeavoring to move a section of seats, not to its proper or accustomed place in the room, but only a sufficient distance from its position against the bookcase to enable her to reach into the case and so procure a book required to facilitate her school work that morning. Some of the courts have gone so far as to hold that:

> "If a workman depart temporarily from his usual avocation to perform an act necessary to be done by some one for his master, he does not cease to be acting in the course of his employment." Hartz v. Hartford Faience Co., 90 Conn. 539, 97 Atl. 1020.

But in this case, as we have shown, we are not required to go that far. We may, and, as is obvious, do rest our conclusion upon the proposition that the evidence shows that the act in the performance of which Miss Hoag sustained the injury was necessary to the fulfillment of her contract of service.

Counsel for the petitioner place much reliance on the case of County of Modoc v. Indus. Acc. Com. et al., 163 Pac. 685 (decided by this court), as in support of their position that the act in the doing of which the applicant was injured was beyond the scope of her employment. They contend that between that case and this there is, as to the facts, a direct analogy. But it seems to us that the distinction between the two cases is marked and quite obvious. In the Modoc Case, the applicant, at the request of a fellow employé, engaged in doing an entirely different kind of work for the petitioner from that of the former, left the work which he was specially employed by the petitioner to do and temporarily took up the work of the said fellow employé. While thus temporarily engaged, the applicant met with an accident in which he sustained the physical injuries for which he claimed and was awarded by the accident board compensation. The award was properly annulled by this court. Thus readily it will be perceived that there is, with respect to the facts, no resemblance between that case and the present. And the facts in the case of Sherer & Co. v. Ind. Acc. Com. et al. (Sup.) 166 Pac. 318, also cited by the petitioner, are, in all essential particulars, similar to those existing in the case of the County of Modoc v. Ind. Acc. Co. et al., supra. Other cases cited by the petitioner may likewise be differentiated from the present case, but it is conceived to be unnecessary and unimportant to give them specific attention herein.

[7] The petitioner briefly urges the point that the award in this case cannot, in any event, be sustained, since it is patent, so the contention proceeds, in doing the act causing her injury, the applicant was guilty of willful misconduct. In Diestelhorst v. Indus. Acc. Com., etc., et al., 164 Pac. 44, this court, through Justice Burnett, exhaustively went into the question of what constitutes willful misconduct under the terms of the Workmen's Compensation Act. Many authorities are therein examined and numerous illustrations given of the application and nonapplication of the provision exempting an employer from liability because the injury for which compensation is sought is directly imputable to the willful misconduct of the claimant. We need not, therefore, enter into a discussion of that subject herein. It is enough to refer to that case and add that we perceive nothing in the act of the applicant herein, as said act is shown to have been done by the evidence, which would justify us in declaring, as a matter of law, that, in doing it, the applicant was guilty of willful misconduct. She did or attempted an act which, under the circumstances, was quite the natural thing for her or any other person in like situation to do. As seen, it was necessary for her to have a particular book for her school work that morning, said book was in the bookcase, and the case was so obstructed by the desks that she could not get into it and procure the book without the removal of said obstruction. It is doubtless true, as one of the trustees testified, that the section of seats which she attempted to remove was of great weight, so much so, indeed, as to make it impossible, or at the least inconvenient, for her to handle and move it; but it must be kept in mind that she only attempted to shove the section aside, and did not undertake to lift the entire section. It may further be suggested, as only an obvious proposition, however, that a person of ordinary strength might with comparative ease move from its resting place one end of a heavy article of considerable length and still be wholly unable to lift the entire article from its resting place at one and the same time. Miss Hoag evidently conceived that she was of sufficient strength, by a shoving movement, and the application of whatever physical force she possessed, to shift the section away from the bookcase sufficiently to enable her to open it and procure the book, but she doubtless either overestimated her own strength or underestimated the ponderousness of the section, it not being shown that she had previous knowledge of either the actual or approximate weight of the article. As above suggested, in doing or attempting to do the act, she might have been guilty of a want of good judgment. She might, indeed, have been somewhat negligent in that she omitted to make some investigation, preliminarily to attempting to move the section, to ascertain whether she was capable of handling it without exposing herself to a dangerous physical risk; but, even so, under the evidence as it appears in this record, it would still be giving free rein to one's imagination to hold that her act amounted to willful misconduct within the meaning or contemplation of the Compensation Act.

Our conclusion is that the findings upon which the award was planted are supported by the proofs, and, accordingly, the award is affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; BURNETT, J.

PEOPLE v. BILLINGS. (Cr. 667.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Sept. 6, 1917. On Petition for Rehearing, Oct. 2, 1917. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 5, 1917.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑1159(3) — APPEAL — SCOPE OF REVIEW.

On appeal from a conviction upon conflicting evidence, the jury's determination as to the sufficiency of the evidence cannot be reviewed, in the absence of showing of the utter incredibility of the supporting evidence.

2. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑338(1)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

The relevancy of proffered proof in a criminal case depends upon whether it tends to sustain a legitimate hypothesis of the guilt of the defendant, and an incidental fact is relative to the main fact in issue when, in accord with the ordinary course of events and common experience, the existence of the incidental fact, standing alone or when considered in connection with other established facts, tends to make the main fact in issue certain, but it is not necessary that it should bear directly upon the main fact in issue.

3. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑404(3)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

In a prosecution for homicide by setting a bomb, it was proper to admit evidence of identification of cartridges picked up near the scene of and shortly after the explosion, and, when so identified, to admit such cartridges in evidence.

4. HOMICIDE 🔑174(6) — EVIDENCE — ADMISSIBILITY.

Evidence of cartridges being found in defendant's room of similar character and caliber to those found in and about the bodies of the victims was admissible.

5. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑404(3)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

Though no ball bearings were found in the bodies of the victims, ball bearings found about the place of the explosion, which apparently constituted a part of the bomb, were admissible.

6. HOMICIDE 🔑338(2) — HARMLESS ERROR — EVIDENCE.

Accused was not prejudiced by introduction in evidence of a pistol found in his room, even if such evidence was improper.

7. WITNESSES 🔑376 — EXAMINATION — BIAS OR INTEREST.

It was not error to allow the state to show that its principal witness shortly after the explosion had made statements to the same effect as he made on trial, where the accused had attempted to show that such testimony was the creature of corruption and of recent fabrication.

8. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑1170½(5) — HARMLESS ERROR—EVIDENCE—BIAS OF WITNESS—ADMISSIONS.

Where the bias of a witness testifying to the alibi of a codefendant was admitted, there was no prejudicial error in permitting cross-examination which merely showed the possibility of bias, and so went no farther than the admission.

9. HOMICIDE 🔑338(3) — HARMLESS ERROR — EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

There was no prejudice in allowing a police officer to state that he saw two of the defendants in another city three years before shake hands and hold a conversation, where accused admitted long-standing acquaintance.

10. HOMICIDE 🔑305—INSTRUCTIONS—"PRINCIPALS" AND ACCESSORIES.

An instruction that though another than defendant feloniously placed the bomb yet they should convict if defendant aided and abetted such person, was not antagonistic to instruction that it was the theory of the prosecution that defendant placed the bomb, where the evidence warranted a finding that defendant either personally placed it or aided the one who did, in view of Pen. Code, §§ 31 and 971, providing that all persons concerned in the commission of a crime, whether it be felony or misdemeanor, and whether they directly commit the act constituting the offense, or aid and abet in its commission, or not being present, have advised and encouraged its commission * * * are principals in any crime so committed.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Principal.]

11. Criminal Law ⚷720(9)—Trial—Argument of Counsel.

In a prosecution for homicide it was not improper for the prosecuting attorney to make statements upon their face purporting to be his deduction, made apparently in good faith from the evidence adduced at the trial.

12. Criminal Law ⚷1037(1) — Appeal — Preservation of Exceptions.

Error assigned to the statement of the district attorney that "it was easy to see why accused objected to the state's showing the nature of a previous conviction," was waived by failure to assign it as misconduct in the trial court.

13. Criminal Law ⚷722(2)—Trial—Argument of Counsel.

In prosecution for murder by setting a bomb, it was not misconduct for the district attorney to compare defendant's conduct while testifying to that of a hyena, and describe it as the cowardliest and most disliked animal in the world.

14. Criminal Law ⚷730(3)—Trial—Conduct of Counsel—Cure of Errors.

Where testimony for the state was refused, whereupon the district attorney offered to show that defendant had said that he was skilled in the making of bombs and had thrown them for hire, it was not error to refuse a request to admonish the jury to disregard such statement, where the court instructed that the jury were to consider only evidence admitted, and to disregard every impression or idea suggested by counsel to which objections were sustained.

15. Criminal Law ⚷938(1)—New Trial—Grounds—Newly Discovered Evidence—Cumulative Evidence.

A new trial will not be granted upon a showing of evidence which is merely cumulative, and tends to do no more than contradict some of the witnesses for the state.

On Petition for Rehearing.

16. Homicide ⚷236(1) — Evidence—Sufficiency.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction of the offense of homicide by setting a bomb.

17. Criminal Law ⚷561(2)—Quantum of Evidence.

The mere fact that there is a conflict in evidence in a prosecution for homicide does not establish that there are two hypotheses, one consistent with guilt and the other with innocence, so as to create a reasonable doubt.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

Warren K. Billings was convicted of murder, and from the judgment and order denying motion for new trial he appeals. Affirmed. On petition for rehearing, petition denied.

Maxwell McNutt, of San Francisco, Jas. G. Lawlor, and E. H. Lomasney, of San Francisco, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. Near the hour of 2 p. m. on the afternoon of July 22, 1916, while a preparedness parade, formed for the purpose of displaying and developing the patriotic pride and spirit of the people of San Francisco, was passing at or about the intersection of Steuart and Market streets in that city, an explosion occurred at that point which resulted in the death of several persons and the wounding of two score more who were viewing the parade.

The defendant Billings and several other persons were subsequently jointly indicted and charged with the crime of murder. The defendant Billings was separately tried. He was convicted of the crime charged, and the penalty therefor, life imprisonment, was fixed by the jury.

After having reviewed the evidence adduced upon the whole case, which was wholly circumstantial, we are constrained to say that the contention of counsel for the defendant that the evidence does not sustain the verdict and judgment is not well taken, for it is rested solely upon a discussion of the weight of the evidence.

The contradictions and inconsistencies, if any, existing in the proof proffered and received in support of the people's case created no more than a conflict in the evidence, and it was the peculiar province of the jury, when weighing the evidence, to reconcile such contradictions and inconsistencies with what they conscientiously believed to be the truth as developed by the evidence adduced upon the whole case.

[1] It is the settled rule that the weight to be given to a conflict in the evidence—whether it appears in the case of the people or is made manifest by the proof proffered to support the defense—is a question to be determined in the first instance by the jury and, in the absence of a showing of its inherent improbability and utter incredibility, the determination of the jury is as matter of law conclusive upon this court. In other words, unless the evidence upon which a conviction rests appears to be so radically improbable as to amount to no evidence at all, we are not permitted to examine it merely to determine the preponderance of its probabilities.

The argument of counsel for the defendant made to us upon this phase of the case is doubtless but a repetition of his argument made to the jury at the trial of the case, but, needless to say, the sufficiency of the evidence in the presence of a conflict therein to support the verdict may not be tested on appeal by the weight which the members of this court might have given to it had they been sitting as jurors on the trial of the case. Measured by the rule under consideration we cannot say that the evidence does not support the verdict and judgment.

It was the theory of the prosecution that the explosion which caused the death of the deceased person, for whose murder the defendant was being tried, resulted from the discharge by a clock device of a shrapnel dynamite bomb which, concealed and carried in a suit case, was deposited by the defendant Billings on the sidewalk at the place of, and shortly before, the explosion. Two ball bearings of the kind used in automobiles and handfuls of loaded cartridges of varying calibers were picked up by bystanders immediately after the explosion, and bullets of varying caliber were found in the bodies of several victims of the explosion.

As circumstances tending to show the defendant's connection with the construction of the bomb, the prosecution offered, and the trial court permitted in evidence, proof of the following facts: That a pistol loaded with certain caliber cartridges and a large quantity of loose loaded cartridges of varying caliber, many of which corresponded in caliber with the bullets found in the bodies of the victims of the explosion, together with two automobile ball bearings, differing however in size from those found at the scene of the explosion, were discovered in the room of the defendant shortly after he was arrested.

[2] The objection made to this evidence, it seems to us, was directed merely against its weight. The relevancy of proffered proof in a criminal case depends upon whether or not it tends to sustain a legitimate hypothesis of the guilt of the defendant and, generally speaking, an incidental fact is relative to the main fact in issue when, in accord with the ordinary course of events and common experience, the existence of the incidental fact, standing alone or when considered in connection with other established facts, tends in some degree to make the main fact in issue certain. It is not necessary that such incidental fact should bear directly upon the main fact in issue, for it will suffice as a pertinent piece of proof if it can be said to constitute a link, however small, in the chain of evidence, and tends thereby to establish the existence of the main fact in issue. Moody v. Peirano, 4 Cal. App. 411, 88 Pac. 380.

[3] Hence any fact is relevant evidence which naturally tends to show the means and method employed in the commission of a crime, and therefore it was proper in the present case to admit evidence of the identification of the cartridges picked up near the scene of, and shortly after, the explosion and, having been so identified, they were rightfully admitted in evidence. 1 Michie on Homicide, pp. 856, 857.

[4] The fact that the cartridges found in the room of the defendant after the commission of the crime were of the same character and caliber of those found in the bodies of the victims of the explosion was admissible as tending in a measure to show that the defendant had the means at hand to commit the crime charged against him, in the manner and by the means which it was shown were employed to commit the crime. 1 Michie on Homicide, pp. 851, 855, 857, 859; 21 Cyc. 945.

[5] While it is true that no ball bearings were found in the bodies of the victims of the explosion, nevertheless the ball bearings admitted in evidence were found, immediately after the explosion, in the midst of other things which, when considered in connection with all of the circumstances shown in evidence concerning the character of the explosion and its effects, apparently constituted a part of the bomb and were therefore admissible as tending in some degree to show what were the constituent elements of the bomb. In this connection it may be noted that:

> "The tendency of modern decisions is to admit any evidence which may have a tendency to illustrate or throw any light on the transaction in controversy, or give any weight in determining the issue, leaving the strength of such testimony or the amount of such weight to be determined by the jury." Moody v. Peirano, supra.

[6] The presence in evidence of the pistol found in the defendant's room came in as a mere incident to the testimony which showed the result of the search of defendant's room and, conceding that it was improperly admitted in evidence, we cannot conceive how it could have prejudiced the defendant.

[7] The trial court did not err in its ruling permitting the prosecution to show in evidence that one McDonald, its chief witness, had made statements to several persons shortly after the explosion which were in substantial accord with his testimony given at the trial of the case. This proof was not proffered by the prosecution, nor permitted by the trial court, upon the theory, as counsel for the defendant contends, for the purpose of corroborating the testimony of the witness. The record shows that the evidence in question was offered and received for the purpose of showing that the testimony of the witness McDonald was consistent with statements made by him at a time when he was neither thought of, nor sought for, as a witness for the people. Its tendency was to rebut the inference which the defense sought to deduce from impeaching evidence, to the effect that the testimony of the witness as given at the trial was of recent fabrication and the creature of corruption, and therefore was rightly received. Comm. v. Jenkins, 10 Gray (Mass.) 485; Yarbrough v. State, 105 Ala. 43, 16 South. 758; Cal. Electric Light Co. v. Cal., etc., Co., 145 Cal. 124, 78 Pac. 372; Wharton's Criminal Evidence (10th Ed.) § 492; Wigmore on Evidence, §§ 1129, 1130.

Counsel for the defendant has not directed our attention to any particular portion of the record in support of his contention that the defendant, when testifying as a witness in his own behalf, was prevented by objection or otherwise from giving an account of the movements of his codefendants on the day of the explosion. Ordinarily this would suffice to warrant us in ignoring the contention, but it may not be amiss to say that an independent investigation of the record discloses no basis for the contention, nor for the further contention that the trial court erred in refusing to permit the defendant to show all of the facts and circumstances connected with the meeting of the defendant and his codefendant Mooney, which a witness for the prosecution testified occurred some three days prior to the explosion.

[8] Complaint is made of the cross-examination of Mrs. Belle Hammerberg, a witness for the defense, whose testimony in substance was that the codefendants Thomas Mooney and his wife, Mrs. Rena Mooney, were on the roof of a building situated a considerable distance from the scene of the explosion during the entire afternoon of the day of the preparedness parade. Substantially stated, the cross-examination of the witness consisted of an attempt to develop and diclose her interest in and bias for the defendants. It is now insisted that inasmuch as the witness had previously declared, and counsel for the defense had admitted, that she was greatly interested in the defendants, the prosecution was precluded from probing for the motives of her bias, and, in addition, that the real purpose of the cross-examination in the particular stated was to prejudice the jury against the defendant by creating the impression that the witness was suppressing evidence which, if revealed, would connect the defendants Mooney and Billings with the explosion. The cross-examination complained of resulted in showing nothing more than that the witness was interested in the defense, and that she had received "some papers" or a "parcel of papers" from Mrs. Rena Mooney some time during the early part of the month of May or June.

Conceding it to be the general rule that when the interest of a witness in the result of a case is developed or admitted, as was done in the present case, the cross-examination cannot be legitimately continued for the purpose of showing the motive for such interest, nevertheless we are not prepared to say that the facts developed upon such cross-examination resulted in prejudice to the defendant, for it will be noted that the district attorney failed in his avowed purpose to show that the witness had concealed the papers referred to and, further, that neither the character of nor the contents of those papers were disclosed by the cross-examination. In fact, the only hint of the character of their contents is to be found in the admission of counsel for the defendant, made during the course of an argument upon an objection to the cross-examination, that they related "to certain matters of correspondence affecting the car strike." Conceding that this admission was provoked by the exigencies of the situation, nevertheless, neither it nor the cross-examination itself revealed the particular car strike referred to, nor the details of the correspondence. It will thus be seen that the cross-examination complained of resulted in showing nothing beyond the fact that the witness was perhaps biased in favor of the defense, which fact was admitted by her and by counsel for the defendant and, consequently, it cannot be said that the error of the ruling permitting such cross-examination resulted in any prejudice to the defendant.

[9] No prejudice resulted from the ruling of the court permitting police officer Kramer, a witness for the prosecution, to testify that on one occasion during the year 1913 he saw the defendant Billings in the city of Sacramento shake hands with and hold a conversation with the defendant Mooney. The avowed purpose of this evidence was to show a long-standing acquaintance between the two men. Whether that fact had any tendency to corroborate the testimony of the witness McDonald to the effect that he saw the defendant and Mooney together at the scene of the explosion and shortly prior thereto is of but little, if of any, consequence, when considered in conjunction with the fact that counsel for the defendant announced in open court that "we concede that acquaintance long before and since that time."

Counsel for the defendant complains of and devotes a page of his brief to the alleged refusal of the trial court to give a certain requested instruction to the jury, but the record does not show that the instruction in question was not given. Moreover, the subject-matter of the requested instruction was sufficiently covered in the charge of the court.

[10] During the course of its charge the trial court instructed the jury to the effect that, even though the jury should find that some person other than the defendant had feloniously placed the bomb at the scene of the explosion which resulted in the killing of the deceased, but further found that the defendant willfully and unlawfully aided and abetted such person and assisted him to obtain, manufacture, or explode said bomb, then the defendant Billings was a principal in the commission of the crime.

This instruction is assailed and asserted to be erroneous upon the ground that it did not limit, nor attempt to limit, the jury to a finding that the defendant personally performed the physical act of depositing the bomb at the place where the crime was committed. This contention is made and based upon the theory that the jury should have been so limited, because the trial court had previously instructed them to the effect that it was the theory of the prosecution that a bomb was deposited by the defendant Billings at the place and with the intent and purpose charged in the indictment and, because of this, it is argued that the defendant could not be found guilty in the absence of evidence warranting a finding that he had personally placed the bomb "at the scene of the explosion, and hence murdered the deceased by direct means."

These instructions, in our opinion, were pertinent to the evidence adduced upon the whole case, which warranted the jury in its finding, implied from the verdict, that the defendant either personally placed the bomb at the scene of the explosion or aided and abetted the person who did. In this view of the evidence the instructions immediately under consideration were not antagonistic to and destructive of one another, for it is the law that:

> "All persons concerned in the commission of a crime, whether it be a felony or misdemeanor, and whether they directly commit the act constituting the offense, or aid and abet in its commission, or not being present, have advised and encouraged its commission, * * * are principals in any crime so committed." Pen. Code, §§ 31, 971.

[11] With reference to those portions of the argument of the district attorney to the jury which were protested and assigned in the court below as misconduct, coupled with a request for an appropriate admonition to the jury, the record shows that the first assignment related in part to statements of the district attorney which upon their face purport to be his deductions, made apparently in good faith from the evidence adduced at the trial. This was legitimate argument and could not properly be made the basis of an assignment of misconduct.

[12] The remaining portions of the district attorney's argument covered by the first assignment of misconduct relate to his assertion that "the reason why they (the defense) objected to us showing the particular felony he (the defendant) has been convicted of is obvious." The record, however, does not show that this statement was assigned as misconduct in the court below, and therefore the misconduct, if any, might well be deemed to have been waived. But, assuming that there was no waiver, and conceding the impropriety of the argument in the particular stated, it is difficult to conceive how the defendant could be prejudiced thereby in the face of the fact admitted by the defendant, while testifying as a witness in his own behalf, to the effect that he had suffered a felonious conviction in this state for carrying explosives.

[13] The second assignment of misconduct has reference to the fact that the district attorney, in his argument, asserted in effect that the defendant, while testifying, laughed like a hyena and apparently considered the charge against him a joke, and then proceeded to draw a comparison between the perpetrator of the crime and a hyena—"the cowardliest and most disliked animal in the world. * * *" Defendant's demeanor, while testifying as a witness, was a proper subject for the jury's consideration and while the record, as a matter of course, does not disclose what that demeanor was, nevertheless we are not permitted to assume that it was willfully or at all misrepresented by the district attorney. His comparison of the defendant's courage with that of a hyena, based as it was upon the assumption that the evidence showed him to be the perpetrator of the crime, obviously was peculiarly pertinent and therefore permissible, even though it did involve a denunciation of the defendant as the perpetrator of the crime, for as was said in the case of People v. Glaze, 139 Cal. 154, 72 Pac. 965:

> "A defendant on trial for murder is not entitled as of right to be spoken of as if he were an innocent man in an argument by the officer who is endeavoring to show that the evidence proves his guilt."

[14] Complaint is made of the failure of the trial court, upon request, to admonish the jury to disregard statements made by the district attorney when making an offer to prove by a witness present in the courtroom that the defendant had said that he was skilled in the making of bombs and had thrown them for hire. The objection to this offer was sustained, and, without regard to whether or not the proffered proof was relevant and competent, the district attorney was privileged, in good faith, to state what he expected to prove. In so far as the record shows, the offer in question was not made in bad faith and, it not appearing that the district attorney was guilty of pernicious and persistent misconduct throughout the trial of the case, we are of the opinion that the request for an admonition to the jury to disregard any suggestions contained in the offer was sufficiently complied with in the charge of the court, which, in part, instructed the jury that under their oaths they were "to take into consideration only such evidence as had been admitted by the court, and * * * disregard and discard * * * every impression or idea suggested by questions asked by counsel which were objected to, and to which objections were sustained."

[15] It is insisted that the trial court erred in denying the defendant's motion for a new trial grounded, in part, upon alleged newly discovered evidence. The alleged newly discovered evidence offered upon the hearing in support of the motion was, in our opinion, merely cumulative, and tended to do no more than contradict some of the witnesses who had testified for the People upon the trial of the case. It is a well-settled rule of law that newly discovered evidence of that character will not suffice to warrant the granting of a new trial.

Concluding this discussion of each and every point made in support of the appeal, we are constrained to say that a perusal of the record before us which contains the argument of counsel for defendant compels the conclusion that the defendant was accorded a fair trial before a fair judge and a fair jury, and this conclusion is confirmed by the concession of counsel for the defendant made in his closing argument to the jury wherein he said:

"We have had a fair trial—'We've had our trial, and must needs say a noble one.' We've had our trial and we proclaim to the world that it has been a fair and noble one. This jury was empanelled by a member of the district attorney's staff with absolute fairness and impartiality—a man who asked only what we asked, and only what we ask now—justice!"

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

On Petition for Rehearing.

In their petition for rehearing of this cause, appellant's counsel repeat their arguments considered and passed upon in the opinion delivered in this case. Their petition in this respect presents nothing new. The propositions which they readvance were given careful consideration, and this court sees no reason to change the views which it has expressed upon them.

Concerning two matters, however, the petition makes a complaint which calls for response. The first of these is that appellant has contended that there is a "complete insufficiency of the evidence, admitting its entire truth for the purpose of the argument, to sustain a verdict of guilty of murder." It is said that this contention requires of this court something more than a declaration that the evidence is sufficient—it demands a presentation of the evidence which this court declares to be sufficient. As appellant's counsel thus urgently insist upon a statement of this evidence, it will be given.

The prosecution introduced evidence showing that a high explosive concealed in a suit case was, on the occasion of the preparedness parade in San Francisco, placed against a building at the southwest corner of Steuart and Market streets, about 20 feet from the corner of Market. The junction of Market and Steuart streets is near the ferry building at the foot of Market street. On Steuart street and other similar connecting streets at the lower end of Market street the units of the parade were to form and enter the parade which was programmed to proceed out Market street. Such a unit of the parade was standing on Steuart street. The sidewalks were crowded with innocent spectators. This infernal machine was so constructed that by a clock-work device it would explode at a given time. The time when this explosion actually took place was six minutes after 2 p. m. The force of the explosion was terrific. Men were blown from their horses and people "fell to the ground like matches." Nine or ten people lost their lives. Nearly fifty others were mutilated and mangled. The devilish ingenuity which constructed this infernal machine did not rest content with placing in it the explosive alone. It was filled with pistol cartridges, with pieces of iron pipe, and with steel balls like unto the ball bearings of automobiles. From the débris of the explosion and from the bodies of the dead and wounded many of these articles were discovered and introduced in evidence. So also were introduced in evidence bits of brown papier-maché from which cheap suit cases are made, and, in the language of appellant's counsel, "some clasps or locks or other things affecting the suit case." That this destruction of life and property was criminally caused by the criminal means indicated, the evidence leaves in not the slightest doubt.

The crime having thus been established, the next inquiry is, does the evidence sufficiently connect this defendant with the crime as the perpetrator or one of the perpetrators thereof? The fact that the suit case which exploded was placed by this defendant does not rest upon circumstantial evidence alone. A witness testifies directly to having seen the defendant with the suit case in his hand at about 10 minutes before 2 o'clock at Steuart and Market streets. The defendant was looking about him so that the witness thought that he had either stolen the suit case or was playing a joke. He was joined by another man at the door of the saloon. They looked at their watches. They looked at the clock on the nearby ferry building tower, and the defendant disappeared in the crowd on Steuart street. Another witness saw the defendant a few minutes later without a suit case near the corner of Mission and Steuart streets, less than one block away from the spot where the suit case had been placed. He heard the explosion. After this, and to prevent a panic, "the band was started up and played 'the colors'; and everybody took their hats off but the defendant and the man that was with him. A man in the crowd says, 'Take your hat off.' He paid no attention but he turned around and walked away." Numerous other witnesses saw this defendant with this suit case elsewhere in San Francisco about or after half past 1, and shortly before his presence at Steuart and Market streets. In particular he was seen with this suit case at 721 Market street, less than four-fifths of a mile distant from the junction of Steuart and Market streets. He was there seen by Herbert Wade, principal of a school in Hawaii, by Earl Moore, a police officer, by Peter Vidovich, a retired business man, by Mrs. Nellie Edeau, a dressmaker, and by Miss Sadie Edeau, her daughter. Mrs. Edeau further testifies that she saw him standing with a woman and a man, the defendant holding the suit case in his right hand and saying in an excited tone, "We have to make the ferry before two o'clock." Miss Estelle Smith, an attendant in a dentist office in the building at 721 Market street, saw and accosted the defendant just outside of the dental rooms. The defendant asked permission to go on the roof to take pictures, saying that he represented a San Francisco newspaper, the Chronicle. He looked worried and ill and said that the heat had made him sick. She went to pick up the suit case for him and he said, "My God, don't touch that." She jumped and said, "You scared me;" and he replied, "You will strain the lens in my camera." As he seemed distressed she asked him to go into the dental waiting room and sit down and he replied, "I can't take advantage of your kindness. I have friends waiting for me down stairs." Another witness, Rominger, testified that he assisted this defendant with this suit case to the roof of the building. The suit case was very heavy, weighing as much as 30 pounds. There was no photographer's outfit with the case—neither kodak nor tripod.

When the defendant was arrested his room was searched, and in his room was found a can of bullets and pistol cartridges like those placed in the infernal machine. Automobile ball bearings were also found in his room. The defendant admitted that this can and its contents were his property, and said that he "used them when it was thought necessary." Asked where he bought them, he said he did not remember.

More than this, it was proved that the defendant had suffered conviction and imprisonment in the courts of California for a felony of similar character, though resulting in no such direful consequences as the felony for which he was here put upon trial. He was convicted of carrying high explosives on a street car and suffered imprisonment for two years in the state penitentiary at Folsom. Further, it was shown that he had dynamite in his possession in the city of Sacramento, and after his arrest, when asked about it, said that he would not talk until he had seen his attorney. And, finally, the defense amounted to this: The defendant offered his own unsupported declaration against the testimony of all of these witnesses, that he never had a suit case in his possession upon the day of the parade, and also his own unsupported declaration, as against the testimony of these witnesses, that he was neither at nor in the neighborhood of 721 Market street, nor at nor in the neighborhood of Market and Steuart streets upon that day. He gives an account of his rambles about the city from about 1:15 p. m., when he left his lodging house, till about 3 p. m., when he entered a jitney, but during all that intervening time there is not one witness who testifies that he saw the defendant where the defendant says he was, so that the alibi, as against the positive and direct statement of disinterested witnesses, rests wholly upon the testimony of the defendant alone.

[16] To sum up, then, we agree with appellant's counsel in their first judgment on the case when they "proclaimed to the world" that the trial "had been a fair and noble one," and we wholly agree with the declaration of the learned Attorney General that "the evidence overwhelmingly establishes the guilt of the defendant."

[17] The second proposition which appellant's counsel urge upon our attention as having been omitted from the consideration of the case in the opinion handed down is, to quote their own language, the following:

> "The point was made by us that the evidence in this case showed that there were two hypotheses, one consistent with guilt and the other reasonably consistent with innocence, and that hence a reasonable doubt arose as a matter of law, and we were accordingly entitled to a reversal."

In plain English, this seems to mean that if A. testifies that he saw B. shoot C., and B. testifies that he was not at the place of the shooting, there necessarily arises "two hypotheses, one consistent with guilt and the other reasonably consistent with innocence," and therefore every defendant who offers evidence of an alibi must go free. The simple statement of the proposition shows its absolute unsoundness. But in addition to this, the law has disposed of this proposition against appellant's position in so many cases that even to cite them would seem to be superfluous. However, a few may be mentioned:

> "When there is evidence, therefore, to sustain the verdict, a question of law cannot arise." People v. Fitzgerald, 138 Cal. 40, 70 Pac. 1015.
> "If we can find any evidence in the record from which a rational inference might be drawn that defendant fired the fatal shot, our inquiry as to this feature can go no further." People v. Bond, 13 Cal. App. 182, 109 Pac. 154.
> "If the evidence which bears against the defendant, considered by itself, and without regard to conflicting evidence, is sufficient to support the verdict, the question ceases to be one of law * * * and becomes one of fact upon which the decision of the jury and the trial court is final and conclusive." People v. Emerson, 130 Cal. 563, 62 Pac. 1069.
> "Undoubtedly the defendant's own story exculpates him, but it was for the jury to say whether or not that story should be believed. The evidence was therefore sufficient to justify the verdict." People v. Rongo, 169 Cal. 75, 145 Pac. 1019.

The evidence adduced upon behalf of the people, having been accepted as the truth by a jury impanelled, as counsel for the appellant concedes, "with absolute fairness and impartiality," was sufficient in itself to support the verdict.

The petition for a rehearing is denied.

TOWNSEND v. KEITH.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Sept. 6, 1917.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑706(6)—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE—DIRECTING VERDICT.

When, in an action for personal injuries in collision with an automobile, the evidence was conflicting as to the cause of the collision and the conduct of the parties, it was proper to refuse to direct verdict for defendant.

2. DAMAGES 🔑166(1)—PERSONAL INJURIES—MATERIALTY.

In an action for injuries in collision with an automobile, where plaintiff's testimony showed plainly that his return to the hospital for a second time was for further treatment of the injuries he had sustained in the collision, and not for treatment for any intervening illness or injuries, plaintiff's testimony as to whether or not he had returned to the hospital a second time under the direction of the physician who was tending him was admissible.

3. EVIDENCE 🔑471(13) — OPINION — BEST SOURCE OF KNOWLEDGE.

Plaintiff's testimony as to whether, since the accident, he had had the use of the injured leg as he had had before was admissible; if the question called for opinion, it called for evidence of a material fact from the best source of knowledge.

4. DAMAGES 🔑101 — PERSONAL INJURIES — REASONABLE VALUE OF MEDICAL AND HOSPITAL SERVICE.

The correct measure of damage for personal injuries is the necessary and reasonable value of medical and hospital services rendered to plaintiff, rather than the amount paid for such services.

5. DAMAGES 🔑177 — PERSONAL INJURIES — VALUE OF MEDICAL SERVICES—EVIDENCE.

In an action for personal injuries, plaintiff's testimony as to what bills he had incurred on account of services rendered by his physician and for hospital treatment was admissible, being evidence of the reasonable value of the services.

6. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1064(1)—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTION.

Where the reasonableness of the medical and hospital expenses which plaintiff had incurred was not disputed by defendant on trial, the failure of the charge to limit the jury's finding to their reasonable value was not error prejudicial to defendant.

7. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑706(4) — INJURIES ON STREET — MATERIALITY OF EVIDENCE.

The court properly refused to permit plaintiff to be questioned as to what he had said concerning the damage done to defendant's automobile by the collision, the fact only, and not what plaintiff had said, being material.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Wm. H. Waste, Judge.

Action by William C. Townsend against Charles W. Keith. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Cary Howard, of Oakland, for appellant. Johnson & Shaw, of Oakland, for respondent.

LENNON, P. J. In this action the plaintiff sought and secured a judgment in the sum of $2,000 as damages for personal injuries which he sustained while riding a motorcycle which collided with an automobile, driven by the defendant in a direction opposite to that which the plaintiff was driving.

[1] The contention of counsel for the defendant that the evidence neither warranted the verdict nor supports the judgment is founded entirely upon a discussion of the weight of the evidence, and therefore must fail when confronted by a record which shows a substantial conflict in the evidence adduced by the whole case concerning the cause of the collision and the conduct of the parties thereto at the time thereof. The record shows that plaintiff rested his case upon substantial evidence which legally tended to support his cause of action, and therefore defendant's motion for a nonsuit was properly denied.

[2] The trial court did not err when it overruled the objection of the defendant to the question propounded to the plaintiff as a witness, which inquired whether or not he had returned to the hospital a second time under the direction of the physician who was attending him. A consideration of the plaintiff's testimony, immediately preceding the question objected to, shows plainly that the return of the plaintiff to the hospital for a second time was for further treatment of the injuries which he had sustained as the result of the collision, and not for treatment for any intervening illness or injuries.

[3] Equally without merit was the objection to the question propounded to plaintiff, namely: "Since the accident, have you had the use of the injured leg as you had before?" Assuming that the question called for the opinion of the witness, nevertheless it called for evidence of a material fact, which came from the best source of knowledge.

[4, 5] The court did not err in overruling defendant's objection to the question asked of plaintiff as to what bills he had incurred on account of services rendered by his physicians and for hospital treatment. While the correct measure of damage is the necessary and reasonable value of the services rendered, rather than the amount which may have been paid for such services, nevertheless the amount paid for the services is some evidence as to their reasonable value.

[6] The expenses incurred amount to approximately $200; i. e., $150 for physician, $10 for a specialist, $32 hospital bill, and $30 or $40 for medicines. This, on its face, does not seem to be unreasonable. The reasonableness of the expenses which plaintiff had incurred was not disputed by defendant on the trial, and therefore the failure of the trial court's charge to the jury to limit its finding to the reasonable value of the expenses incurred was not an error which prejudiced the defendant. Melone v. Sierra Ry. Co., 151 Cal. 113, 91 Pac. 522.

[7] There was no error in the ruling of the trial court refusing to permit the plaintiff to be questioned as to what he had said concerning the damage done to the defendant's automobile by the collision. The purpose of the question, it is claimed, was to show the condition of the defendant's automobile after the collision, which, it is argued, would have illustrated the force of the angle of contact, as well as the rate of speed and the probable direction of the colliding machines. This being the only purpose of the question, it was properly objected to, because it was only material to know what the fact was, and not what the plaintiff may have said it was. Moreover, the defendant had testified, prior to the asking of the question objected to, fully and in detail, to the condition of his automobile after the collision, and this testimony remained uncontradicted.

The remaining assignments of error have less merit than those which we have just discussed.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. WARNER. (Cr. 399.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 8, 1917.)

Appeal from Superior Court, Modoc County; Clarence A. Raker, Judge.

George Warner was convicted of an offense, and he appeals. Reversed.

Jamison & Wylie, of Alturas, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BURNETT, J. This case is identical in its facts with the case of People v. Lensen, 167 Pac. 406, recently decided by this court, and the same points are made upon this appeal for a reversal of the judgment and order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. An extended opinion, therefore, becomes unnecessary.

Upon the authority of the Lensen Case, the judgment and order are reversed.

FRASER v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. (Civ. 2221.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Sept. 24, 1917.)

Petition of Malcolm Fraser against the Industrial Accident Commission and another for writ of review. Writ denied.

William E. Billings, of San Francisco, and Hankins & Hankins, for petitioner. Warren H. Pillsbury, of Oakland, for respondent Industrial Accident Commission. Watt, Thornton & Watt, of San Francisco, for respondent Royal Indemnity Co.

PER CURIAM. The primary point presented by this petition, and which induced the issuance of the writ, was the allegation that the new evidence, which was received by the commission pursuant to stipulation, was not rebutted by the petitioner, because he was not given an opportunity to do so. Upon oral argument it is conceded that there is nothing in that point, so that is now out of the case.

The only remaining contention is the alleged insufficiency of the evidence to support the finding of the commission. A perusal of the record convinces us that the evidence in this respect is sufficient.

The writ is therefore denied.

In re HARTENBOWER'S ESTATE.

WEISS et al. v. HARTENBOWER.

(L. A. 5200.)

1. WILLS 🔑577—CONSTRUCTION—INTENT—COMMUNITY PROPERTY.

A clause in a will, "I hereby admit, state and declare that all my estate is community property. * * * Realizing that she is entitled to a full one-half of all of said estate, I intentionally make no further provision for her"—will be held to show an intention to give his wife half the estate, whether community property or not.

2. EVIDENCE 🔑80(1)—PRESUMPTIONS—FOREIGN STATUTE—COMMUNITY PROPERTY.

In the absence of any other showing in the record, it will be assumed that the laws of other states as to property acquired by persons during their marriage are the same as those of California.

3. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS 🔑315(6)—DECREE OF DISTRIBUTION—JUDGMENT.

Where a residuary legatee petitions for a partial distribution, a decree declaring the widow's share to be one-half and the residuary legatees one-half, is an adjudication that cannot be attacked later on petition of the widow for distribution to her of her share, as to all who had legal notice.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; James C. Rives, Judge.

In the matter of the Estate of J. J. Hartenbower, deceased. Petition by Cynthia J.

Hartenbower for partial distribution, and objections thereto by Elsie Weiss, Dewitt Fowles, Roy Fowles, Florence Fowles Brown, Ethel K. Holland, and Frances C. Towle. From an order distributing a part of the estate to the petitioner, objectors appeal. Affirmed.

Stewart & Stewart, of Los Angeles, for appellants. I. W. Stewart, of Oxnard, and Edward M. Selby, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal by the residuary legatees, or some of them, under the last will of the decedent from an order distributing a part of the estate to Cynthia J. Hartenbower, the widow of said decedent. The fourth clause of the will is as follows:

> "Fourthly: I hereby admit, state and declare that all of my estate is community property, having been acquired by me since my marriage with my said wife, Cynthia J. Hartenbower. Realizing that she is entitled under the laws of the state of California to a full one-half of all of said estate as her lawful share of said community property, I intentionally make no other or further provision for her, and the full one-half of said estate which I am entitled to dispose of by will I give, devise and bequeath as hereinafter provided."

The widow filed a petition for partial distribution claiming that she was entitled under this clause of the will to one-half of the estate. The appellants filed objections to such distribution on the ground that the will does not declare an intention to give the widow one-half of the estate, and that the property of the decedent was separate property, and that, consequently, the widow was entitled to only one-third thereof as heir of her husband.

Evidence was introduced on the trial showing that the deceased and his wife had resided after their marriage in Iowa and Kansas, and that the property owned by the decedent at his death was the proceeds of property acquired by them while living in the said states. No evidence was given, however, so far as the record shows, concerning the laws of those states respecting community and separate property of married persons. In behalf of the widow there was introduced in evidence a decree of the court previously made upon the application of one of the residuary legatees for a partial distribution of the estate in which proceeding notice was duly given and after hearing the court made its decree declaring that by the terms of the last will of said deceased said widow was entitled to a full one-half of all the property belonging to the said estate and remaining after paying the debts and expenses of administration, and that said residuary legatee was entitled to a one-fiftieth of the remaining one-half thereof.

[1-3] We are of the opinion that the fourth paragraph of the will was correctly construed by the court below in making the previous decree. Although said paragraph does not expressly declare the intention of the testator to devise to his widow one-half of the estate, the intention that she shall have that share appears by necessary implication from the language used. Even if we concede that the property was in fact the separate property of the decedent and not community property as he declares by his will, and that the heirs and legatees are not bound by his declaration that it is community property, the said clause of the will is equivalent to a declaration that she shall have the full one-half thereof. In addition, we will say that as the record stands we must assume that the laws of Iowa and Kansas concerning property acquired by persons during their marriage are the same as those of California, and hence that the property so acquired is community property as the testator declares. Furthermore, the previous decree, made after hearing to which all the parties were cited by due and legal notice, is an adjudication of the effect of the will. For these reasons we think the appeal is without merit, and that the decree of the court below was correct.

The order is affirmed.

In re BAIRD'S ESTATE. HURD v. BROWN. BAIRD et al. v. SAME. (S. F. 7918.)

1. PLEADING 🔑127(2) — ADMISSIONS — CONSTRUCTION AND OPERATION.

Where petitions for revocation of probate alleged that an order was made admitting to probate as and for the last will of B. and a codicil thereto two certain papers dated November 23, 1909, and February 9, 1912, respectively, and the answers expressly admitted these allegations, it must be taken as established that the codicil of February 9, 1912, was admitted to probate.

2. WILLS 🔑199—RE-EXECUTION BY CODICIL.

The due execution of a codicil whereby the testator ratified and confirmed his will in every respect in so far as it was not inconsistent with the codicil was equivalent to a re-execution of the will.

3. WILLS 🔑288(3) — CONTESTS — BURDEN OF PROOF—EFFECT OF PROBATE.

The admission of a codicil to probate established prima facie for all the purposes of a will contest that it was duly executed in the manner required by law by a testator who was competent and free from undue influence, and the burden of proof was on the contestants to establish its invalidity.

4. WILLS 🔑166(5) — UNDUE INFLUENCE — BURDEN OF PROOF—UNNATURAL WILL.

However unnatural a will may appear to be, and however much at variance with expressions by the testator as to his intentions, it may not be held invalid on the ground of undue influence, unless there be an actual showing of that sort of pressure which overpowered the mind and mastered the volition of the testator at the very moment of execution.

5. WILLS 🔑163(2) — UNDUE INFLUENCE — BURDEN OF PROOF — CONFIDENTIAL RELATIONS.

To impose on the beneficiary under a will the burden of proof to show that the will was not induced by coercion or fraud, a confidential relation between him and the testator is not sufficient, and there must be activity on his part in the preparation of the will.

6. WILLS 🔑160(1)—UNDUE INFLUENCE—EFFECT OF CODICIL.

The execution of a codicil to a will ratifying and confirming the will so far as not inconsistent with the codicil without any previous suggestion of such action by any one and entirely of the testator's own free will without influence or coercion rendered it immaterial whether the will was induced by undue influence, and hence where, in a will contest, there was no evidence of undue influence in the execution of a codicil, a nonsuit was properly granted, even though there was a prima facie showing of undue influence inducing the original will.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Will contests in the matter of the Estate of Alfred Baird by Sarah Alice Hurd, and by Charles M. Baird and others against Samuel T. Brown, executor. From a judgment granting a nonsuit, the contestants appeal. Affirmed.

Charles R. Holton, of Whittier, and Stanley Moore, of San Francisco (Elliott Johnson, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellants. W. P. Thompson and M. K. Harris, both of Fresno, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. Certain of the heirs of Alfred Baird, deceased, contested his will after probate, and they appeal from a judgment against them following the granting of proponent's motion for nonsuit.

By his will Alfred Baird sought to dispose of an estate valued at approximately $190,000. Baird had been the father of two sons and two daughters. These were B. M. Baird (commonly called Morgan Baird), Sarah Alice Hurd, Edwin Lewis Baird, and Florence Baird Keeler. Of these children Edwin Lewis Baird predeceased his father by many years, and at the latter's death there survived of this branch of the family four children of Edwin Lewis Baird, deceased, and one grandchild, who was the child of a deceased daughter. Two separate contests of the will of Alfred Baird were filed, one by Mrs. Hurd, his daughter, and another by his grandchildren and great grandchild representing Edwin Lewis Baird, deceased. Both contests were based originally upon allegations of improper execution of the will, unsoundness of the testator's mind, and undue influence which it was alleged B. M. Baird exercised upon the testator. The contests were tried together, and at the trial the contestants abandoned all attacks upon the validity of the will except that based upon the alleged undue influence. When the original will was executed, November 23, 1909, the testator's wife was living, and provision was made for her, to the extent of an income of $100 per month for her life. The surviving children of Edwin Lewis Baird, deceased, were given $1,000 each, and the infant child of the deceased child of said Edwin Lewis Baird the sum of $10. The only provision for testator's daughter, Sarah Alice Hurd, was one for the payment to her of $25 per month during her life, the testator saying, "I make this provision for my said daughter as the best method of protecting her from want during her life and because she has already received a good deal from me, all of which she has squandered." All the rest and residue was given to the son, B. M. Baird, and the daughter, Florence Keeler, to be divided equally between them, and said B. M. Baird was appointed executor without bonds. A codicil dated February 9, 1912, accompanied the will, the same making no change therein except to cancel the provision for the wife, she having died, and also to provide that Florence Keeler's share in the residue should be $2,000 less than the share of B. M. Baird.

[1-3] In view of the condition of the pleadings it must be taken as established that the codicil of February 9, 1912, was admitted to probate. The petitions for revocation of probate filed by the contestants allege that on December 14, 1914, an order was made admitting to probate "as and for the last will of said Alfred Baird, deceased, and a codicil thereto, two certain alleged papers * * * dated November 23, 1909, and February 9, 1912, respectively." The answers expressly admitted the truth of these allegations. The contest was as to both documents. In the codicil the testator stated that having on the 23d day of November, 1909, made his last will, he declared this to be a codicil to the same, and said, "I hereby ratify and confirm said will in every respect in so far as the same is not inconsistent with this codicil." If the codicil was duly executed, its execution was equivalent, of course, to a re-execution of the will. Its admission to probate necessarily established prima facie for all the purposes of the contest, that it was duly executed in the manner required by law by a testator who was competent, free from undue influence, etc. The burden of proof was on the contestants to establish its invalidity. It is plain, therefore, that unless the evidence introduced was of such a nature that it would have sufficed to legally support a conclusion of undue influence as to the codicil, there was no error in granting the motion for a nonsuit.

[4-6] Certainly there was no sufficient showing of undue influence as to the codicil. No showing at all was attempted as to the circumstances surrounding its execution. The authorities in this state are numerous to the effect that however unnatural a will may appear to be, and however much at variance with expressions by the testator as to his intention with regard to the natural objects of his bounty, it may not be held invalid on the ground of undue influence unless there be an actual showing of that sort of pressure which overpowered the mind and mastered the volition of the testator at the very moment of execution. See Estate of Clark, 170 Cal. 418, 424, 149 Pac. 828; Estate of Carithers, 156 Cal. 422, 428, 105 Pac. 127; Estate of Gleason, 164 Cal. 756, 765, 130 Pac. 872; Estate of Kilborn, 162 Cal. 4, 120 Pac. 762; Estate of Lavinburg, 161 Cal. 536, 119 Pac. 915. This is the well settled general rule. There is a well-established exception to this rule upon which contestants rely here, to the effect that where one who unduly profits by the will as a beneficiary thereunder sustains a confidential relation to the testator, and has actually participated in procuring the execution of the will, the burden is on him to show that the will was not induced by coercion or fraud. As suggested in Estate of Higgins, 156 Cal. 261, 104 Pac. 8, a "presumption of undue influence" arises from proof of the existence of a confidential relation between the testator and such a beneficiary, "coupled with activity on the part of the latter in the preparation of the will." The confidential relation alone is not sufficient. There must be activity on the part of the beneficiary in the matter of the preparation of the will. See in this connection Estate of Ricks, 160 Cal. 461, 117 Pac. 532; Estate of Lavinburg, 161 Cal. 543, 119 Pac. 915; Estate of Higgins, supra; Estate of McDevitt, 95 Cal. 17, 33, 30 Pac. 101; Coghill v. Kennedy, 119 Ala. 641, 24 South. 459. The whole claim of contestants in this connection is that there was such activity on the part of B. M. Baird. Learned counsel practically admit that unless this claim is well based, no sufficient case was made. We may assume for the purposes of this decision that there was a sufficient prima facie showing to satisfy the law of the existence of a confidential relation between the testator and B. M. Baird, and that the latter did participate to some slight extent in procuring the execution of the will of November 23, 1909. Even as to this it is questionable if there was a sufficient showing to put the proponents to their proof. But there was not even any attempt to show any activity whatever on his part in relation to the preparation or execution of the codicil, and the record is absolutely destitute of evidence in this regard. There is nothing in the evidence inconsistent with the idea that the testator executed the codicil without any previous suggestion of such action by any one, and entirely of his own free will, without influence or coercion of any kind. The burden was on the contestants to show the contrary. This being the situation, it is immaterial that the evidence may have been sufficient to legally support a conclusion that the execution of the will on November 23, 1909, was induced by undue influence. The free and voluntary re-execution of the will by the testator on February 9, 1912, disposed of the objection on this ground.

It is said in the last brief filed by learned counsel for contestants that the codicil was not admitted to probate as a part of the will of deceased. This statement, as we have shown, is opposed to the allegations contained in their petitions for revocation. The question is one that is absolutely settled for all the purposes of this proceeding by the pleadings. There have been included in the clerk's transcript copies of the proceedings on the original probate, such as the testimony of subscribing witnesses, certificate of proof of will, order admitting will to probate, etc., and it is on these that contestants' attorneys rely for their claim that the codicil was not proved or admitted to probate. It may be doubted whether under the circumstances they constitute any proper part of the record on appeal. But considering them it is perfectly apparent that the will and codicil were filed as one instrument, and as such were annexed to the certificate of proof of will, and admitted to probate, as constituting the last will of the deceased. We are not privileged here to consider the nature of the testimony given on the original hearing, or to determine any question as to the sufficiency of such evidence to justify the action of the court in admitting the codicil to probate as a part of the will. So far as this contest is concerned, the due and free execution thereof is established, until the contrary is shown, by the judgment or order of the court admitting it to probate.

It follows from what we have said that a verdict in favor of contestants could not have been held to have sufficient support in the evidence, and that the trial court did not err in granting the motion for a nonsuit.

Complaint is made of certain rulings on evidence, but they all related to matters which could not affect the result in view of the failure to show any activity on the part of B. M. Baird in the matter of procuring the execution of the codicil. Without such proof contestants could not succeed, and none of the evidence or proffered evidence involved in any of these rulings had any reference to this matter. It is therefore unnecessary to discuss them.

The judgment is affirmed.

WAYMIRE et al. v. CALIFORNIA TRONA CO. et al. (L. A. 3834.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 25, 1917.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑616(2)—DISMISSAL—AUTHENTICATION OF AFFIDAVITS.

Appeal from dismissal of action for lack of diligent prosecution will not be dismissed because the affidavits used on the motion below are not authenticated by the trial judge; this not preventing examination of such of the record as is properly before the reviewing court.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑616(2)—RECORD—AUTHENTICATION OF AFFIDAVITS.

Though papers on appeal are prepared under Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, affidavits used on a motion below must be identified and authenticated by the trial judge, that they may be considered on appeal; the certificate of the clerk not being enough.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑571—CERTIFICATION OF PAPERS—MANDATE TO TRIAL JUDGE.

The remedy for refusal of the trial judge to certify papers for appeal is by writ of mandate.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑927(2) — PRESUMPTION—DISMISSAL.

The record showing it is incomplete and does not contain all the evidence on which the trial court acted, it must be presumed it justified the dismissal of action for lack of diligent prosecution; there not being sufficient evidence in the record to show abuse of discretion.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑926(4) — PRESUMPTION—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE.

It cannot be said that rejection of evidence was prejudicial, the record not containing all the matters on which the court acted in dismissing the action.

6. TRIAL 🔑388(1)—FINDINGS—ORDER AFTER MOTION.

Findings on an order made after motion are not required.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Frank F. Oster, Judge.

Action by R. Waymire and another against the California Trona Company and others. Action dismissed, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Thos. O. Toland, of Los Angeles, for appellants. Perry Evans, of San Francisco, and Daley & Byrne, of San Bernardino, for respondents.

LAWLOR, J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff Waymire from an order dismissing the action in the lower court for lack of diligent prosecution, and from the judgment entered thereon.

The facts appearing in the order of dismissal show that on June 23, 1913, defendant California Trona Company filed in the United States Land Office, at Independence, Inyo county, Cal., its application for a patent to certain placer mining claims in San Bernardino county, and published notice of the application in the Randsburg Miner for 60 days, in accordance with section 2325, Revised Statutes of the United States (U. S. Comp. St. 1916, § 4622), and said 60 days expired on August 27, 1913. On August 25, 1913, plaintiffs filed their adverse claim, which must be filed during the period of publication, and which stayed all proceedings on defendant's application in accordance with section 2326 of the Revised Statutes of the United States (section 4623) until the controversy between the parties should have been settled by a court of competent jurisdiction, or the adverse claim waived. Such claim would be waived, according to the statute, by failure to file a complaint seeking a settlement of the right of possession within 30 days of making the adverse claim, or by failure to prosecute the action with reasonable diligence to final judgment. Plaintiffs filed their complaint in the superior court of San Bernardino county on September 24, 1913, but did not cause summons to be issued thereon until February 5, 1914, nor served until February 6, 1914. On January 30, 1914, defendant served and filed its notice of motion to dismiss the action for lack of diligent prosecution, together with an affidavit in support thereof. On February 9, 1914, when the motion was heard, plaintiffs filed two counter affidavits opposing the motion, and also filed the summons showing proper service as indicated above. After reading of the affidavits and the introduction of oral testimony by the plaintiffs, and argument of respective counsel, the court ruled that the plaintiffs had not been diligent in prosecuting their action as required by section 2326 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and ordered the action dismissed.

The first point made by the respondent is that the appeal should be dismissed for defects in making up the record. The record on appeal is prepared under the alternative method, and consists of a "clerk's" and a "reporter's" transcript. The reporter's transcript, to which are attached the certificates of the reporter and the judge who heard the motion, contains only the oral testimony and the ruling of the court, together with the reporter's memorandum that the various affidavits that had been filed were read. The affidavits themselves do not appear in this transcript. They do appear in the clerk's transcript, together with the notice of motion to dismiss. The clerk's transcript has only the certificate of the clerk reciting that the papers included therein are true and correct copies of original records in his office. Respondent's contention is that the notice of motion and the three affidavits should have been included in the reporter's transcript, and not in the clerk's transcript, where they have no place. The affidavits are not authenticated by the certificate of the judge because they do not appear in the original reporter's transcript; neither does the certificate of the clerk identify the affidavits as having been used on the hearing of the motion. In fact, respondent argues, it cannot be properly ascertained from the record what affidavits were used or that the ones set out in the clerk's transcript, if used at all, are the only ones so used. From this the conclusion is urged that since all intendments are in favor of the action of the trial court, it must be assumed in this court that there was sufficient evidence, not appearing in the record, to sustain the order. All of this is included in respondent's brief in the form of a motion to dismiss the appeal. Appellant, in his reply brief, contends that the notice of motion and the affidavits are properly in the clerk's transcript, but if they should have been included in the reporter's transcript, then he asks leave of this court to amend, in accordance with rules 14 and 15 (119 Pac. xii). Respondent's brief pointing out the alleged defects in the record was served on the attorney for the appellant on July 11, 1914. On November 30, 1914, appellant presented to the trial court a supplemental reporter's transcript containing the notice of motion to dismiss, together with the three affidavits, as well as the complaint, summons, order of dismissal, reporter's certificate and clerk's certificate, and asked the judge who heard the motion to attach his certificate thereto authenticating the affidavits as those used by him on the hearing of the motion. The court refused to certify on the grounds that the alleged error in preparing the record was the fault of appellant or his attorney, and that in any event appellant had waited too long after receiving respondent's brief which pointed out the alleged defects. The record of the proceedings in the trial court on the request for the certificate of the judge is now before us, as well as the supplemental transcript filed without such certificate, and we are asked to consider such transcript as a part of the record on appeal should we decide that the original record is defective.

[1] We will take up first the respondent's motion to dismiss the appeal. The motion will be denied. There is no contention that the appeal was not regularly taken. The only objection is to the preparation of the record, in failing to include the affidavits in the reporter's transcript. This absence of a proper authentication by the trial judge precludes only the consideration of these particular papers, but does not forbid an examination of the record that is properly before us.

[2, 3] It has long been settled, with regard to the affidavits used on a motion, that they must be identified and authenticated by the trial judge before they can be considered by this court. The certificate of the clerk cannot take the place of the authentication by the judge. Nash v. Harris, 57 Cal. 242; Fish v. Benson, 71 Cal. 428, 432, 12 Pac. 454; Totten v. Barlow, 165 Cal. 378, 132 Pac. 749; Estate of Gamble, 166 Cal. 253, 256, 135 Pac. 970. This rule is now so well established that any further discussion of it is unnecessary. The same rule must be applied in cases arising under section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure. The judge alone is competent to certify to what was used on the motion. Hence there is no other way in which the appellant can present to us the affidavits in question. The supplemental proceedings to obtain the judge's certificate were had several years ago, and nothing has been done by appellant since then. His remedy was by writ of mandate to compel a proper authentication by the judge. It is clear that the supplemental transcript, without the judge's certificate, is of no avail whatever.

[4, 5] In this state of the record, the order of dismissal must be affirmed. The reporter's transcript contains oral testimony, and recites further that certain affidavits were used in the court below supporting and opposing the motion. What those affidavits contained is not before us. The record itself shows that it is incomplete, and that all of the evidence upon which the lower court acted is not before us. All intendments are in favor of the action of the trial court, and there is not sufficient evidence in the record to show that the discretion vested in him has been abused. The matters contained in the affidavits may be entirely ample to support the order. In Estate of Gamble, 166 Cal. 253, 256, 135 Pac. 970, 971, a similar defect in the record led to a like ruling, the court there saying:

> "The record is inexcusably defective. The presumptions of law are all in favor of the action of the court below. If error is claimed, the record on appeal must contain sufficient legal evidence of it, or we must disregard the claim. Some papers which perhaps might have been admissible as evidence are set forth, but there is no certificate of the judge and nothing to show that these papers were introduced in evidence, or that they were considered by the court below in determining the case. It is clear that upon this showing we cannot consider these papers or determine that the court did not correctly compute the net proceeds of the sale of the lot."

Certain errors in the rejection of offered testimony are pointed out. But in view of the fact that we have not before us all the matters upon which the trial court acted in granting the motion, we cannot say that its rulings, if error, were prejudicial.

[6] Appellant claims that the findings in this case were prematurely signed, because proposed findings were not served upon him five days before they were signed. It does not appear, however, that there were any findings, other than a review of the facts in the order of dismissal. The universal practice in this state is not to require findings on an order made after motion. See Waller v. Weston, 125 Cal. 201, 57 Pac. 892.

Order and judgment affirmed.

BAINES v. ZEMANSKY, Registrar of Voters.
(S. F. 8505.)

1. Mandamus 🔑3(1) — Existence of Other Remedy.

If the superior court has jurisdiction, upon any possible state of facts, to prohibit or enjoin a registrar of voters from proceeding with a recall petition, the Supreme Court, on an original mandamus proceeding, cannot inquire into writs or orders in such court concerning the same.

2. Prohibition 🔑6(2)—Registrars of Voters—Examining Recall Petitions.

Prohibition will not lie to prevent a registrar of voters from examining and certifying recall in the manner prescribed in San Francisco Charter, art. 11, c. 3, as, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1102, prohibition lies to arrest proceeding only "when without or in excess of jurisdiction."

3. Prohibition 🔑2—Ministerial Duties—Statutes—Constitutionality.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1102, as far as it purports to authorize prohibition against ministerial acts, is unconstitutional, prohibition being limited to judicial proceedings.

4. Mandamus 🔑3(1)—Void Prohibition—Defenses.

Prohibition directed against the examining and certifying of petition for recall in the manner prescribed by San Francisco Charter, art. 11, c. 3, being void, the writ is no defense on application in the Supreme Court for a writ of mandate to enforce such proceedings.

5. Municipal Corporations 🔑124(5)—Officers — Recall — Jurisdiction — Constitutionality.

Const. art. 11, § 8½, par. 4, conferring "plenary authority" to provide for "recall and removal" of officers, makes it competent for a charter to provide that an officer have the sole jurisdiction to decide the sufficiency of petitions for recall, and to exclude the superior court from revising or annulling such determination.

6. Municipal Corporations 🔑154—Officers — Tenure of Office — Termination—Presumptions.

Any person elected or appointed to office under a city charter is presumed to accept the same with the condition that his tenure may be terminated at any time in the manner prescribed in such charter.

7. Injunction 🔑114(2)—Recall Proceedings.

The officer against whom a recall petition is filed has a sufficient interest to entitle him in superior court to enjoin proceedings departing substantially from the mode prescribed, and to prevent fraud and fictitious signatures, where the charter or statute does not give the sole jurisdiction to some other tribunal.

8. Municipal Corporations 🔑124(5)—Officers—Recall — Decisions of Officers—Conclusiveness.

San Francisco Charter, art. 11, c. 3, construed as a whole, gives the registrar of voters exclusive final jurisdiction as to the sufficiency of the petition for recall as to legal requirements, and whether signatures are genuine, and he must make a determination in 15 days.

9. Municipal Corporations 🔑159(4)—Officers—Recall.

Under San Francisco Charter, art. 11, c. 3, relating to recall, the registrar of voters has authority to inquire into and take evidence, and, although his powers are limited, there is, nevertheless, a tribunal empowered to pass on the sufficiency of petitions for recall, and is sufficient.

10. Municipal Corporations 🔑124(5)—Officers—Recall — Proceedings—Who May Participate Therein.

Although, under San Francisco Charter, art. 11, c. 3, relating to recall, inquiry as to the genuineness of signatures to petitions for recall is limited by section 3 to call in the voter, the officer being recalled can question the genuineness of a signature and have the voter notified.

11. Mandamus 🔑76—Officers—Failure to Exercise Jurisdiction—Effect.

That a registrar of voters erroneously believed he had no duty to pass on the sufficiency of a recall petition and did not do so, does not affect his exclusive jurisdiction, or the right to mandamus to compel him to do acts.

In Bank. Application by Robert E. Baines for a writ of mandate to compel J. H. Zemansky, Registrar of Voters of the City and County of San Francisco, to examine a petition for the recall of Charles M. Fickert, as district attorney of said city and county, attach his certificate thereto, mail a copy to petitioner, and report the same to the board of election commissioners. Writ granted.

Grover O'Connor, George F. Snyder, Andrew J. Branagan, and Colman Schwartz, all of San Francisco (U'Ren & Beard, of San Francisco, amici curiæ), for petitioner. Thomas V. Cator, of San Francisco (James F. Brennan, of San Francisco, amicus curiæ), for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is a proceeding for a writ of mandate, to compel the registrar of voters of San Francisco to examine into the sufficiency or insufficiency of a petition filed with the board of election commissioners for the recall of Charles M. Fickert, as district attorney of said city and county, and thereupon to attach to said petition a certificate showing the result of such examination, mail a copy thereof to the person who filed the petition, and report the same to the board of election commissioners.

A recall petition against Charles M. Fickert was filed with the board of election commissioners, consisting of 232 sections, and bearing 15,214 names, purporting to be signatures of registered voters of said city and county, asking for the said recall. The number of legal signatures necessary to authorize a recall election in said city and county was and is 11,837. The registrar of voters proceeded thereupon to examine said petition and verify the signatures thereto. After such examination he attached to the petition a certificate stating that there were only 10,219 genuine signatures of registered and qualified electors of San Francisco thereto. Thereupon, within the 20 days allowed for that purpose, a supplemental petition was filed, embracing 120 sections with 5,104 additional signatures. The registrar then proceeded to examine said supplemental petition to verify the signatures thereon, and after completing his examination, ascertained and determined that there were 3,050 genuine signatures thereto. The two petitions taken together have, therefore, 13,269 signatures attached, and if such signatures are genuine and not subject to any other lawful objection, it is the duty of the registrar under the provisions of the San Francisco charter, as amended on January 24, 1917, not only to attach thereto his certificates, showing the result of his examinations, and mail a copy thereof to the persons who filed the petitions, which he must do whether there are enough signatures or not, but also to report the sufficiency of said petitions to the board of election commissioners, and exhibit to said board the certificates attached to said petitions. When he does this it becomes the duty of the board of election commissioners to call an election for a vote on such recall. Charter, art. 11, c. 5, §§ 1 and 2; c. 3, §§ 2 and 3; Stats. 1917, p. 1728.

The answer of the registrar admits the filing of the petition and supplemental petition aforesaid for the recall of Fickert, with the number of signatures as stated; that he has examined and determined as to the genuineness of such signatures, and as to the sufficiency of the two petitions as above stated, and avers that on August 30, 1917, before he had made or attached thereto his certificates of the result, and when he was ready and willing to do so, he was served with an alternative writ of prohibition, issued out of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco in a proceeding in prohibition, begun by Charles M. Fickert against said registrar, commanding him to refrain from further action upon said recall petitions until the further order of the court; that on August 31, 1917, he was served with a restraining order of said superior court, made in an action begun therein by said Fickert in his own behalf as the officer against whom the recall petitions were filed, and also as a citizen and taxpayer of said city and county, which said order restrained him as such registrar from further action upon said recall petitions, until the hearing of the application for an injunction as prayed for in said action; and that said proceeding in prohibition, and said action for an injunction, are still pending in said superior court, and said alternative writ of prohibition and said restraining order still remain in full force and effect.

The registrar asserts his willingness to proceed with the recall petitions, and states that he believes the superior court was and is without jurisdiction to issue said writ and restraining order, and that he has made and presented to said court his objections to its jurisdiction of said matters, but that said court has not yet determined the merits of said objections.

Although he so believes that said superior court is without jurisdiction, he is unwilling to disregard or disobey its writs and orders in said cases, deeming it more orderly to test the matter in a regular way in a higher court. Therefore he submits to this court the questions whether or not the superior court has jurisdiction and lawful power to issue said writ and make said restraining order, and whether or not the same are void, and declares his readiness to do as this court shall order. Briefs on these questions have been filed in his behalf, and also for Mr. Fickert, and for the filers of said recall petitions.

[1] Under well-established principles of law it cannot be denied that, if the superior court has jurisdiction, upon any possible state of facts, to prohibit or enjoin the registrar of voters from proceeding with such recall petitions in the manner prescribed in the charter, the sufficiency of the petition or complaint upon which that court acts, so far as the facts stated therein are concerned, cannot be inquired into by this court in this collateral proceeding, but that, on the contrary, its writs and orders must be upheld so far as this case is concerned, and can only be questioned when presented by way of appeal after the final judgment of said court in the cause. If that court has jurisdiction, it may decide the wrong as well as the right in the matter, and its decision is binding on all other persons, officers, and courts, save upon an appeal to the court having appellate jurisdiction of the cause. The sole question for our consideration, therefore, is whether or not the court has jurisdiction of the subject-matter of said proceeding in prohibition and of said action for an injunction. For the solution of this question we must look to the provisions of the city charter, the allegations upon which the rights and orders were issued, and the general principles of law applicable to the subject.

The petition for the writ of prohibition and the complaint for the injunction in the superior court contained precisely the same allegations, except that the latter states that Fickert is a citizen and taxpayer of the city and county, and that the board of election commissioners, if said recall proceedings are continued, will immediately call an election to determine the matter of said recall; that the holding of such election would require an expenditure of the public moneys of said city and county to the amount of $50,000; and that for a proportional part thereof said Fickert is liable to be assessed by way of taxation. These additional allegations have no bearing on the question, unless they may give the plaintiff in the injunction suit a status which would enable him to maintain the action for injunction, if the court has jurisdiction of such action, as established by the other allegations of the complaint.

The petition for the writ of prohibition and the complaint for injunction are both predicated upon the theory that a number of the sections of which the petition is composed are false, fictitious, and forged. It is alleged that 33 sections of said petitions, containing 6,125 signatures, are fictitious and fraudulent, and are not entitled to be considered a part of the petition, and that without the said signatures the number remaining of genuine signatures is insufficient to authorize any recall election. The charter requires each section of a petition to be verified by the affidavit of the person who solicited the signatures thereto, to the effect that said section had not been at any time left where persons could sign it out of the presence of the said solicitor, that each signature was made in the presence of said solicitor and is the genuine signature of the person whose name it purports to be, and that the solicitor was at the time a duly qualified voter of San Francisco. Section 2, c. 3, art. 11. The charge of fraud consists of detailed statements alleging in substance that, with respect to each of the sections specified, the statements in each affidavit are untrue, in that the solicitor did not see the persons sign their names; that the signatures were made out of the presence of the solicitor; that many of the signatures are forgeries, the number not being stated; that such section was frequently out of the possession of the solicitor and where it could be signed by persons without the solicitor's knowledge, and, as to some of the sections, that the solicitor was not a qualified voter.

Section 2 of chapter 3, article 11, of the charter, further provides that when a recall petition, signed and verified in the manner specified in that section, is filed, no signature can be thereafter revoked, and that, "unless and until it be proven otherwise by official investigation by the registrar of voters, it shall be presumed that the petition filed conforms to all legal requirements, and contains the signatures of the requisite number of registered voters, and after an election based thereon, the sufficiency of such petition shall not be questioned." The important parts of section 3 relating to this question are as follows:

> "The registrar of voters shall have fifteen days after the filing of such petition, and the same time after receipt by him of a charter amendment petition in which to verify the same and certify the result thereof in the manner provided by this section. Within such time, the registrar of voters shall finally determine from the records of registration whether or not said petition is signed by the requisite number of electors entitled to vote. If any signature be called in question, the said registrar of voters shall mail notice to such purported signer, stating that his or her name is attached to such petition and citing him or her to appear before said registrar of voters forthwith, naming the time and place. Said citation shall inclose a blank affidavit, denying that the person signing such affidavit signed such petition, and said citation shall also contain a statement, that a blank affidavit denying that such person signed such petition, is inclosed, and that if such person does not desire to attend in person to deny his signature he may swear to such affidavit of denial before any officer authorized to take oaths, and mail the same to the registrar of voters, and that if he does not so attend and deny such signature in person, or by making and mailing such affidavit of denial, that his purported signature to such petition will be treated as genuine.
> "Unless said purported signer shall appear when cited and deny his signature under oath before said registrar, or his deputy, or unless the registrar of voters shall receive such sworn affidavit of denial of such signature, before the time when by this chapter the said registrar must, as aforesaid, make such final determination, such signature must be counted as genuine."

Section 3 further provides that upon the completion of his examination and determination of the petition and supplemental petition, if there be one, the registrar shall attach to the petitions his certificate showing the result of said examination; shall forthwith mail a copy thereof to the persons who filed the petitions; and that if he finds that the original petition or the original and supplemental petition, as the case may be, contains sufficient legal signatures to require an election to be held thereon, he shall report such sufficiency to the board of election commissioners and exhibit to them such certificates.

[2] With regard to the jurisdiction of the superior court to entertain prohibition against the registrar to prevent him from certifying the result of his completed examination of a recall petition, it is immaterial whether the functions of the registrar in determining the sufficiency of such petition are judicial or ministerial in character. If they are judicial, the charter gives him the power to make the examination and to certify his determination thereon, and in so doing the registrar does not act without jurisdiction, or exceed his jurisdiction, but acts wholly within and in accordance with the powers conferred upon him. Prohibition lies to arrest the proceedings of a tribunal, board, or person, only "when such proceedings are without or in excess of the jurisdiction" of such tribunal, board, or person. Code Civ. Proc. § 1102.

[3] If his duty in that behalf is only ministerial, it is well settled that prohibition is not the proper remedy to stay the action of a ministerial officer. Section 1102, as amended in 1881 (St. 1881, p. 20), purports to authorize prohibition against ministerial acts, but it has long been settled that jurisdiction in prohibition is, by the Constitution, limited to the arrest of judicial proceedings and does not lie to an officer or board exercising purely ministerial functions; that the Legislature cannot enlarge that jurisdiction, and hence that the amendment of 1881 purporting to confer that jurisdiction is invalid. Camron v. Kenfield, 57 Cal. 550; Farmers' Union v. Thresher, 62 Cal. 410; Hobart v. Tillson, 66 Cal. 211, 5 Pac. 83.

[4] In either alternative, therefore, the superior court was without jurisdiction to entertain the proceeding in prohibition to prevent the registrar from certifying the result of his examination, or from reporting the same to the election board, and the alternative writ issued to that effect is void, and does not constitute a defense to the present application for a writ of mandate.

It is proper to say here, with reference to the question of jurisdiction of both kinds, in prohibition and to enjoin, that we have before us no charge of fraud or willful misconduct on the part of the registrar himself. The question whether or not, if he fraudulently attempted to certify that a recall petition was sufficient when, on its face, it lacked the number of signatures required, or was otherwise fatally defective and insufficient, he could be prohibited or enjoined from so doing, is not presented, and we express no opinion upon it.

We now come to the question whether the superior court has jurisdiction to enjoin proceedings upon a recall petition which is sufficient upon its face, on the ground that it has been made to appear so by means of forged signatures of registered voters, or on the ground that the solicitors who circulated it were not qualified voters, or that the signers to the petition did not sign in the presence of such solicitors.

[5] The Constitution confers upon the city and county of San Francisco "plenary authority," subject only to the restrictions contained in article 11 thereof, to provide in its charter for the "recall and removal" of all officers of said city and county. Art. 11, § 8½, par. 4. It follows, therefore, that it is competent for the charter to provide that the question of the sufficiency of a recall petition, or of the legality or regularity of other proceedings in relation thereto, shall be determined by an officer specially authorized to do so, and to exclude the superior court from revising or annulling such determination. See Carter v. Superior Court, 138 Cal. 150, 70 Pac. 1067.

[6] Any person who is elected or appointed to an office is presumed to accept the same with the condition annexed that his tenure of the office may be terminated at any time in the manner prescribed by the charter. Matter of Carter, 141 Cal. 320, 74 Pac. 997.

[7] It must be conceded that, if the superior court has jurisdiction, the officer against whom a recall petition is launched has a sufficient personal interest to entitle him to maintain an action in equity, upon good cause, to enjoin proceedings upon such recall. Although he cannot claim exemption from such removal by recall, he has the right to demand that the proceedings therein do not substantially depart from the mode prescribed, and to insist that the officers do not perpetrate a fraud upon him by acting upon a ficititious petition supported by forged signatures. Matter of Carter, supra. A bill in equity to restrain the proceedings so attempted would seem to be an appropriate remedy to prevent the wrong, if no other tribunal is authorized to do so by the charter.

In discussing the question whether such provisions of a charter or statute are exclusive of the jurisdiction of superior courts in quo warranto or in proceedings to contest an election, Mr. Dillon says that the answer must depend upon the language in which the provisions are couched, and that, "where the legislative intent is clear that the action of the council in contested election cases shall be final, the court will not inquire into election frauds, since the council is the judge of this matter, as of others pertaining to the election." 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. (5th Ed.) § 381. It is obvious that the same principle must apply where the question is whether the superior court retains power to enjoin the holding of such election on account of frauds in proceedings relating to it. The decisions of the courts are not harmonious with respect to the language which will operate to take away the jurisdiction of courts in such matters, some holding that a provision that the council shall be "the judge of the election and qualifications" of its members is sufficient to oust the jurisdiction of courts, and others holding the contrary, but all agree that if the provision is that the council shall be the final judge of such election and qualifications, or words to that effect, no other tribunal can inquire into the matter. 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. (5th Ed.) § 377, and notes.

[8] Upon consideration of the several provisions of the charter of San Francisco, relating to recall petitions, we are satisfied that the intention was to make the registrar the exclusive judge of the sufficiency of such petitions in all particulars, and to exclude the courts from inquiry concerning them. One of the provisions above quoted is that, "unless and until it be proven otherwise by official investigation by the registrar of voters, it shall be presumed that the petition filed conforms to all legal requirements, and contains the signatures of the requisite number of registered voters." This necessarily implies that the registrar has exclusive power to investigate and determine that the presumption is removed, for it declares that such presumption continues until he has so determined. The subsequent provision in section 3 that within the time specified "the registrar of voters shall finally determine from the records of registration whether or not said petition is signed by the requisite number of electors entitled to vote," must be read in connection with the preceding section relating to the same subject. Though not well expressed, its meaning is that the registrar must complete his investigations as to the conformity of the petition to legal requirements, and as to the number of lawful signatures, and thereupon, and within the 15 days allowed, finally determine both propositions, and that his decision is final. If this be its meaning, it excludes jurisdiction of any other court or tribunal to inquire into those questions. The phrase "from the records of registration," following the words "finally determined" in the last passage, must be taken with some qualification. The passage is immediately followed by the provision that if any signature is called in question the registrar must mail notice to the purported signer, appointing a time for hearing him, and that the registrar may take the evidence or affidavit of such voter on the subject. But that the registrar's decision upon such evidence as he may take is to be final upon both propositions, that is whether the petition conforms to all legal requirements, and whether it contains sufficient genuine signatures, is evident.

[9] The district attorney insists, however, and in this he is supported by the registrar himself, that the charter does not authorize the registrar to take or consider any evidence or facts not disclosed on the face of the recall petition and the records of registration, except the testimony or affidavits of the voters to whom he has mailed the notices as above mentioned. From this he argues that the charter provides no tribunal empowered to inquire into and determine as to forgeries and extrinsic frauds in contravention or evasion of the safeguards prescribed to prevent them, and sufficient upon the general principles of law and equity to nullify the proceedings, and, consequently, that as to such extrinsic frauds, the jurisdiction of equity to prevent injurious fraud remains unimpaired. We do not think the powers of the registrar in this inquiry are so narrow and perfunctory as is thus claimed. He is required to make an official investigation to determine whether or not the petition conforms to "all legal requirements." Among these requirements are that no person not a qualified and registered voter has the right to sign the petition; that such voter must make his signature to the petition in the presence of the solicitor; that no person who is not a qualified voter is competent to solicit signatures, or to make affidavit verifying the same, and that "all signing not made, numbered, and verified substantially in accordance with the requirements" shall be disregarded. The term "registered voter" is defined to mean a qualified voter whose name appears on the records of registration for the current or preceding year. If some of these requirements are wanting as to any signatures to the petition, such signatures should not be counted. If the entire petition, or some sections thereof, are merely fictitious creations by means of clever forgeries, gotten up by persons not authorized to do so, the registrar, upon ascertaining the fact, is authorized to reject or disregard them. He must have authority to inquire into it and to take such evidence as he can obtain in the brief time allowed him for investigation. His powers furnish some protection against frauds and forgeries. They may not be as complete or efficient as those of a court of equity, but the time must of necessity be short, in order to give the recall proceeding any practical value, and a tribunal with this summary jurisdiction is all that the conditions were deemed to allow. A tribunal is provided, and the incumbent has, by taking the office, impliedly agreed to abide by its decisions.

[10] With respect to the genuineness of the signatures, the inquiry is limited to the method prescribed in section 3, that is, to call in the voter himself to state the fact, or to admit the genuineness by his absence or failure to deny the same. We do not agree that the registrar is the only person authorized to "call in question" a signature. The charter does not so declare. The officer who is to be subjected to the ordeal is vitally interested, and he, at least, is entitled to have the voter notified. The mode provided, thus liberally construed, is perhaps as just and as efficient to prevent forgery as any that could be devised. We need not here determine whether other registered voters may not also have the right to call signatures in question. The question is not raised. There is, therefore, a tribunal empowered to determine these matters, and, as the language of the charter makes his jurisdiction exclusive, the superior courts have no power to interfere.

[11] The facts that the registrar may have been mistaken as to his duty, and that he has not properly performed it, do not affect the question of his jurisdiction and power, and they are not material to that question.

The decision of the Supreme Court of Oregon, in State v. Olcott, 62 Or. 277, 125 Pac. 303, cited in behalf of the district attorney, has no proper application to this case. The statute of Oregon expressly authorized an action in equity to enjoin the fraudulent referendum proceedings there involved, and it did not empower any other tribunal or person to investigate or determine as to the sufficiency, validity, or authenticity of the petition and signatures, except by the purely mechanical process of counting the names.

Our conclusion is that the writ of prohibition and the restraining order issued by the superior court are invalid and of no force to prevent the registrar from making and exhibiting to the election board his certificate of the result of his examination.

Let a peremptory writ of mandate issue, as prayed for.

STEINBERGER v. CALIFORNIA ELECTRIC GARAGE CO. (L. A. 3808.)

1. DAMAGES 🔑171 — PERSONAL INJURIES CASE—POVERTY OF PLAINTIFFS.

In an action by husband and wife against a garage company for personal injuries to the wife, it was error to admit evidence of plaintiffs' poverty.

2. Municipal Corporations 🔑706(6) — Right to Tow Automobile—Question of Fact.

A garage company had a right to tow an automobile on a street by another, provided it exercised due care for the safety of others, what is due care being a question for the jury under the circumstances of the particular case.

3. Municipal Corporations 🔑706(8) — Automobile Accident—Instruction.

In an action against a garage company by husband and wife for injuries to the wife when she tripped over the rope with which the company was towing an automobile by another, it was error to instruct that the extending of the rope between the two cars placed a burden on the company to warn others of the obstruction, since whether or not such warning was necessary depended upon the surrounding conditions.

4. Municipal Corporations 🔑706(8)—Automobile Accident—Instruction.

In such action it was error to instruct that the wife, in the exercise of due care in crossing between the two cars, was not bound by the presence of the rope, unless she observed it, or it was called to her attention, since whether or not she was negligent in not seeing it was an issue raised by defendant, which it had a right to have decided by the jury.

5. Trial 🔑296(4, 5) — Cure of Error — Instructions.

Other instructions declaring that the towing of an automobile by a rope is in itself lawful, if due care is exercised, did not cure the error.

6. Witnesses 🔑383—Impeachment—Testimony as to Collateral Fact.

Where the driver of the rear car denied his imputed declaration to the wife, while taking her home, that four other persons had tried to cross between the two machines the wife's contrary testimony was as to a collateral fact, which could not be used to impeach the driver.

7. Negligence 🔑125—Proof—Similar Instances.

Negligence, or its absence, cannot be proved by similar instances.

8. Damages 🔑216(7) — Instruction — Personal Injuries—Future Suffering.

In an action for personal injuries to a wife, an instruction on the measure of damages that the mental worry, grief, and humiliation, if any, which one suffers, or may suffer, by reason of his physical injuries, are, in contemplation of law, component parts of his mental suffering, for which damages may be awarded, was not erroneous as permitting recovery for future suffering which is not certain to occur, the preceding portion of the instruction having stated that the award must be for mental suffering which the wife was certain to suffer in the future.

9. Municipal Corporations 🔑706(8) — Degrees of Negligence—Instruction.

In an action for personal injuries in tripping over a rope whereby an automobile was towed, an instruction that contributory negligence would not bar recovery, if so slight as not to amount to want of ordinary care, was inaccurate and confusing, since the law of California does not recognize degrees of negligence in such cases.

10. Negligence 🔑82 — Contributory Negligence—Definition—Statute.

"Negligence" is the failure to exercise ordinary care; any want on plaintiff's part of the care which is appropriate to the circumstances is negligence, and, by Civ. Code, § 1714, will prevent recovery, if it be one of the proximate causes of the injury.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; E. P. Unangst, Judge.

Action by Clara B. Steinberger and J. W. Steinberger against the California Electric Garage Company, a corporation. From a judgment for plaintiffs and an order denying new trial, defendant appeals. Judgment and order reversed.

O'Melveny, Stevens & Milliken and Walter K. Tuller, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. G. P. Adams and J. G. Rossiter, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LAWLOR, J. The plaintiffs, husband and wife brought suit to recover for personal injuries to the wife, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of defendant. The jury returned a verdict for plaintiffs for $5,400. From the judgment and from an order denying a new trial defendant appeals.

The undisputed facts are that on the evening of September 10, 1910, one of the defendant's employés was driving an electric automobile of defendant through the business district of Pasadena, and towing a gas car guided by another servant of defendant, one Knight. Both cars, displaying the usual lights, stopped at a well-lighted corner, where the plaintiff Clara B. Steinberger was about to cross. The machines started up again, traveling at about three miles an hour, when Mrs. Steinberger attempted to pass in the rear of the electric machine and in front of the gas car. She tripped over the tow rope and fell. It is for the injuries alleged to have been sustained by reason of this fall that the plaintiffs sue. Mrs. Steinberger testified that she did not see the rope between the two machines, and that the distance between them was about 20 feet, giving her ample time to pass between them because of the slow speed at which the cars were traveling. There was evidence on behalf of the defendant that the distance between the two cars was only 12 feet. Knight, the driver of the rear automobile, testified that he saw Mrs. Steinberger about to cross in back of the first car and called to her to look out for the rope. The driver of the first machine and Miss Parmalee, who was riding with Knight, stated that they heard him give the warning, but could not repeat what he had said. Mrs. Steinberger testified that she did not hear any warning. It was not denied that before the accident Mrs. Steinberger was a strong, healthy woman, able to do all her housework and care for her family, and that at the time of the trial she had lost a great deal of weight, was nervous and anemic, and unable to do much of her housework. It was also shown that she had had a miscarriage after the accident, but defendant denied that the miscarriage or weakened condition was due to the fall, and introduced some expert evidence to that effect.

The first point made by appellant is that Mrs. Steinberger was permitted, over objection, to testify that neither she nor her husband had any property except their household goods and $200 in money, and that her husband was a motorman who—

> "drew a salary of between $90 and $95 a month, and our family consisted of ourselves and our three minor children, the eldest of which was nine at the time of the accident, and the youngest under two. I suffered to a great extent in being disabled to do my household duties and looking after the children. I was worried about the fact of them—knowing they had to be brought up and educated in the right way, so that they could go on through life, and I worried a great deal about that, and my husband being employed just by the day, not knowing what day he would lose his job, not knowing how long he would hold it, put me where I worried over that to a great extent, and I had to employ help all along, and my children have been deprived of the pleasures of other children because I have been disabled and could not look after them, and could not show them any attention like a mother ought to show her children, on account of me being sick, and nervous all the time."

[1] Defendant claims it was error to admit evidence of poverty. This contention must be sustained. It seems to be the rule, supported by a long line of decisions in this state and elsewhere, that evidence of the plaintiff's poverty is inadmissible in an action to recover damages for personal injuries. Green v. Southern Pac. Co., 122 Cal. 563, 55 Pac. 577 [citing Mahony v. S. F., etc., Ry. Co., 110 Cal. 471, 476, 42 Pac. 968, 43 Pac. 518; Malone v. Hawley, 46 Cal. 409; Chicago, etc., R. R. Co. v. Johnson, 103 Ill. 512; Pennsylvania Co. v. Roy, 102 U. S. 451, 26 L. Ed. 141; Central R. R. Co. v. Moore, 61 Ga. 151]; see, also, Story v. Green, 164 Cal. 768, 770, 130 Pac. 870, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 961.

Referring to such testimony, the court said in Green v. Southern Pacific Co., supra:

> "Its only effect and inevitable tendency was undoubtedly to excite the sympathies of the jury and improperly influence their finding upon the question of damages. Such evidence is never admissible in a case of this character, for the very simple reason that the extent of a defendant's responsibility for the results of his negligence is not to be measured by the condition as to affluence or poverty of the injured party at the time of suffering the injury, since that is a condition for which the defendant is in no way responsible."

The respondents seek to justify the introduction of the evidence in the case at bar by the claim that it was offered as a part of the showing that plaintiff suffered "mental worry." The case of Merrill v. Los Angeles G. & E. Co., 158 Cal. 499, 111 Pac. 534, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 559, 139 Am. St. Rep. 134, is relied on to support the ruling admitting this evidence. In that case the court held that the jury might consider worry as a component part of mental suffering for which damages may be awarded. In the discussion of this question in the opinion, the court, in illustrating varying conditions which may enhance or diminish the extent of such suffering, refers to the "nervous temperament of the individual, his ability to stand shock, his financial condition in life, whether dependent upon his own labor or not, the nature of his injuries, whether permanent or temporary, disfiguring and humiliating, and so through a long category, the enumeration of which it is unnecessary here even to attempt." From this language it is sought to draw the conclusion that every fact which might bear upon these considerations, or upon the innumerable other factors of worry which might be imagined may be given in evidence. We think the decision was not intended to have so far-reaching an effect. The single question under discussion was the correctness of an instruction which told the jury that, in estimating damages, they might consider mental worry caused by the injuries. In holding the instruction to be correct, the learned justice writing the opinion saw fit to explain the meaning of the term "mental worry" by a reference to some of the circumstances which might produce such a state of mind. The language used in this regard, while appropriate in an opinion, was not intended to declare a rule of law suitable for incorporation in an instruction to a jury. Nor yet was it intended to declare that direct evidence of all of the matters thus stated by way of illustration was proper to be presented to a jury. On strictly logical grounds it is, perhaps, difficult to say why a plaintiff should not be allowed to show every fact connected with his situation in life. One can conceive of innumerable factors in the life of every individual, and of his relation to others, which might be thought to have some relevance to the extent of worry which would result in case of an injury to him. But logical relevancy is not the sole test of the admissibility of evidence. Certain kinds of evidence, although material to the issue, are excluded because of their tendency to mislead, confuse or prejudice the jury. We think that proof of the poverty of the plaintiff in personal suits is a fair example of the danger of injustice through the introduction of evidence of this kind, which has always, and we think properly, been regarded as outweighing the advantages to be derived from permitting it to be offered. To allow such evidence to go in under the plea that it forms an element to be considered in weighing the worry or other mental suffering occasioned to the plaintiff would be to open the door to its admission in all cases of this kind. Every person sustaining physical injuries will suffer mentally. If, under the guise of showing the extent of such mental suffering, the plaintiff may show his poverty, and consequent worry, he may on the same ground introduce in evidence a mass of circumstances which in themselves would not be proper elements of damage because too remote or speculative, bringing them in by the claim that he suffered increased worry by brooding over these extraneous factors. To allow such evidence at all is to invite parties to actions of this character to confuse the inquiry with an incalculable medley of collateral issues. We think no injustice will be done, and great injustice may be prevented, by adhering to the rule declared in Green v. Southern Pacific Co., and the other cases cited above.

Defendant complains of the following instruction:

> "When the defendant's employés extended the rope between the two moving automobiles it obstructed a space which ordinarily is clear, and is measured as a passage by pedestrians with an eye only to the extent of the space. The fact that this device was necessary to move the rear automobile would not free the defendant from the imputation of negligence. If, as a consequence of such device, it obstructed the street, it was bound to observe due care to apprise or warn other users of the street of the obstruction. The defendant's employés, as they approached this cross-walk were bound to foresee that pedestrians might be there intending to attempt a passage between these automobiles. And you are instructed that the plaintiff, Mrs. Steinberger, had a right to suppose that there was no obstruction by rope or other like attachment of the clear space between the two automobiles thus equipped, save so far as she observed it or her attention was directed to it, if such was the case."

It is urged that this is an instruction on the facts, and prejudicial error. Considering the state of the evidence, this contention must be sustained.

[2] The defendant clearly had a right to tow its machine on the street, provided it exercised due care for the safety of others. What is due care is a question for the jury, based upon the facts and circumstances of the particular case.

[3] It was therefore error to tell the jury that the extending of the rope between the two automobiles placed a burden on the defendant to warn others of the obstruction. Whether or not such warning was necessary depended upon the surrounding conditions, the presence or absence of sufficient light at the crossing, the size and color of the rope, and other pertinent facts in the possession of the jury.

[4] It was also error to tell the jury that Mrs. Steinberger, in the exercise of due care in crossing between the two vehicles, was not bound by the presence of the rope unless she observed it or it was called to her attention Whether or not Mrs. Steinberger was negligent in not seeing the rope was an issue raised by the defendant, and it had a right to have such matter decided by the jury. On the issue of negligence of the defendant and contributory negligence of Mrs. Steinberger, the evidence as set out above is not so overwhelming in favor of the plaintiffs that we can hold the giving of the instruction not prejudicial.

[5] Other instructions declared that the towing of an automobile by a rope is in itself lawful, if due care is exercised, but did not cure the defect in the charge that due care required a warning to be given, regardless of the contingency that the jury might find such warning unnecessary in this particular case.

[6] Other points are made by appellant which should be noticed. The witness Knight, who had driven defendant's rear car, was asked on cross-examination whether he had not stated to Mrs. Steinberger while taking her home after the accident that four other persons had tried to cross between the two machines before they reached the corner where Mrs. Steinberger was injured. Upon his denying the imputed declaration Mrs. Steinberger was recalled and over objection testified to the alleged conversation. The testimony thus elicited was as to a collateral fact which could not be used to impeach Knight. The plaintiffs could not have brought it out as independent evidence, because its only tendency was to show that others could not see the rope, and that Mrs. Steinberger was therefore not negligent in not seeing it, or that the fact that others did not see it should have indicated to Knight that some warning was necessary.

[7] Negligence, or the absence of it, cannot be proved by similar instances (Martinez v. Planel, 36 Cal. 578, and cases cited), and the necessity of a warning to Mrs. Steinberger could only be determined by the surrounding circumstances in her particular case. The effect of permitting such impeachment might have been to discredit the other testimony of Knight, who stated that he had given proper warning, and must therefore be regarded as prejudicial.

[8] On the measure of damages the jury were instructed:

> "In respect of the amount of damages to be awarded to the plaintiff, in case you find a verdict in her favor, I instruct you that in cases of this sort compensation is the measure of damages, and may be awarded for detriment resulting after as well as before the commencement of this action, or certain to result in the future, and may include * * * Fourth. Such reasonable sum as you may award her for the pain and physical and mental suffering, if any, resulting from her said injuries, and which you may find and believe from the testimony she is certain to suffer in the future."

The court then continued:

> "And I further instruct you that the mental worry and distress and grief and mortification and humiliation, if any, which one suffers, or may suffer, by reason of his physical injuries, are in contemplation of law component parts of his mental sufferings for which damages may be awarded. * * *"

It is of this latter portion of which appellant complains on the theory that it permits recovery for future suffering which is not certain to occur. Melone v. Sierra Ry. Co., 151 Cal. 113, 91 Pac. 522, declares the rule as urged by appellant, but we do not think that the instruction complained of violates this rule. It merely explains to the jury what mental suffering comprehends, and that it is one of the elements to be considered. It cannot be taken as an instruction that plaintiffs can recover for suffering which might occur, the preceding portion having already stated that the award must be for mental suffering which Mrs. Steinberger "is certain to suffer in the future."

[9] The defendant's contention that the court's instruction No. 8 is objectionable must be sustained. The last two paragraphs of that instruction seem to convey the idea that, even though the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, she is not barred from a recovery if her negligence was slight. The law of this state does not recognize degrees of negligence, at least in cases of this character.

[10] Negligence is the failure to exercise ordinary care. Any want on the part of the plaintiff of the care which is appropriate to the circumstances is negligence, and, if it be one of the proximate causes of the injury, will prevent a recovery. Civ. Code, § 1714. The instruction in question tells the jury that contributory negligence will not bar a recovery, "if it be so slight as not to amount to a want of ordinary care." This is inaccurate and confusing. The term "contributory negligence" in itself implies a want of ordinary care. If there was such a want, it matters not how slight might have been the deviation from the required standard. If the conduct of the plaintiff did not amount to a want of ordinary care, it did not constitute negligence at all. To speak, therefore, of negligence which is so slight as not to amount to a want of ordinary care is to use terms which are self-contradictory.

Defendant also complains that the trial court erred in giving other instructions requested by plaintiffs and in refusing to give certain instructions submitted by defendant. We find, however, that, while some of the instructions given were not very lucid, this defect was cured by other instructions which did state the law clearly. The defendant's rejected instructions had either been embodied in those given or were not required. This also applies to the additional instructions proposed by the defendant which the court refused to consider because not submitted within the time fixed by the rules of the superior court. Moreover, we have examined these instructions and cannot say that such refusal was an abuse of discretion.

For the errors above indicated the judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed.

PEOPLE v. MILLER. (Cr. 688.)

Indictment and Information 🔑161(5) — Amending Complaint—Prejudice.

Where the original information purported to charge a public offense, and the amended information filed did not charge an offense different from that attempted to be stated in the original information, it did not prejudice defendant or violate Pen. Code, § 1008, allowing amendments to an information, unless the amendment charges an offense not shown by the evidence taken at the preliminary examination, or not charged in the original.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

John Miller was convicted of an offense, and from such judgment and an order denying his motion for new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Henry Brickley, of Merced, and Frank Curtin, of Fresno, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. It is only necessary to say in this case that the original information purported to charge a public offense, and that the amended information as filed, after the request of the district attorney and upon the permission of the court being given, did not charge an offense different from that attempted to be stated in the original information. Consequently the filing of the amended complaint neither prejudiced the defendant nor contravened the provisions of section 1008 of the Penal Code. See People v. Rippe, 32 Cal. App. 514, 163 Pac. 506.

The record does not sustain the contention of counsel for the defendant that the trial court refused to permit him to show upon cross-examination of the complaining witness that the latter was so drunk on the night of the assault with which the defendant is charged as not to be able to identify the defendant as one of the persons who assaulted him. That is all we think need be said as to that assignment of error. No other point in the case requires discussion, and we are satisfied that the evidence sustains the verdict and judgment.

The judgment and order denying defendant's motion for a new trial are affirmed.

SWARTZ v. FILIPELLO et al. (Civ. 2134.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Sept. 19, 1917. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 15, 1917.)

1. Release 🔑34 — Payment of Attorney's Fees—Inference.

In an action by guardian ad litem for personal injuries, defendants setting up that plaintiff, on order of the probate court, compromised and settled with defendants an action for damages brought by her general guardian two years before, the fact that the release executed by the general guardian to defendants made no mention of the payment of attorney's fees afforded no inference that such fees were not paid.

2. Release 🔑34—Receipt of Payment by Guardian—Inference.

That the terms of the release were broad enough to cover any claim that the guardian might have had individually gave rise to no inference that the payment for which the release was given was for any other purpose than compliance with the terms of the compromise sanctioned by the probate court, or that the guardian received any part of it individually.

3. Release 🔑55—Release as Defense—Invalidation by Fraud — Burden of Proof.

In an action by an infant by guardian ad litem for personal injuries, wherein defendants set up that plaintiff, on order of the probate court, compromised with defendants an action for damages brought by her general guardian two years before, the burden was on plaintiff, claiming that the release was procured by fraud, to show that she was misled to her injury, amounting to a legal fraud.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. R. Welch, Judge.

Action by Mary Swartz, by Mary Swartz, her guardian ad litem, against E. A. Filipello and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Beggs & McComish, of San Jose, for appellant. B. A. Herrington, Fry & Jenkins, Geo. W. Waldorf, Jas. P. Sex, and C. M. Lorigan, all of San Jose, for respondents.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendants in an action brought by the plaintiff through her guardian ad litem, for personal injuries sustained by her through the alleged negligence of the defendants. The single question involved on this appeal is whether or not the plaintiff, having upon an order of the probate court, after a hearing, compromised and settled with the defendants an action for damages brought by her general guardian some two years prior to the commencement of this action, may maintain this action without restoring, or offering to restore, the money received in such settlement, both actions being for the same injuries. At the trial of the case, after the plaintiff had introduced evidence tending to support the allegations of the complaint, the defendants introduced the petition which had been filed in said probate department for leave to compromise and settle the former action. They also introduced the order of that court, authorizing such settlement upon payment to the guardian of Mary Swartz of the sum of $1,000 and of plaintiff's attorney's fees and costs in that action. Over wholly untenable objections of the plaintiff the defendants also introduced in evidence the contract of settlement entered into pursuant to said order of court, under the terms of which said guardian, in "consideration of the payment to him of $1,000 * * * in his individual capacity and as the guardian of the person and estate of Mary Swartz, a minor, does hereby acknowledge full payment and satisfaction of each and every claim or demand of damages, or otherwise, had or claimed by him, either individually or as guardian of the person and estate of Mary Swartz, a minor, or by the said Mary Swartz, a minor against" the defendants.

Plaintiff claims that under the law in this state neither the return of the consideration, nor offer thereof, received under a settlement or release in an action obtained by the fraud of the other party thereto, is a condition precedent to the maintenance of another action for the same injuries; and she cites Meyer v. Haas, 126 Cal. 560, 58 Pac. 1042, to sustain that position. Assuming the principle to be as broad as asserted by plaintiff, the fact is that she made no claim of any kind in the trial court that any fraud or deceit had been practiced upon her in the settlement of her claim. The objection to the introduction of the agreement of release contained no intimation, as appears to be suggested, that the plaintiff intended to impeach the release because of fraud. Moreover, after the release was admitted in evidence the plaintiff made no offer nor any attempt to explain the circumstances under which the release was obtained. And now, although at the trial she objected to the admission of the contract of settlement, her only claim that fraud was perpetrated upon her is based upon certain language contained in that instrument, to the effect that the $1,000 was received in payment of every demand by the minor and by her guardian as such and individually. Upon that language she argues (the contention apparently being made in this court for the first time) that it must be assumed that she did not get the whole of the $1,000 as directed by the order of court, but that part of it by the connivance of the defendants was paid to the guardian individually. it is also claimed that the receipt and release fails to show that the defendants paid the fees of the plaintiff's attorneys in that action as provided in the order authorizing the compromise and settlement.

[1-3] In our opinion the fact that the release makes no mention of the payment of the attorney's fees affords no inference that they were not paid; and that its terms are broad enough to cover any claim that the guardian might have had individually was doubtless due to that tendency to prolixity that many attorneys indulge in in drafting papers of this character, and certainly gives rise to no inference that the payment for which the release was given was for any other purpose than compliance with the terms of the compromise judicially sanctioned, or that the guardian received any part of it individually. In any event the release is susceptible to a construction showing that it was fair and free from trick or artifice practiced by any one connected with the transaction. This being so, and the burden being upon the plaintiff, if she made any such claim, to show that she was misled to her injury, amounting to a legal fraud, it follows, in the absence of such showing, that the action of the trial court in instructing the jury to bring in a verdict in favor of the defendants was correct.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

TORREY v. REFRIGERATION PLANTS MFG. CO. (Civ. 1888.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Sept. 18, 1917.)

1. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT ⚷89(8)—ACTIONS FOR COMPENSATION—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Evidence held sufficient to support finding of trial court that at the time of settlement between plaintiff and defendant, his employer, of a dispute as to wages, plaintiff's wages were reduced from $175 to $131.25 per month, and that after settlement plaintiff continued in defendant's employ at the latter salary.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR ⚷1011(1)—FINDINGS OF FACT—CONCLUSIVENESS.

Where there is a conflict in the evidence as to salary at which plaintiff was employed by defendant, findings of trial court will not be disturbed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Grant Jackson, Judge.

Action by L. L. Torrey against the Refrigeration Plants Manufacturing Company. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. R. Young, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Shirley E. Meserve and W. A. Sumner, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. The appeal in this case was taken from a judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff. It is claimed that the evidence is insufficient to support certain findings, made by the trial judge. Plaintiff, during the latter part of the year 1913, was employed by the defendant. The general character of his employment was that of salesman of stock of the defendant corporation and salesman of certain machines manufactured by it. It seems to be admitted that, at least for a short period during the early part of his employment, he was to receive the sum of $175 per month. Later, and before January 1, 1914, defendant reduced the compensation of all of its employés. If the reduction affected the compensation of the plaintiff, plaintiff would be entitled to receive, instead of $175 per month, the sum of $131.25 per month. On or about March 16th, settlement not having been made with the plaintiff, the manager of the defendant adjusted the account for compensation of plaintiff by agreeing to pay him $500 in cash and $500 thereafter. In making up this account or settlement of the wages of plaintiff for that period of time subsequent to the date when the general reduction was made in employés' salaries, the sum of $131.25 per month was allowed to the plaintiff. Plaintiff continued to work for the defendant for five months subsequent to March 16, 1914. At the end of that time he brought this suit to recover unpaid balance due on the settlement made March 16th; also to recover wages at the rate of $175 per month for the time subsequent thereto. The trial judge made a finding that plaintiff was entitled to recover for the time subsequent to March 16th at the rate of $131.25. This finding is attacked as being wholly unsupported by the evidence. Plaintiff on his side testified that he never agreed to the reduction being made in the amount of his compensation, to wit, from $175 to $131.25, but that the March settlement was agreed to by him as a compromise and because the defendant at that time claimed, through its manager, that business was poor and it was lacking in funds. On the other hand, the manager of defendant testified that it was his understanding prior to March 16th that for the most part the plaintiff was working on a commission basis which had been agreed to be 20 per cent. of the amount of sales. He testified that after making the settlement of March 16th he informed the plaintiff that, if the plaintiff continued to work for the defendant, he would be paid upon a commission basis only; that no fixed salary would be allowed. Plaintiff denied that any such statement was made, and testified that after the terms of the settlement were agreed upon he was told to go back to work, and nothing was said further as to what his compensation would be. He insisted and repeated in the course of his testimony that he claimed $175 per month for the whole time. Appellant's counsel contends that under this state of the case the court should either have found that the salary agreed to be paid to plaintiff was $175 per month for the five months subsequent to March 16th, or should have found, agreeable to the contention of defendant's manager, that the compensation of plaintiff after March 16th was to be determined wholly upon a commission basis. We think there was evidence to sustain the finding of the court as made. The mere statement of the plaintiff that he claimed $175 per month was a conclusion on his part as to what he was legally entitled to. The trial court had to determine from the facts as to whether there had been a reduction made in the plaintiff's compensation from $175 per month to $131.25, and also as to whether plaintiff was working on a commission or a salary basis after March 16th. There was evidence sufficient upon which the court could find that the reduction was made in the compensation of plaintiff prior to March 16th; and if the statement of the plaintiff was true (as the court evidently concluded) that after the settlement of March 16th was made he was told to go back to work and nothing was said as to what his future compensation should be, the inference would be justified that the plaintiff was then continuing in the employ of defendant at the reduced salary. There was sharp conflict in the evidence introduced on all the material issues involved. The matter of resolving the facts was one exclusively within the province of the trial judge. We think there was evidence to sustain the findings.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; SHAW, J.

PEOPLE v. MAR FOW. (Cr. 692.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Sept. 17, 1917.)

HOMICIDE ⚿30(1)—PRINCIPAL—LIABILITY.

Where defendant and three others pursued and killed deceased, defendant firing a shot which inflicted a serious though not necessarily fatal injury, defendant is, under Pen. Code, § 31, declaring that all persons concerned in the commission of a crime are principals, guilty of murder, for he rendered most effective aid to the one who fired the fatal shot, and it is unnecessary to show any connection or conspiracy between deceased's assailants.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; F. B. Ogden, Judge.

Mar Fow was convicted of murder in the first degree, and, from a judgment and order denying new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Snook & Church, of Oakland, for appellant.
U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. The defendant was convicted of murder in the first degree and sentenced to imprisonment for life, and appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The only point seriously urged for a reversal of the case is that the evidence is insufficient to establish, so as to justify the verdict of the jury, either that the defendant killed the deceased or aided and abetted in said killing.

The person killed was of Chinese nationality, as is also the defendant and two other persons who with the defendant pursued the deceased across a public street in the city of Oakland, firing revolvers at him, as the result of which attack he died. Four gunshot wounds were inflicted upon the deceased, of which two with 38-caliber and one with a 32-caliber bullet. One of the 38-caliber bullet wounds was necessarily fatal, and the wound made by the 32-caliber pistol, although serious, was not necessarily a fatal wound. The defendant, pursued and apprehended immediately after the killing, had on his person a 32-caliber pistol, of which at least one of its charges had been fired. The appellant's argument is that, since the fatal wound was caused by a 38-caliber bullet, and it is not shown that the defendant fired any but a bullet of 32-caliber, he cannot lawfully be convicted as a principal in the crime unless there be evidence that the killing was the result of a conspiracy in which he participated, or unless the evidence shows that he aided in the crime of his fellow countrymen.

Section 31 of the Penal Code provides that all persons concerned in the commission of a crime are principals.

In the present case there is much evidence from which the existence of a conspiracy between the defendant and his two companions to kill the deceased might justly be inferred, as, for instance, that the defendant and his companions were acting together in their pursuit of the deceased, and that the murder occurred during the existence of and as part of a tong war between two associations of one of which the deceased was a member, and to the other of which the defendant—and presumably his companions—belonged; and that the defendant immediately after the killing fled to his tong's headquarters. But we think it is not necessary to rely on this principle of law to uphold the verdict and judgment, for we think the facts outlined as to the defendant's participation in the offense clearly amount to an aiding and abetting. The wound inflicted by the 32-caliber bullet was of so serious, although not necessarily fatal, character that the jury were entitled to infer that it had contributed to the death of the deceased. The common pursuit of the deceased by the three persons intent upon his murder was in itself aid of the most effective character one to the other, as much so, in our opinion, as if one of them had seized their fleeing victim and held him down while the other two killed him. The cases cited by the appellant from other jurisdictions which appear to take a different view of the character of the common action of two or more persons in a simultaneous attack upon another do not commend themselves to us as based on sound reasoning. We prefer to follow a case decided in our own courts, People v. Petruzo, 13 Cal. App. 569, 581, 110 Pac. 324, 329, in which it was said:

> "It certainly would be a reproach to the law if it countenanced the doctrine that where A. and B. deliberately and unlawfully fire at C. with intention to kill him, and one shot takes effect causing his death, but it is uncertain whether A. or B. fired it, neither can be convicted of murder unless a conspiracy should be shown between them. In any rational view, each must be considered as aiding and abetting the other, and both responsible for the homicide."

⚿For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

It is evident that the same reasoning applies to a case where both fire at the deceased, and it is apparent whose shot proved fatal.

For the reasons given, the contention of the appellant must be disallowed, and the judgment and order affirmed. It is so ordered.

FIRESTONE TIRE & RUBBER CO.
v. C. E. HERRICK, Inc.
(Civ. 1811.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Sept. 18, 1917.)

1. Corporations 🔑513(4)—Actions—Pleading—Authority of Agent—Sufficiency.

In an action against a corporation on money orders accepted by it, the allegation that defendant in writing accepted the orders and promised to pay sufficiently alleged that the acceptance was by a duly authorized agent; the fact of the authorized agency being evidence, and not the ultimate fact to be proved.

2. Corporations 🔑521—Actions—Judgments—Sufficiency of Findings.

In an action against a corporation on money orders accepted by it, a finding that defendant in writing accepted the orders and promised to pay them was sufficient, and it was not necessary to find that the orders were properly indorsed and executed by a duly authorized officer or agent of the corporation acting for the corporation.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by the Firestone Tire & Rubber Company against C. E. Herrick, Incorporated. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Jas. P. Sweeney, of San Francisco, for appellant. Henry A. Jacobs, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal by defendant from a judgment in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $376.92, the amount of two orders for the payment of money accepted by defendant, together with interest and costs. But two points are urged in support of the appeal, neither of which can be seriously entertained.

[1] The first is the alleged error of the trial court in overruling defendant's demurrer to the complaint. It is claimed that the complaint failed to state a cause of action for the reason that it contained no allegation "that the defendant corporation by its duly authorized officer or agent indorsed the acceptance on the instrument sued upon as agent or officer for the corporation." But it is alleged directly in the complaint as to each of the two orders in question that "defendant in writing accepted said order and promised to pay the same." The ultimate fact to be alleged and proven was the acceptance of the orders by the corporation; and while the proof of such an allegation would consist in showing that the person executing the acceptance was thereunto duly authorized, no averment of such authorization was necessary in the complaint. As was said in the case of Topeka Capital Co. v. Remington Paper Co., 61 Kan. 6, 59 Pac. 1062:

> "The acts of a corporation are necessarily done through its agents. But a cause of action against a corporation, founded on the acts of its agents, should be alleged directly against the corporation itself. The acts constituting the cause of action should be alleged as the acts of the corporation. It is not necessary to aver that they were done by and through the authorized agents of the corporation."

The trial court did not err in overruling the defendant's demurrer.

[2] The second and closely related point urged by the appellant is that the findings do not support the judgment because there is no finding to the effect "that the orders were properly indorsed and executed by a duly authorized officer or agent of the corporation acting for the corporation." The court, however, does find as to each of the orders in question "that said defendant in writing accepted said order and promised to pay the same." This was the ultimate fact to be alleged and found, and it was not necessary for the court to find the probative fact of the due authorization of the person acting for the corporation, since there was no such issue in the case. Moreover, in its cross-complaint the defendant admitted the acceptance of these orders. The second contention of the appellant must therefore be rejected.

Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. DUEBER. (Cr. 394.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 19, 1917.)

1. Criminal Law 🔑1202(5)—Sale of Drugs—Prosecution—Sufficiency of Verdict—Statute.

Under Pen. Code, § 1158, providing that, whenever the fact of a previous conviction of another offense is charged, the jury, if they find a verdict of guilty, must also find whether or not defendant has suffered such previous conviction, in a prosecution for violating St. 1907, p. 124, § 8, as amended, by selling, giving away, or having in possession cocaine or morphine, where the information charged two previous convictions of defendant of violating such section, a verdict of guilty which did not specifically find on the alleged previous convictions of defendant was incomplete and insufficient to authorize judgment thereon; defendant, when arraigned, having made no plea or answer to the previous convictions.

2. Criminal Law 🔑1202(5)—Verdict—Finding on Allegation of Prior Conviction—Statute.

In the cases to which Pen. Code, § 1158, is applicable, where the jury fails to make such specific finding, the omission is fatal to the judgment, unless the subsequent crime charged is itself one for the commission of which it is within the jurisdiction of the superior court to impose punishment.

3. Criminal Law 🔑1202(5)—Verdict—Finding on Allegation of Prior Convictions—Statutes.

Pen. Code, § 1158, providing that whenever the fact of a previous conviction of another offense is charged, the jury, if they find a verdict of guilty, must also find whether or not defendant has suffered such previous conviction, was not intended to apply exclusively to sections 666, 667, prescribing aggravated penalties in cases of prior convictions of certain offenses.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; D. M. Young, Judge.

Byron Dueber was convicted of an offense, and from the judgment and an order denying him new trial, he appeals. Judgment and order reversed.

Walter F. Lynch, of Stockton, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. The defendant was, by a jury, in the superior court of San Joaquin county adjudged guilty of violating section 8 of an act of the Legislature prohibiting, under certain specified conditions, the sale of poisons. See Stats. 1907, p. 124, Stats. 1909, p. 422, Stats. 1911, p. 1106, Stats. 1913, p. 692, and Stats. 1915, p. 863. He appeals from the judgment and the order denying him a new trial.

Section 8 of said act, as amended by the Legislature of 1913 (Stats. 1913, pp. 692, 695, supra), provides that it shall be unlawful for any person, etc., to sell, furnish, give away or offer to sell, furnish, or give away, or to have in their or his possession certain specifically named poisons, including cocaine and morphine, or any of the salts, derivatives, or compounds thereof, or any preparation or compound containing any of the "foregoing substances" or their salts, derivatives or compounds, excepting upon the written order or prescription of a physician, dentist, or veterinary surgeon, licensed to practice in this state, etc. "Such order or prescription," proceeds said section, "shall be permanently retained on file by the person, firm or corporation who shall compound or dispense the articles ordered or prescribed and it shall not be again compounded or dispensed if each fluid or avoirdupois ounce contains more than * * * 1 grain of morphine * * * or 1 grain of cocaine, * * * excepting upon the written order of the prescriber for each and every subsequent compounding or dispensing."

It is further provided by said section that the foregoing provisions thereof "shall not apply to sales at wholesale by jobbers, wholesalers, and manufacturers to pharmacies, as defined in section 1 of an act entitled 'An act to regulate the practice of pharmacy in the state of California and to provide a penalty for the violation thereof, and for the appointment of a board to be known as the California State Board of Pharmacy,' approved March 20, 1905, and acts amendatory thereof; or physicians, nor to each other, nor to the sale at retail in pharmacies by pharmacists to physicians, dentists or veterinary surgeons duly licensed to practice in this state." The exceptions thus provided by the section are subject to certain conditions prescribed thereby. Section 7 of said act, as amended by the Legislature of 1915 (Stats. 1915, p. 863, supra), in part provides:

> "Any person violating any of the provisions of section eight * * * of this act shall, upon conviction, be punished as follows, viz.: For the first offense, by a fine of not less than one hundred dollars, and not to exceed four hundred dollars, or by imprisonment for not less than fifty days and not exceeding one hundred and eighty days, or by both such fine and imprisonment; for the second offense, by a fine of not less than two hundred and fifty dollars, and not to exceed five hundred dollars, or by imprisonment for not less than ninety days and not exceeding six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment; and for the third offense, by imprisonment in the state prison for not less than one year and not more than five years."

The information alleges that the defendant, on or about the 28th day of September, 1916, at and in the county of San Joaquin, did "sell, furnish and give away, and have in his possession hydrochloride of cocaine containing more than one-sixth grain of cocaine to the fluid or avoirdupois ounce, and morphine and sulphate of the alkaloid of morphine, containing more than one-quarter grain of morphine to the fluid or avoirdupois ounce, and said sale and possession was not upon the written order or prescription of a physician, dentist, or veterinary surgeon, licensed to practice in the state of California." It is then alleged that the sale and the possession so charged are not within the cases expressly excepted by said section 8 from the provisions thereof interdicting such sale and possession. The information then charges two previous convictions of the defendant of violating the provisions of said section.

The assignments of error upon which the defendant relies for a reversal are: (1) That the information fails to state facts sufficient to confer jurisdiction upon the superior court to try the charge alleged therein; (2) that the trial court prejudiced the rights of the accused by refusing to grant his motion that the people be required to elect and designate the particular offense of the several which it is asserted are charged under the statute and to the establishment of which they intended particularly to address the proofs; (3) that the court misdirected the jury in matters of law; (4) that the verdict as returned by the jury was incomplete and insufficient to authorize the superior court to pronounce judgment thereon, inasmuch as the jury did not specifically find upon the alleged previous convictions of the defendant.

[1] We think the point last stated must be sustained, and consideration of the other points relied upon may therefore be waived. Section 1158 of the Penal Code provides:

> "Whenever the fact of a previous conviction of another offense is charged in an indictment or information, the jury, if they find a verdict of guilty of the offense with which he is charged, must also, unless the answer of the defendant admits the charge, find whether or not he has suffered such previous conviction. The verdict of the jury upon a charge of previous conviction may be: 'We find the charge of previous conviction true,' or 'We find the charge of previous conviction not true,' as they find that the defendant has or has not suffered such conviction."

The record here discloses that, when arraigned, the defendant made no plea or answer to the previous convictions charged against him in the information, and that the jury made no special finding as to the said prior convictions, the verdict found and returned being general and reading as follows:

"We, the jury in the above-entitled cause, find the defendant, Byron Dueber, guilty as charged."

It is, of course, but the statement of a self-evident proposition to say that the authority of the superior court to impose judgment of sentence in a case arising under the statute upon which this prosecution is founded rests wholly upon the fact of two prior convictions of the accused under the provisions thereof, and that the fact of such prior convictions must be alleged and proved, or admitted by the defendant.

The contention of the Attorney General is that, while it is true that the first and second violations of the statute are each mere simple misdemeanors, yet, when a third offense thereunder is committed by the same party, the three, taken together—that is, the two distinct offenses of which he had previously been convicted and the third offense charged—constitute a specific felony, the same as if the charge involved but one act or transaction, and in support of this view he cites People v. Delany, 49 Cal. 394. It is hence argued that a verdict found, as in this case, of "guilty as charged," necessarily covers and includes every issue made by the information or indictment in a case of this character and every element of which the "specific felony" so charged is constituted. The Attorney General further contends that the requirement of section 1158 that a special finding of the previous convictions alleged must be made applies only to certain sections of the Penal Code prescribing aggravated penalties in cases of prior convictions of certain offenses. See Pen. Code, §§ 666, 667.

[2] We do not conceive it to be important to the decision of the point upon which, as declared above, we find ourselves constrained to reverse this case to consider whether a distinct and independent felony is committed where there exists and is charged against the accused a combination of a previous conviction of a certain public offense with the specific offense subsequently committed and charged. This, though, appears to be the view expressed in People v. Delany, 49 Cal. 394, supra. But whatever may be the correct legislative theory of the Code sections referred to—whether it was to make the prior convictions essential elements of a distinct and specific felony, or merely to make it imperative for the superior court to impose aggravated punishments upon those possessed of a confirmed habitude for the commission of petty and other crimes—the indisputable proposition remains that the Legislature has, without qualification, ordained, by the enactment of section 1158 of the Penal Code, that where a previous conviction of the accused is charged, the jury must, unless the answer of the defendant to the charge of a previous conviction admits it to be true, find whether or not he has suffered such previous conviction; and in those cases to which section 1158 is applicable, under the circumstances pointed out by said section, where the jury fail to make such specific finding, the omission is fatal to the judgment, unless the subsequent crime charged is itself one for the commission of which it is within the jurisdiction of the superior court to impose punishment.

This precise question arose in the case of People v. Eppinger, 109 Cal. 294, 41 Pac. 1037, wherein the court, speaking through Mr. Justice Henshaw, said, inter alia:

"A more serious objection is found in the form of the verdict returned * * * upon the general issue. The defendant, having pleaded not guilty, put the prosecution to proof upon all material averments, of which that of prior conviction was one. The jury did not find specifically upon this issue as they were required to do by section 1158 of the Penal Code, but returned a verdict finding the defendant guilty as charged. * * * The verdict rendered should be treated as a finding against the defendant upon the crime charged, and in favor of the defendant upon the question of prior conviction."

And upon this ground the judgment was reversed.

[3] We are unable to coincide with the contention that section 1158 of the Penal Code was intended to apply exclusively to sections 666 and 667 of said Code. Section 1158 is, as we have in effect said and as is plainly true, in general and unqualified language, and neither from said language nor from any reason rationally arising from the natural theory of such a rule of law are we to conclude or even infer that it was not intended to apply to any case, whether provided for before and at the time of its enactment or that might thereafter be provided for, in which a person charged with a public offense might have pleaded and proved against him the fact of his having suffered a previous conviction of a crime for the purpose of authorizing a more drastic punishment for the crime charged than would be inflicted where such prior conviction had not been brought up against him and proved. The section seems to us to be very plain upon this proposition. It says that "whenever the fact of a previous conviction of another offense is charged in an indictment or information," etc., and thus, as we construe the language, a general rule of procedure as to all of the cases of the class to which the section refers is promulgated and laid down. The words "another offense" cannot reasonably be held to mean some other different kind or character of offense from the one subsequently committed. If such were the intended signification of those words, then the section would not apply to many cases of previous convictions and certainly not to the case contemplated by subdivision 3 of section 666. But we think that clearly by section 1158 the Legislature has in effect declared: That to avoid any doubt as to the effect of the verdict in any such cases, the jury must, unless the admission of the accused in reference thereto renders it unnecessary for them to pass upon that question, make a specific finding upon an issue involved therein which must of necessity exert an influence upon the question of the extent of the punishment which may be imposed, and, indeed, the decision of which so far as it applies to subdivision 3 of section 666 and even to the present case, is determinative of the question whether the superior court shall be empowered to impose any punishment at all. This, to our minds, is the only reasonable conclusion as to the scope and effect of section 1158. In fact, it seems to us that if the Legislature had intended to limit the application of said section to the provisions of sections 666 and 667 of said Code, it would have so phrased the former section as to read:

> "Whenever the fact of a previous conviction of another offense is charged in an indictment or information, as provided in sections 666 and 667 of this Code," etc.

There is no other legal course open to us but to reverse the judgment and the order, and it is so ordered.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; BURNETT, J.

PEOPLE v. SMALL. (Cr. 620.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Sept. 17, 1917. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 15, 1917.)

PROSTITUTION 🔑4—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In prosecution for pandering, evidence, though largely hearsay, held sufficient to warrant finding of jury that house in which girl in question was placed as inmate by defendant was at that time house of prostitution.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; F. B. Ogden, Judge.

Charles Small was convicted of pandering, and appeals. Affirmed.

A. M. Armstrong, of Oakland, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. There is but one point made in this case, and that is that the judgment finding the defendant guilty of pandering is not sustained by the evidence because it was not shown that the house in which the girl in question was placed as an inmate was at that time a house of prostitution. While it is true that the evidence as to the nature of the house bears largely upon the reputation of the house, nevertheless we are satisfied that even though it be hearsay it is sufficient to warrant and support the finding of the jury as to the character of the establishment at the time the girl was placed there by the defendant.

That is the only point made worthy of discussion. The judgment and order denying defendant's motion for a new trial are therefore affirmed.

PARKE v. BOARD OF TRUSTEES OF FIREMEN'S RELIEF AND PENSION FUND et al. (Civ. 2005.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Sept. 15, 1917. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 12, 1917.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑200—FIRE DEPARTMENT—BENEFIT FUND—EXTRA MAN—"MEMBER OF FIRE DEPARTMENT."

Minor children of an extra man in employ of fire department of city of Oakland, whose hours, duties, and pay were different from those of regular firemen, but who contributed monthly out of his pay to the firemen's relief and pension fund, are entitled to compensation out of such fund in case of the death of their father from natural causes, since he was a member of the department within meaning of the city charter, and in view of ordinance of July 8, 1911.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Member.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; William H. Waste, Judge.

Action by Ireene Parke, as guardian of Stanley Emerson Parke and Lauramae Parke, against the Board of Trustees of the Fireman's Relief and Pension Fund and others. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Paul C. Morf, City Atty., G. E. Jackson, Asst. City Atty., and John J. Earle, Deputy City Atty., all of Oakland, for appellants. George Samuels and Irving Magnes, both of Oakland, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal by defendants from a judgment granting to plaintiff a writ of mandate addressed to the defendants, the Board of Trustees of the Firemen's Relief and Pension Fund of the city of Oakland, and its members, directing them to pay to the plaintiff the sum of $1,000.

The question to be decided is whether or not the minor children of James H. Parke, deceased, who was at the time of his death and had been for a period of ten years prior thereto an "extra man" in the employ of the fire department of said city, are entitled to the death benefit of $1,000 provided for in subsection 2 of section 104 of the city charter of 1911. If under his employment as an "extra man" Parke is to be regarded as having been a "member" of the department, then the plaintiff was, as decided by the superior court, entitled to the relief demanded.

The undisputed facts are as follows: On July 12, 1905, Parke was appointed to the position of extra man in said fire department, at which time what is known as the old city charter of Oakland was in force. Under the provisions of that charter there can be no question but that an extra man was a member of the department. In the year 1911 the present charter became effective, the pertinent portions of which applicable to the fire department read as follows:

"Sec. 97. The fire department shall consist of a chief of the fire department, an assistant chief of the fire department, a second assistant chief of the fire department, as many battalion chiefs as the council may deem necessary, a superintendent of engines and as many captains, lieutenants, engineers, drivers, tillerman, stokers, truckmen and hosemen as the council may deem necessary, and also such other employés as the council may provide for by ordinance. The officers and members of the fire department shall receive annual compensations, comprising their salaries and an allowance of two dollars per month for the firemen's relief and pension fund herein provided for, as follows: * * * All members of the fire department, appointed prior to September 1, 1910, and in good standing at the time this charter goes into effect, shall be retained in their respective positions except as otherwise in this charter provided. * * *

"Sec. 98. No person shall become a member of the fire department unless he shall be a citizen of the United States, of good character for honesty and sobriety, able to read and write the English language, and a resident of the city of Oakland for at least five years next preceding his appointment. * * * Every appointee of the department shall be not less than 21 nor more than 35 years of age, and before his appointment must pass a satisfactory examination under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Civil Service Board."

Section 99 provides that the officers enumerated in section 97 "and all other officers and members shall be appointed by the commissioner of public health and safety, subject to the civil service provisions of this charter. * * *"

"Sec. 100. Each member of the fire department shall be entitled to fifteen days vacation annually with full pay; such vacations shall be had at such times as the chief of the fire department shall direct. Each member of the fire department shall be allowed a leave of absence of not less than 24 hours duration not less than once each week, with full pay. A member becoming incapacitated for duty by reason of sickness shall be entitled to thirty days sick leave without loss of pay. If such sickness continue he shall be entitled to half-pay for a period of thirty days, and if such sickness shall further continue he shall receive such pay, if any, as the council shall direct. A member on sick leave shall present such certificate of a reputable physician as the chief of the fire department may direct."

The provisions of the charter relating to the pension fund having a bearing on this case provide as follows:

Section 102 provides that a "member" of the department who has been such actively for twenty years, and who has arrived at the age of 55 years, and by reason of disability is unfit for the performance of his duty, may be retired, and shall receive a monthly pension equal to one-half the salary attached to the rank held by him one year prior to the date of retirement.

Section 103 provides that "any member of the department who shall become physically disabled by reason of any bodily injury received in the performance of his duty * * * may be retired from the department upon an annual pension equal to one-half the amount of salary attached to the rank he held one year prior to the date of such retirement * * * to cease on his death."

Section 104, subd. 1, provides a pension for the family of an officer, member or employé of the department who may be killed while in the performance of his duty.

Subdivision 2 of said last-mentioned section reads: "When a member of the department shall die from causes other than those specified in subdivision 1 of this section after ten years of service, then his widow, and if there be no widow, then his children, and if there be no widow or children, then his mother, if dependent upon him for support, shall be entitled to the sum of one thousand dollars."

Subd. 3. "Any member of the fire department receiving a pension from the firemen's relief and pension fund who shall be convicted of a felony, shall become dissipated (or) an habitual drunkard * * * shall forfeit all right to said pension."

Subdivision 4 of the same section provides that any "member of the fire department may be rewarded for conduct which is heroic and meritorious."

And subdivision 9 reads: "The treasurer shall retain from the compensation of each member of the fire department two dollars per month, which shall forthwith be paid into the firemen's relief and pension fund. * * *"

On July 8, 1911, the city council passed an ordinance which, pursuant to section 97 quoted above, enumerated the officers and persons to be employed in the fire department of the city, and fixed the compensation of such officers and employés in cases in which the charter had not done so. Section 2 of that ordinance provides:

"Extra men at $32 per month each, which sum includes an allowance of $2.00 per month each for the firemen's relief and pension fund."

From and after the passage of said ordinance, Parke, under his original appointment of July 12, 1905, continued in service as an extra man in the fire department until the 9th day of September, 1915. During all of such time the city paid to him the sum of $30 per month, and also paid into the fireman's relief and pension fund the sum of $2 per month as the allowance established by said ordinance. On said last-mentioned day he died, death being due to natural causes. He left surviving him two minor children, of whom plaintiff is the general guardian and for whose benefit this proceeding is prosecuted. The features distinguishing the duties, responsibilities, and privileges of extra men from those of regular firemen may be said to be that regular firemen are on duty at the engine houses 24 hours a day for six days a week, and receive a higher rate of pay than extra men; while the latter are not compelled to live at the engine houses (but may do so if they choose), and are free to engage in any other employment. They are, however, at all times bound to respond to fire alarms in their respective districts. In the compensation of the extra men, as in that of their fellow employés of the fire department, there is included the monthly sum of $2, which is paid over to the relief and pension fund. Extra men assist in keeping the fire houses and apparatus in order, and while on active duty the services of both classes of employés are substantially the same; in other words, while on duty fighting fires the duties of extra men are just as exacting and no less onerous than those of the regular firemen.

It is the contention of the defendants in urging their appeal that the present charter of the city of Oakland makes a clear distinction between "members" and "employés" of the fire department; that "extra men" are not recognized as members, and are to be classed as "employés"; and that under the provisions of section 104, subds. 1 and 2, above set out, while death benefits are granted to the family of either a "member" or an "employé" who may be killed while in the performance of his duty, the allowance to the family in the event of death otherwise occasioned is limited to the case of "members" only.

We think this position cannot be successfully maintained. Under the terms of the old charter, Parke was admittedly a "member" of the department, and with his family was entitled to the relief provided therein by the pension fund. We are of the opinion that the provision of the new charter (section 97) that all "members" of the fire department in good standing at the time it went into effect should be retained in their respective positions plainly implies that all persons occupying the grades enumerated in said section, "and * * * such other employés as the council may provide for by ordinance," come within the designation "member" of the fire department. The charter sections hereinabove referred to prescribe the age, residence, and qualifications of employés of the department (section 98); when and to what extent they shall be entitled to a vacation or leave of absence on account of sickness (section 100); under what circumstances such persons shall be entitled to a pension for physical disability (section 103) or forfeit the right to a pension or be entitled to a reward for heroic and meritorious conduct—and in all of these and other instances in the charter the employés of the department are referred to as members; and we have no doubt that in these instances extra men are included in such designation. We certainly do not think that when the charter framers drafted the provisions of the charter here under consideration they had in mind and intended to declare that extra men should not be regarded as "members" of the department and not entitled to pensions. Moreover, from an examination of the whole charter it is apparent to us that the words "officers," "employés," and "members" are used synonymously and interchangeably. They were so used in the provisions here relating to the fire department.

Counsel for the defendants enters into an elaborate argument to demonstrate that the charter recognizes the distinction insisted upon by him; but his reasoning, while plausible, is not convincing. We think his construction of the provision under consideration is technical and narrow, and that it, being beneficent in character, should be liberally construed. So construed we think the trial court correctly apprehended its meaning and effect.

The judgment is affirmed.

STARBUCK v. CITY OF FULLERTON et al.

(Civ. 2293.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Sept. 18, 1917.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑279—INITIATIVE AND REFERENDUM.

The right of initiative and referendum reserved to electors of municipalities by Const. art. 4, § 1, and the machinery for the execution of which is provided by St. 1915, p. 319, was not designed to furnish a means by which local improvements might be either commenced or prevented, and an ordinance for a local improvement cannot be referred to the electorate.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; W. H. Thomas, Judge.

Petition by Flora J. Starbuck for a writ of mandate against the City of Fullerton and others. From a judgment denying the petition, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

C. R. Allen and Chas. Cassat Davis, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. E. J. Marks and Homer C. Ames, both of Fullerton, for respondents.

JAMES, J. Plaintiff's petition for a writ of mandate was denied in the superior court, and she appeals from the judgment. The question presented is as to whether a resolution adopted by the board of trustees of the city of Fullerton, wherein such trustees declared it to be their intention to open a public street over certain property and within the boundaries of a certain district which was described as embracing property to be benefited by the improvement, and which it was the intention to assess to pay the costs and expenses thereof, was subject to the referendum provisions of the Constitution of the state and the acts of the Legislature.

From the stipulation of facts it appeared that there were 19 several owners of land within the district described in the resolution, 15 of whom were consenting owners, the plaintiff being one of those not consenting; that there were 1,200 qualified electors residing within the city of Fullerton and 20 qualified electors residing within the assessment district; that there were 10,755 acres of land within the corporate limits of the city of Fullerton, and about 264 acres of land within the assessment district. It was further stipulated that on the 26th day of January, 1916, a petition duly signed by a sufficient number of qualified electors of the city of Fullerton was filed with the city clerk and presented to the board of trustees, which petition requested that the resolution be either repealed or submitted to a vote of the electors of the city; that the city clerk refused to certify to the sufficiency of the petition, and the board of trustees refused to either reconsider or repeal the resolution, or submit it to a vote. The Constitution of the state reserves to the electors of cities the right to initiate legislation and to have proposed legislation referred to a vote. This right is, as is stated in the Constitution, "to be exercised under such procedure as may be provided by law." Cal. Const. art. 4, § 1. The Legislature in 1912 (St. [Ex. Sess.] 1911, p. 131) adopted an act to provide the necessary procedure to enable electors of cities to enjoy the right secured to them under the provision of the Constitution. This act was amended in its general substance by the Legislature in 1915 (Stats. 1915, p. 319), and provides that proposed ordinances are subject to the initiative and referendum. For the purposes of this case we may assume, although that matter is made the subject of discussion in the briefs, that a resolution of intention such as that adopted by the board of trustees of the city of Fullerton was in effect an ordinance. The question, then, is squarely presented as to whether an ordinance adopted by the legislative body of a municipality and which, while legislative in character, is one designed to provide for improvements local to a part of the city only, is one against which the right of referendum can be invoked. If the right of referendum can be invoked in such a case, then the corollary right to initiate legislation of the same kind must be conceded to exist. If the latter right does exist, it then follows that a proceeding may be initiated by electors of a distant part of a city to compel the opening of a street in another part of the same city and to have the costs thereof assessed upon property owners other than the electors who both initiate and decide upon the advisability of having the improvement made. We think that the initiative and referendum were not intended, nor are they designed, to apply to such a case. Our Supreme Court has, in the case of Hopping v. Council of the City of Richmond, 170 Cal. 605, 150 Pac. 977, considered the general subject involved as applied to an ordinance or resolution affecting electors or property owners of an entire city, and the court there, as we understand that decision, holds that whether the legislation be by resolution or ordinance is immaterial; that referendum proceeding may be made to affect it so long as it answers to the character of "legislation" and is of general effect. That court had suggested that there may be grounds for excluding from the operation of the initiative and referendum powers legislative acts special and local in their nature. No opinion is expressed as to how the minds of the court might settle on that proposition, and we are expressly told in the decision that what is therein said must not be understood as expressing any intimation of the views of the court on that particular matter. It was not necessarily involved in the decision. In our opinion, the constitutional provision giving and guaranteeing to electors the right to the initiative and referendum was not designed to furnish a means by which street improvements local in character can be either commenced or prevented by the use of the initiative or referendum. We, therefore, agree with the conclusion arrived at by the trial judge.

The judgment is affirmed.

DE VALL v. PERRIN. (Civ. 2152.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Sept. 18, 1917. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 15, 1917.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR ⚷979(2)—GRANT OF NEW TRIAL—REVIEW.

Discretion of court under Code Civ. Proc. § 657, in setting aside a verdict and granting a new trial in whole or in part, where, in its judgment, the evidence is insufficient, will not be reviewed, save in cases showing a clear abuse of such discretion.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR ⚷867(2)—REVIEW—OPINION OF TRIAL COURT.

The opinion of the trial court granting defendant's motion for a new trial, unless plaintiff consent to a remittitur, does not restrict the appellate court to determining solely whether specified defects in the evidence existed where the entire opinion showed that the judge deemed the evidence insufficient to support the amount of the verdict.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR ⚷979(5)—REVIEW—ABUSE OF DISCRETION.

The granting of a motion for new trial, unless the clerk enter a remittitur for part of the recovery, cannot be disturbed on appeal as an abuse of discretion, where the evidence as to the amount to which plaintiff was entitled was sharply conflicting.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by A. M. De Vall against E. B. Perrin. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals, and from an order granting defendant's motion for a new trial, unless plaintiff consent to a remittitur, plaintiff appeals. Judgment reversed, and order granting motion for new trial affirmed.

Jacob M. Blake, John R. Tyrrell, and Crittenden Thornton, all of San Francisco, for plaintiff. Randolph V. Whiting, of San Francisco, for defendant.

RICHARDS, J. These are two appeals—one from a judgment for the plaintiff entered upon a verdict of a jury in his favor for the sum of $20,000; the other an appeal by said plaintiff from an order granting the defendant's motion for a new trial.

The action was instituted by the plaintiff as the assignee of two claims for legal services alleged to have been rendered to the defendant by his assignors, the first being a claim for such services by Barclay Henley, alleged to have been reasonably worth the sum of $50,000, upon which payments aggregating $7,000 were alleged to have been made; the second consisting of a claim for like services on the part of J. E. Harper for $50,000, upon which no payments were alleged to have been made.

Upon the trial the undisputed evidence showed that upon the first of these claims payments aggregating the sum of $3,270, and upon the second the sum of $3,690, had been made. The jury returned a general verdict upon the first of these claims for the sum of $15,000, and upon the second for the sum of $5,000. A motion for a new trial was made upon all statutory grounds, upon the submission of which the court rendered a written opinion reviewing the evidence in the case, and thereupon made an order "that unless the plaintiff within 20 days from the date of the entry of this order consents to deduct from the amount of the verdict and judgment herein in favor of plaintiff's assignor Henley for $15,000, the sum of $8,270, and from the amount of $5,000, the verdict awarded the plaintiff's assignor Harper, the sum of $3,690, making a total deduction of $11,960, the defendant's motion for a new trial will be granted; if such stipulation is entered within the time prescribed an order will be entered denying the defendant's motion for a new trial." The consent and stipulation required by this order not having been given or entered within said time, it was ordered "that the defendant's motion be and the same is hereby granted." The appeal from the order granting the defendant's motion for a new trial will be first reviewed.

[1] On the part of the appellant from that order it is first contended that under the terms of the orders made by the trial court in disposing of the motion for a new trial the only ground of said motion which can be considered or reviewed by this court is that the verdict was excessive because of the insufficiency of the evidence to support it; and that as to all other grounds of said motion it must be deemed to have been denied. We do not deem it essential, however, to pursue this contention through the argument or authorities urged in its support for the reason that the chief reliance of the respondent upon this appeal is that there was a substantial conflict in the evidence as to the value of the services rendered by each of the assignors of the plaintiff, and that in view of such conflict the trial court had a right to exercise its discretion in granting or refusing a new trial; and that this court will not interfere with the exercise of such discretion in the absence of any sufficient showing that it has been abused.

The appellant, however, insists that the trial court has no such discretion in dealing with the verdict of a jury in cases of this character; and that in attempting to exercise it the trial court has arbitrarily usurped the function of the jury in this case, and has thereby nullified the plaintiff's right to a trial by jury. The only authority cited in support of such a doctrine is the case of Head v. Hargrave, 105 U. S. 45, 26 L. Ed. 1028, which far from supporting does not even hint at such a rule of law. On the other hand, the language of the Code is explicit and the authorities are abundant to the effect that the trial court has the power to set aside a verdict and grant a new trial, in whole or in part, in every case where, in its judgment, the evidence is insufficient, and that its action in so doing will not be reviewed upon appeal save in cases showing a clear abuse of such discretion. Code Civ. Proc. § 657; Domico v. Casassa, 101 Cal. 412, 35 Pac. 1024; Gordon v. Roberts, 162 Cal. 508, 123 Pac. 288; Estate of Everts, 163 Cal. 452, 125 Pac. 1058; Meinberg v. Jordan, 29 Cal. App. 761, 157 Pac. 1005, 1007. The appellant in this connection, however, presents the further contention that the trial court, as the predicate for its first order, filed a written opinion, reviewing elaborately the evidence in the case, and specifying certain deductions which in its judgment should be made from the gross amount of the verdict in the case of the Henley claim; and counsel for the appellant insists that this court is confined to a consideration of the merits of the reasoning and conclusions of the trial court in respect of these specific matters.

[2, 3] Ordinarily the opinion of the trial court rendered upon ordering judgment or upon granting or refusing a motion for a new trial is no proper part of the record on appeal, and thus when made so is not to be regarded as in any respect limiting the consideration by this court of any matter which would be the proper subject of review under the terms of the judgment and order itself; nevertheless, since counsel for both parties have seen fit to certify to this court a record which embraces the full text of such opinion, and since both have referred to it as having some bearing on the scope and effect of the orders under review on this appeal, we have examined the court's opinion only to find that while it is true that the trial court did advert to certain specific matters as not within the proper purview of the jury in arriving at their general verdict, the court also generally reviewed the evidence offered in support of the Henley claim, and commented upon the same as "extravagant" and as "varying and irreconcilable" to an extent which would justify his conclusion that the verdict of the jury based thereon was excessive. It is clear that in the light of those animadversions and conclusions of the trial judge as to the insufficiency of the evidence in general to support the verdict, the views expressed in its opinion as to whether other specified defects in the evidence, whether right or wrong, cannot be considered as a limitation upon the powers of this court in its review of the orders granting the new trial. It may, therefore, be disregarded in determining the only question practically which is before us on this appeal, namely, whether from a reading of the entire evidence in the case it can be said that the trial court abused its discretion in granting the defendant's motion for a new trial. Upon such review we find that the evidence educed upon either phase of the case, involving both the amount and the value of the services rendered by the assignors of the plaintiff to the defendant, is in sharp and substantial conflict. This being so, neither of the two orders of the trial court relating to the granting of the motion for a new trial will be disturbed upon appeal.

This conclusion obviates the necessity of a consideration of the questions discussed on the appeal from the judgment, which has already been set aside as the result of the orders upheld upon the appeal from the order granting a new trial.

Judgment reversed. Order granting the motion for a new trial affirmed.

JONES v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. et al.*

(Civ. 2149.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Sept. 14, 1917.)

1. Evidence ⚷588 — Crossing Accidents —Contributory Negligence.

Where from the physical facts established, plaintiff, had he looked and listened, must have observed the approach of a train, the fact that he testified that he looked for the train, but did not see it until he was on the track, does not absolve him of contributory negligence.

2. Railroads ⚷350(22) — Crossing Accidents—Contributory Negligence.

In action for injuries by a train at a crossing, the mere fact that telegraph poles obscured the vision at one point did not absolve plaintiff of contributory negligence in driving upon the track when for 30 feet immediately before he went on the track his vision was unobscured, since a traveler must look for a train at a point where such looking would be effective.

3. Railroads ⚷350(16) — Crossing Accidents—Contributory Negligence.

Where under the evidence, plaintiff must have seen the train had he looked where he said he looked and nevertheless went on the track and was injured, he could not recover, since if he did see the train and attempted to cross he was contributorily negligent, and if he did not see it, it must have been because he failed to look, in which case he was also guilty of contributory negligence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Stanley A. Smith, Judge.

Action by David L. Jones against the Southern Pacific Company, a corporation, and W. J. Edwards. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

A. A. Moore and Stanley Moore, both of San Francisco, for appellants. J. Leonard Rose, of Oakland, for respondent.

LENNON, P. J. That the evidence shows, as a matter of law, that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence is the only point raised upon this appeal from a judgment, entered in favor of the plaintiff upon the verdict of a jury in the sum of $1,000, as damages for personal injuries resulting to the plaintiff from a collision, occurring in the city of Oakland, between a taxicab, which the plaintiff was driving, and an electric train operated by the defendants.

Appellants concede, for the purposes of this appeal, that defendants were guilty of negligence, in that, on the night of, and at the time and place of, the collision the defendants were operating an electric train at a high rate of speed; that plaintiff had no warning of the approach of the train in question by bell, whistle, or otherwise, and that the defendant usually maintained a flagman at the street crossing where the collision occurred, but that no flagman was on duty at the time of the collision, or if he was, he failed to signal the approach of the train.

The record discloses evidence tending to show that the accident happened at the intersection of Eleventh and Webster streets, Oakland; that both of these streets are 80 feet in width and have 12-foot sidewalks; that from the west property line of Webster street to the first rail of the track, which runs north and south on Webster street, is a distance of 30 feet, and that the taxicab was running east on Eleventh street.

When the taxicab reached the property line of Webster street there was a space of 30 feet in which the plaintiff had opportunity to look for an approaching train. He testified that he looked for a train at this point, also when he passed the curb line, at which point he would have been 18 feet from the nearest rail of the track, with an unobstructed view for many blocks of the approaching train. The headlight of the train was burning, and was plainly seen by a police officer, standing at a point beyond the accident, from the time the train left Second and Webster, a distance of nine city blocks.

[1] Since, from the physical facts established, it is plain that by looking and listening plaintiff must have observed the approach of the train, the fact that he testified that he looked for the approaching train, but did not see it until he was on the track will not suffice to absolve him of contributory negligence. Chrissinger v. S. P. Co., 169 Cal. 619, 624, 149 Pac. 175.

[2] The evidence to the effect that there were telegraph poles along the west side of Webster street between Tenth and Eleventh streets, which tended to obstruct the view of one approaching defendant's tracks is immaterial because of the admitted fact that for 30 feet from the nearest rail of the track there was a clear, unobstructed view. Plaintiff must look at a point where such looking would be effective. Griffin v. S. P., L. A. & S. L. Co., 170 Cal. 772, 151 Pac. 282, L. R. A. 1916A, 842. According to plaintiff's testimony, he did look after he got past the telegraph poles, also when he passed the curb line, which is 18 feet from the nearest rail of the track. He said he glanced almost down to Tenth street and did not see any train. He also admitted that he could have seen the train as far as Tenth street if he "looked straight at it."

[3] If plaintiff had looked for a train where he said he looked, he must have seen it, for the uncontradicted testimony is that he had a clear view, and that the train was in sight with headlight burning. If he did see it he was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law in attempting to cross. If he did not see it, it was because he did not look, and in that case he likewise was guilty of contributory negligence.

The Supreme Court, by its recent decisions, has fixed a standard of conduct at railroad crossings, a violation of which is contributory negligence as a matter of law. Under the rule as expounded in the Chrissinger Case, supra, to the effect that:

> "Where * * * the standard of conduct is so obvious as to be applicable to all persons, and the plaintiff has failed to measure up to that standard, under the circumstances shown, he is not entitled to have his case go to the jury"

—we are constrained to reverse the judgment, and it is so ordered.

MERCHANTS' NAT. BANK OF SAN FRANCISCO v. WESTON. (Civ. 2098.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Sept. 19, 1917.)

1. Banks and Banking 🔑261(2)—National Banks—Ultra Vires Acts—Right to Question Power of Bank.

Assuming that a national bank was not authorized to make a lease of an apartment house, the lessee could not raise the point when sued in unlawful detainer, as the United States alone could be heard to raise this question.

2. Landlord and Tenant 🔑24(3)—Lease—Sufficiency of Description of Property.

A lease of an apartment house, describing the property generally as being located on a certain street, followed by a specific description by metes and bounds, sufficiently described the property.

3. Landlord and Tenant 🔑35—Right to Contest Validity of Lease—Sufficiency of Description.

Where a lessee went into actual possession of leased premises and continued in such possession until an action of unlawful detainer was commenced, she was estopped from repudiating the lease for any uncertainty in the description of the premises.

4. Banks and Banking 🔑262—Action of Unlawful Detainer—Sufficiency of Notice to Quit.

A notice to quit, signed by the duly authorized agent of a national bank, the lessor, after consulting with the president and the attorney for the bank, and being instructed by the attorney to sign it, was sufficient to support an action of unlawful detainer, though signed without written authority.

5. Banks and Banking 🔑236—National Banks — Evidence of Corporate Existence.

A certificate of the controller of currency, authorizing a bank to do business as a national bank and a certificate authorizing it to change its name to the M. National Bank, was sufficient proof of the corporate existence of the M. National Bank in an action by it.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; B. J. Flood, Judge.

Action by the Merchants' National Bank of San Francisco against Mrs. M. L. Weston. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. Hoff Cook, of San Francisco, for appellant. W. F. Williamson, of San Francisco, and A. D. Donovan for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal by defendant in an action of unlawful detainer wherein judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff for the restitution of the possession of a certain apartment house, and the cancellation of the lease thereof, and for the sum of $2,400 as rent.

Several grounds are relied upon for a reversal of the judgment.

[1] It is first argued that the act of plaintiff in executing the lease under which defendant went into possession of the premises was ultra vires; that, plaintiff being a national bank, it had no authority to execute the character of lease in question. We see no force in this argument. Assuming that the bank was not authorized to make the lease, it does not lie with the plaintiff to raise the point, as the United States alone can be heard on this question. Camp v. Land, 122 Cal. 167, 54 Pac. 839.

[2, 3] The second objection, that the lease failed to definitely locate the premises, finds no support in the record. The lease generally described the property as being located on a certain street, and then followed with a specific description of the premises by metes and bounds. Aside from the fact that this description was ample and sufficient in every particular, defendant went into actual possession of the premises under the lease and continued in such possession until this action was commenced. She is therefore estopped from repudiating the lease for any uncertainty in the description of the premises so occupied by her. Pierce v. Minturn, 1 Cal. 470.

[4] Equally untenable is the claim that the notice to quit was not signed by a duly authorized agent of plaintiff. It appears in evidence that the party signing the notice was the duly authorized agent of the bank, and that, before signing the notice, he consulted with its president and also its attorney, who gave him a form of notice to quit and instructed him to sign it. In actions of this character a notice to a tenant to quit which purports to come from the landlord and is signed by authority of the latter's attorney, is valid though signed without written authority. Felton v. Millard, 81 Cal. 540, 21 Pac. 533, 22 Pac. 750.

[5] And finally it is claimed that proper and sufficient proof was not made that the plaintiff was a corporation. In proof of its corporate existence plaintiff introduced in evidence the certificate of the controller of the currency authorizing the Western Metropolis Bank to do business as a national bank, together with the certificate authorizing its change of name to "Merchants' National Bank." This was sufficient proof of its corporate capacity.

For the reasons given the judgment is affirmed.

DEE v. DEE. (Civ. 2230.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Sept. 17, 1917.)

1. Divorce ⟹147—Weight of Evidence—Credibility of Witnesses.

Although evidence of defendant in a divorce action is evasive, but conflicts with that of plaintiff, its weight and credibility is for the trial court.

2. Appeal and Error ⟹931(3)—Waiver of Findings—Presumptions.

Where findings are waived, it must be assumed, where there is supporting evidence, that the court found all the facts necessary to sustain its judgment.

3. Divorce ⟹235—Discretion of Court—Separate Maintenance.

In denying a divorce for cruelty, the allowance of separate maintenance and support is a matter for the sound discretion of the court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; J. J. Trabucco, Judge.

Action by Rose Dee against Manuel E. Dee for divorce, and a cross-complaint by the defendant. Divorce denied both parties. From the judgment and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

B. C. Mickle, Gus L. Baraty, of San Francisco, and John L. Mickle, for appellant. St. Sure, Callaghan & Rose, of Oakland, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from a judgment denying plaintiff a divorce, and from the order denying a new trial.

Plaintiff charged extreme cruelty, and defendant by a cross-complaint set up a like charge against the plaintiff. After a trial of the action, findings were waived and judgment was rendered denying both parties a divorce and requiring defendant to pay a certain sum to plaintiff for the support of two minor children.

Plaintiff seeks a reversal of the judgment and order on two grounds: First, that under the evidence she was entitled to a divorce; second, that although a divorce was denied, she was entitled, pursuant to the provisions of section 136 of the Civil Code, to separate maintenance and permanent support.

[1, 2] Plaintiff's complaint alleged ten acts of cruelty, and while it is true that the denial by defendant while on the stand of some of these alleged acts was somewhat evasive in character, nevertheless there is a conflict in the evidence, and inasmuch as the trial court is the judge of the weight of the evidence and the credibility of the witnesses, its findings on these questions are conclusive. Since the findings were waived, it must be assumed that the court found against the plaintiff all of the facts necessary to sustain the judgment. Bruce v. Bruce, 16 Cal. App. 357, 116 Pac. 994.

[3] The allowance of separate maintenance and support was a matter for the sound discretion of the trial court (Hagle v. Hagle, 68 Cal. 588, 9 Pac. 842), and we are not prepared to say that that discretion was abused in the present case.

The judgment and the order denying a new trial are affirmed.

CLINTON CONST. CO. OF CALIFORNIA v. CLAY, City Auditor. (Civ. 2163.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Sept. 13, 1917. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 12, 1917.)

1. Municipal Corporations ⟹236—School Building—Letting Contracts—Necessity for Competitive Bids.

Oakland City Charter, § 189, authorizing change in plans and specifications according to which contract for school building was let, does not authorize board of education to enter into contract for work entirely distinct from any work provided for under original contract, exceeding $500, without complying with section 130, requiring letting of contracts to lowest bidder after public notice.

2. Municipal Corporations ⟹248(1) — School Building—Letting Contracts — Necessity for Competitive Bids.

Where board of education lets contract without complying with Oakland City Charter, §

130, requiring competitive bidding, contractor's claim is not validated by its approval, as provided in section 122, by four-fifths vote of board of education, after rejection by auditor, as that section relates only to claims arising out of contracts board had authority to make.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; William H. Waste, Judge.

Action by the Clinton Construction Company of California against I. H. Clay, as auditor of the City of Oakland. From judgment in favor of petitioner, defendant appeals. Judgment modified and affirmed.

Paul C. Morf, City Attorney, of Oakland, for appellant. Ernest K. Little, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. Petitioner herein sought and obtained a writ of mandamus against the auditor of the city of Oakland, commanding him to draw his warrant in favor of petitioner for the sum of $3,763.96, payable out of a certain fund raised by a bond issue and known as the "Clawson School Construction Fund." This appeal is from such judgment.

Appellant justifies his refusal to issue such warrant upon the ground that the amount for which it is sought to have the warrant drawn represents expenditures by the board of education of the city of Oakland in excess of the sum of $500, and which therefore were in violation of the charter provisions of said city requiring advertising and competitive bidding, and upon the further ground that the amount represents expenditures for matters and things other than those for which the bonds creating said fund were issued.

From the petition the following facts appear: The council of the city of Oakland provided by ordinance for a special election to vote upon two propositions to issue bonds for certain purposes. One of these—and the only one involved in this case which it is necessary to consider—was whether the city should incur an indebtedness in the sum of $210,000 for the construction and completion of a new building to be known as the "Clawson School" in said city, together with the furnishings and equipment thereof, and the acquisition of certain lands which were necessary for the purpose of the schoolhouse site and additions. Pursuant to said ordinance a special election was held, and the proposition to bond the city for the purposes and in the amount mentioned was carried. Thereafter bonds were issued and sold, and the proceeds were deposited in a separate fund designated as the "Clawson School Construction Fund." Subsequently the board of education entered into a written contract with petitioner to construct the Clawson school building according to plans and specifications prepared therefor. Such plans and specifications, however, did not make provision for the work for which recovery is here sought. The omitted improvements consisted in the building of a fence around the premises, the planting of a lawn on a large portion of the yard, and the paving of another portion thereof. About the time of the completion of the original contract for the construction of the Clawson school the board of education agreed with the respondent to do this extra work for the sum of $3,461.16. Two other pieces of work were also authorized in a similar manner—one for the erection of a flagpole costing $244, the other for shellacking certain linoleum for the sum of $58.80.

The validity of respondent's claim for these two latter items, amounting to the sum of $302.80, is not disputed, it being conceded that the board had power to order this work, the cost being less than $500.

Upon completion of all of the extra work respondent presented its demands for payment. The demands were passed by the board of education, but were rejected by appellant as auditor. Subsequently they were again passed by the board by a four-fifths vote of its members, again presented to appellant and again refused audit unless respondent would accept in full satisfaction therefor the sum of $302.80, the amount of the demands for erecting the flagpole and shellacking linoleum. This the respondent refused to do, and brought this proceeding which, as we have said, resulted in the judgment in its favor from which the present appeal is prosecuted.

We are of the opinion that the contract made by the board of education with respondent for that portion of the work exceeding $500 was one not authorized by the charter provisions, and that the judgment must be modified by striking the amount claimed thereon from such judgment. The charter of the city of Oakland by section 130 thereof provides for the letting of all contracts to the lowest bidder after public notice where the expenditure exceeds $500. No attempt was made in the letting of these contracts to comply with the provisions of this section, but counsel for the respondent seeks to justify the validity of the claim based thereon by a clause in his original contract which provides for changes during the progress of the work, whereby the increased or decreased cost thereof by reason of such changes shall be determined by the architect and fixed by agreement. In this behalf he argues that as such changes were warranted by his contract, and were made strictly in accordance with section 189 of the charter, which authorizes a change in the plans and specifications to be made with the consent of the board of education and commissioner of public works, no competitive bidding was necessary, and the work could be done without complying with section 130 of the charter, and, having been so ordered and completed, all that remained to be done was for the architect to certify in writing the fair and reasonable amount to be paid therefor in accordance with the provision of said section.

[1] But section 189 of the charter is limited in its terms to changes in work provided for in original contracts, and it makes no provision for new or supplemental contracts. The question as to the character and extent of improvements that might be made under a change in the plans and specifications is not here involved. The work here performed and for which compensation is sought was entirely distinct, independent, and apart from any and all work contemplated and provided for under the original contract. To hold that section 189 of the charter, providing for changes in the work, was designed to dispense with competitive bidding provided for under section 130 of that same act would be to render nugatory the safeguard which the provision surrounds the municipality in its dealings with the public, and would subject it to all the well-recognized evils the provision was designed to prevent.

It is only just to state that no fraud is here charged. The result is the same, however. Here no provision was made in the plans and specifications for the work done, and, as before stated, whatever character of changes might be warranted in the work contracted for, such changes could not warrant and include, as here, distinct work not even mentioned in the plans and specifications and not contracted for. Ely v. Grand Rapids, 84 Mich. 336, 47 N. W. 447; Auditor General v. Stoddard, 147 Mich. 329, 110 N. W. 944.

[2] Upon this question the respondent advances the further argument that failure to comply with the provisions of section 130 of the charter was remedied by the approval of the claims by a four-fifths vote of the board of education after their first rejection by appellant, and cites us to section 122 of the charter in support thereof. That provision, however, in express terms limits the approval of rejected claims to those which the body had authority to make and out of which the claim arose, and was never intended to remove the restrictions upon the mode of entering into a contract prescribed by section 130. Here the contract was wholly void. It was one which the board of education had no authority to make, and the subsequent approval of it gave it no force or validity. Reams v. Cooley, 171 Cal. 150, 152 Pac. 293, Ann. Cas. 1917A, 1260; Zottman v. San Francisco, 20 Cal. 96, 81 Am. Dec. 96.

From what has been said it follows that the private contract for the work here performed, having been made without complying with the charter provisions, was void and was incapable of ratification by the board of education, and no recovery can be had therefor.

In view of the conclusion just announced the further contention that the expenditures could not be made a charge on the fund in question becomes unimportant.

For the reasons given the judgment is modified by striking therefrom the sum of $3,461.16, and, as so modified, the judgment will stand affirmed.

We concur: LENNON, P. J.; RICHARDS, J.

34 Cal. App. 644

PEOPLE v. DUFUR. (Cr. 407.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 17, 1917.)

1. Jury 🔑80—Challenges—Criminal Case.

It is not error to refuse to fill up the panel after a juror has been excused before requiring defendant to exercise right of peremptory challenge.

2. Criminal Law 🔑1171(1)—Harmless Error—Questioning Defendant.

Violation of defendant's constitutional right not to be called on to testify against himself, by the district attorney, on prosecution for making false affidavit and proof of loss, for fraudulent claim on insurance contract, preliminarily to introducing copies of policies retained by insurer, to ask defendant to produce the policies, was harmless.

3. Insurance 🔑31 — Fraudulent Claim — Evidence of Loss.

Civ. Code, § 2756, fixing the measure of indemnity between insured and insurer in case of burning of insured property, not valued in policy, at the expense to insured to replace the articles, has no application to a prosecution under Pen. Code, § 549, for making false affidavit and proof of loss for fraudulent claim on insurance contract, so that the proofs need not be addressed to such measure of indemnity.

4. Criminal Law 🔑460—Evidence—Opinion as to Value.

Witnesses accustomed to life in the hills on stock ranches remote from markets and in cabins scantily furnished, on a prosecution for fraudulent claim on fire policy on furnishings of such a place, old and secondhand, or homemade, may, in connection with description thereof, state their value as not exceeding a certain amount; this being the best evidence available.

5. Insurance 🔑31 — Fraudulent Claim — Evidence.

Evidence on a prosecution under Pen. Code, § 549, held to raise more than a presumption, and to be sufficient to go to the jury on the question of the sending of the proof of loss, and claim having been by defendant.

6. Insurance 🔑31 — Fraudulent Claim — Evidence.

While on prosecution for the second crime denounced by Pen. Code, § 549, the preparing, making, or subscribing of an affidavit or proof of loss with intent to present it in support of a fraudulent claim on an insurance contract for payment of a loss, evidence of the presentation of the claim is admissible, such crime may be established without proof of actual presentation of the claim.

7. Criminal Law 🔑763(3) — Trial—Instructing on Facts.

Under Const. art. 6, § 19, inhibiting charges with respect to matter of fact, charging that as to certain facts, of which there was evidence, there was no contention, and the jury should find accordingly, was error, defendant having by his plea of "not guilty" put in issue every material fact, and being entitled to have the jury pass thereon, though not having put in countervailing evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Denver Sevier, Judge.

John F. Dufur was convicted, and denied a new trial, and appeals. Reversed.

L. M. Burnell and J. L. Kennedy, both of Eureka, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Defendant was tried upon an information brought under section 549 of the Penal Code charging that he made and subscribed an affidavit and proof of loss with intent to present and use the same, and to allow and cause the same to be presented in support of a false and fraudulent claim for loss by fire. The claim is alleged to have been false and fraudulent by reason of the fact that, whereas the claim was alleged to have been made for $250 on a policy of insurance upon household furniture and personal effects, such personal property was charged to be of the value of not to exceed $25. There was a second count based upon a claim arising out of another policy, but as the jury found the defendant not guilty as to this count, it needs no further mention.

The jury found defendant guilty as charged in the first count. He appeals from the judgment of conviction and from the order denying his motion for a new trial. As the judgment and order must be reversed, we will notice some alleged errors as to matters likely to arise again should there be a new trial.

[1] 1. It is contended that the court erred to defendant's prejudice in refusing to fill the panel after a juror was excused and requiring defendant to exercise a peremptory challenge when the panel was not full, and also in refusing to fill the panel after a physically disqualified person had been excused. This question was raised in People v. Scoggins, 37 Cal. 676, and decided adversely to defendant's contention. The method of impaneling a jury in a criminal case was established in that case, and was approved subsequently in People v. Russell, 46 Cal. 121; People v. Iams, 57 Cal. 115; People v. Riley, 65 Cal. 107, 3 Pac. 413; People v. Hickman, 113 Cal. 81, 45 Pac. 175; People v. Harrison, 18 Cal. App. 288, 123 Pac. 200. We see no reason for reopening the question, but must regard it as settled.

[2] 2. Witness Ridling, an adjuster of fire losses for the company issuing the insurance policy in question, was called as a witness for the prosecution. He testified that:

> He met the defendant in Eureka and talked with him about the loss, at which time the defendant told witness that the premises had been burned. "Q. Did Mr. Dufur have the policies of insurance there at that time? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did you examine them? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did he surrender them to you, or did he retain them? A. He retained them, but let me look them over. Q. You looked them over? A. Yes, sir.
> "Mr. Nelson: Now I will ask the defendant to produce the policies.
> "Mr. Burnell: To that we object and assign it as error upon the part of the district attorney. He has no right to make any demand of that kind in any way, shape, or form. He cannot call upon the defendant in any way, shape, or form to produce anything. I assign that as error, and ask that the jury be instructed to disregard it.
> "Mr. Nelson: If you refuse to do that, we will offer in evidence these copies.
> "Mr. Burnell: We also object to that remark of counsel, and ask that counsel be instructed not to make any more such remarks.
> "Mr. Nelson: I ask for the original documents. We are not asking Mr. Dufur to testify. I know he does not have to testify, but we want to identify these documents.
> "Mr. Burnell: My objection runs to all the remarks of the district attorney.
> "Court: Proceed, Mr. Nelson.
> "Mr. Nelson: Q. I will ask you, Mr. Ridling, to examine that copy of a policy. A. This is a copy of the policy.
> "Mr. Burnell: To that we object, unless he shows he knows this to be a copy of his own knowledge, that he knows this is a copy; unless he swear of his own knowledge, this is a copy.
> "Mr. Nelson: Q. Is this a copy of one of the policies shown you by Mr. Dufur on October 2, 1916, in this city? A. Yes, sir."

The copy produced by the witness was then introduced in evidence.

It is urged with much earnestness that this was a violation of defendant's constitutional right forbidding his being called upon to be a witness against himself. 14 Ency. of Evidence, §§ 646, 647, is cited to the effect that it is error "even to call upon a defendant in a criminal case in the presence of a jury to testify or produce documents against his will, even though he makes no objection thereto." The following cases are cited in support of this view of the law: State v. Merkley, 74 Iowa, 695, 39 N. W. 111; McKnight v. United States, 115 Fed. 972, 54 C. C. A. 358; Gillespie v. State, 5 Okl. Cr. 546, 115 Pac. 620, 35 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1173, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 259. In the Oklahoma case it was said:

> "When such a demand is made, a defendant must accept the alternative of either producing the letters, and thereby incriminating himself, or of having the jury place the strongest possible construction against him upon his failure to do so. If this can be done, the very life, body, and soul of the Constitution would be violated and trampled upon."

In the Iowa case "the defendants answered that they did not have the papers, and did not know where they were," and the court, while holding that the lower court erred in making the inquiry, stated that:

> "Whether in view of the answer to the inquiry and the whole record, the defendants were in any respect prejudiced by what the court did, we have no occasion to determine."

In view of our constitutional provision found in section 4½, article 6, we must determine this very question whether the error was prejudicial. The policy of insurance was an essential link in the chain of evidence necessary to be proven, although the charge was based upon a false affidavit as to the value of the goods covered by the policy and lost by fire. But the existence of the policy was shown. Defendant had it and showed it to the agent, the witness, to examine, and the agent had at the time in his possession the copy of the policy retained by the company, which was introduced.

In the cases cited the documents demanded were the original and only ones in existence. The courts held that secondary evidence of their contents could have been shown, and hence there was no necessity for making the demand in the presence of the jury, thus giving rise to inferences prejudicial to the defendant. We cannot see how, in the present case, any inference unfavorable or prejudicial to defendant could have arisen in the minds of the jury in view of the fact that the policy in his possession and the one introduced were identically the same, and that the offense charged was based upon an entirely different document.

[3, 4] 3. Error is assigned in connection with evidence admitted over objection in making proof of value of the property destroyed. Witnesses Jones and his wife testified to the purchase price of certain of the destroyed articles. Certain other witnesses testified to the value of the articles destroyed and, it is contended, that they did not qualify as expert witnesses; that they did not know the market value in the vicinity where the property was situated when destroyed or that there was any market value at that place, and did not know what it would cost to replace the property at the point where destroyed. The contention seems to be that section 2756 of the Civil Code applies, and that the proof should have been addressed to the measure of indemnity to the insurance company which the Code says "is the expense it would be to the insured at the time of the commencement of the fire to replace the thing lost or injured in the condition in which it was at the time of the injury." We do not think this section has any application in this case. As between the company and the insured, the section fixes the "measure of idemnity," and that is its sole purpose. The issue here is whether defendant violated section 549 of the Penal Code, which provides that:

> "Every person who presents or causes to be presented any false or fraudulent claim, or any proof in support of any such claim, upon any contract of insurance for the payment of any loss, or who prepares, makes, or subscribes any account, certificate of survey, affidavit, or proof of loss, or other book, paper, or writing, with intent to present or use the same, or to allow it to be presented or used in support of any such claim, is punishable," etc.

Rightly to test the correctness of the court's rulings and whether or not prejudicial, the situation and character of the property destroyed should be understood. In 1906 Isham R. Jones acquired the land. It is situated east of Eureka about 45 miles in what is spoken of as "the mountains" or "in the hills." Jones erected a dwelling house and barn on the premises, and moved his family there in 1907. The dwelling consisted of a small sitting or family room and a kitchen; over these was an attic. He took with him for the kitchen a small four-hole cooking stove, and for the family room a small sheet-iron heater, "a pair of bed springs," which he utilized by nailing them to uprights for legs, "a kind of a camp chair that had a cloth back and seat, and some other chairs." These articles were "secondhand" and were purchased in Eureka at a cost, as Jones testified, of $15. He took some bedding, dishes, knives and forks, and other kitchen utensils. A center table for the family room was roughly constructed after the family arrived. A rough cupboard and table were made for use in the kitchen. In 1914 Jones sold the premises to Ed Baxter and A. D. Dufur, defendant's brother, for whom defendant was attorney in fact and made the affidavit charged in the information. Baxter had a third interest in the premises, and sold this interest to Dufur in 1915. He "lived there until the summer or fall of 1915," and had charge of the property. He testified that when he left the place the articles turned over with it by Jones were in the house, and that these constituted substantially all of its furnishings. He described the household effects. The heating stove in the family room "was a little, round sheet-iron heating stove, with a kind of fancy top to it, but it had been broken, and we had to put the wood in from the top. It was secondhanded." He describes the bed thus:

> "It was made out of poles, and I believe a pine board was split out for the front part of it and shaved a little bit in the center, and if I remember right, the back was the same kind of a board, and underneath were legs. All of the bed except the wire springs was a homemade affair. It had been there a long time."

Of the bedding he testified:

> "Well, there was a tick made out of calico. I believe that was spliced together in two or three pieces, and I believe it was filled with straw or hay, * * * a half a white blanket that had been a good blanket, and a double gray blanket and a quilt stuffed with some kind of feathers, quite a heavy quilt, but it had been used a great deal, * * * that Mrs. Jones made herself; a pillow or two, but no sheets."

He mentions a center table and a small table made out of a dry goods box "with four small legs attached to it," also a small diamond-shaped hat rack with "four pegs in it," a set of deer horns, a canvas bottomed "tipping chair" and five or six common wooden bottom chairs in the whole building. In addition to the bed described, there was a bunk, homemade. "Mr. Wells was sleeping in that, and he fixed it up himself." There was no bedding for this bunk. Wells was a hired man. Baxter described the kitchen equipment as consisting of some plates, knives and forks, and spoons, and some pots and kettles and other small articles, enough to serve a half a dozen people, all old and formerly in use by the Joneses. There was a cupboard built against the wall with three or four shelves "and a cloth nailed up for a cover" and another similarly constructed cupboard with no cover; a homemade sink of wood; the cooking stove he describes as "a small stove, a four-hole cooking stove," old when he went there; "the fire box was burned out and Mr.

Wells had patched it up"; the chairs were old, as were all the cooking utensils; there were two galvanized washtubs, one in fairly good condition, the "other leaked and would not hold water." The foregoing covers substantially the furnishings of the dwelling. This and other witnesses mentioned some other things of small value. The witness was asked to state "the value of the household contents" when he was last there, and replied: "About $25 or $30. Q. You would consider that a liberal valuation? A. Yes, sir." Several witnesses were called to testify to the contents of the house—persons who lived in the vicinity and had frequently been at the Dufur house, some of them working there, eating and sleeping at the place. They described the furnishings and the condition they were in as to use. None of them fixed a greater value than did Baxter, and some placed it as low as $20 "for the entire outfit."

The schedule of articles to which defendant made affidavit embraces many articles, of no great value each, which seem not to have been in the house. The list foots up $336.45. Among the items are the following:

> "1 bed and mattress and springs, all complete, $25; blankets on said bed, $5; sheets on said bed, $2; pillows on said bed, $1.50; 1 bed, mattress, bedding and pillows, $25; cooking utensils (not otherwise herein enumerated), $25; kitchen cooking stove, $30; 1 large parlor stove, $25; 1 kitchen cupboard, $15."

Other articles are set down at values much in excess of the value placed upon them by witnesses. Defendant submitted no evidence of values, nor did he controvert the testimony of witnesses as to the contents of the house which covered the time shortly before the fire occurred. These witnesses were accustomed to life in the hills on stock ranches such as the Dufur place, remote from markets and in cabins scantily furnished as this one was, and they testified to a general knowledge of the cost or value of such articles as entered into the outfitting of the Dufur house. Concededly there was no open market or established market value of these articles at the place where destroyed, and especially was this true of old furnishings. The principal articles had been in use since 1906, and were then "secondhand," and practically all of them had been in use from that date forward. We might almost safely say that with the description given by the witnesses, the jury would be authorized to pass upon values without the aid of expert testimony. Certain it is that the testimony given was the best available, and in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, the jury were justified in accepting the values testified to.

[5] 4. Error is assigned in admitting the claim and the proof of loss, which were one and the same instrument, on the ground that "it was incompetent and not identified as coming from the defendant." At the time Mr. Ridling met defendant, referred to in paragraph marked 2 above, defendant furnished Ridling an itemized statement of the contents of the house. This was on October 2, 1916. On the next day defendant presented the statement, and witness told him to have it sworn to before a notary. Defendant took the statement, and on October 4th defendant returned it to witness duly sworn to as of that date.

> "Q. What did he say to you in reference to the document that he handed to you, and the values therein set forth? A. He said that is the value, what he claimed was his loss. Q. What further conversation did you have with Mr. Dufur at that time? A. Mr. Dufur and I could not agree as to the amount of his loss, and he requested proof of loss, blank proof of loss for him to make out, which I gave to him. Q. I will ask you to examine these two documents, in reference to the form first, Mr. Ridling. Did you hand Mr. Dufur two proofs of loss similar to those? A. Those are the identical proofs that I handed to him; yes, sir. Q. And where did you give them to Mr. Dufur? A. In his office. Q. In this city? A. Yes, sir. Q. Now, Mr. Ridling, after you gave these two blank forms of proof of loss to Mr. Dufur, when did you next see them? A. He mailed them to the company's office, and they returned them to me."

Witness testified that:

> He "received the first proof upon the 7th of October, and after examining them, returned them to defendant for amendment by registered mail. Q. Did you get a return card from Mr. Dufur that he had received them? A. Yes, sir" (exhibiting the card which was introduced in evidence signed John F. Dufur). "Q. Now, Mr. Ridling, when did you next see the original proofs of loss? A. Upon the 16th day of October I received the amended proofs of loss. Q. And they were certain proofs of loss with certain additions and slips attached thereto. A. Yes, sir. Q. Who handed them to you the second time? A. Mr. Stealey. Q. Did you see the envelope in which they came the second time? A. This is it, the second time (showing envelope). * * *
> "Mr. Nelson: Q. This exhibit marked 6 is the one you received on October 5, 1916, and again on October 16, 1916? A. Yes, sir. * * * Q. Do you identify these exhibits, People's Exhibits Nos. 6 and 7, as having been handed to you in this envelope (showing envelope)? A. Yes, sir. Q. Both of them in the one envelope? A. Yes, sir. Q. You received them on October 7, 1916? A. Yes, sir. Q. And then again on October 16, 1916? A. Yes, sir; they came back in that envelope. Q. They both came back in that envelope? A. Yes, sir."

The envelope was then introduced and was indorsed:

> "John F. Dufur, Eureka, Cal. [Four 2-cent stamps.] Registered No. 1420. [Ten cent registry stamp.] Return Card Required. (143) Newark Fire Insurance Co. San Francisco 76695 California. 332 Pine Street. Old office 304 and 310 Kohl Bldg."

Post-marked on back:

> "Eureka Cal Oct 14 1916, Registered. San Francisco Cal Oct 15 1916."

Notary Dickson identified his signature to the first proof made October 4th.

> "Q. Can you identify John H. Dufur's signature there? A. No, I am not familiar enough with his signature to do that. Q. Well, did he subscribe the paper in your presence? A. Well, I presume he must have done so, although my recollection does not serve me on that point."

The witness stated he had "no recollection about it"; that he had seen Mr. Dufur write, and had seen his signatures, and was of the opinion that this was his signature, but would not say so positively.

Notary Frost, before whom the proofs of October 14th were sworn to, was called as a witness, and defendant's counsel admitted the signature of defendant to be attached to the proofs. Witness was then shown defendant's signature on the envelopes above referred to, and after having qualified himself to testify as to defendant's signature, he testified: "Well, in my judgment I would say that I am convinced that the name of John F. Dufur in the upper left hand corner of each one of those envelopes is the signature of John F. Dufur, the gentleman sitting there." All this evidence was admitted under objection, and after it was all in, defendant moved to strike it from the record, which motion was denied, and the contention now is that:

> "At the best such evidence merely raised a presumption that the proof of loss was presented to the insurance company."

Counsel cited many cases to the effect that:

> "Every fact necessary to a conviction must be proven beyond a reasonable doubt, and no presumptions are to be made against the defendant."

The argument is thus stated:

> "At the most the evidence only shows the claim and proof of loss to have been in the possession of the insurance company, after having been in the possession of the defendant. But it does not show such paper was delivered or presented to the company by the defendant, or that it and the envelope in which it was contained were sent by him or even with his knowledge, much less with his consent. The presumption of delivery which follows from the possession of an instrument cannot be indulged in opposition to the presumption of innocence, where a material element of a criminal charge is involved."

We think the jury had something stronger than a presumption to justify their implied finding that defendant not only executed these proofs, but did so with intent to present them, and did cause them to be presented by transmission through the mail. It is inconceivable that after defendant had executed the documents and had sworn to them before notaries and had inclosed them in envelopes indorsed and registered by him and directed to the insurance company, that some other person got possession of them and dropped them into the post office at Eureka without defendant's knowledge or consent. At no time after investigation began of his good faith in making claim of loss did he disavow executing and sending these documents, but, on the contrary, sought to show by witness Ford, who had acted as his attorney at one time, that he consulted Mr. Ford as to the values he had placed to the various articles claimed to have been destroyed by the fire. It would tax human credulity to the breaking point to attribute the sending of these proofs to the insurance company by any person other than defendant.

[6] Furthermore, section 549 of the Penal Code embodies two crimes: First, the presenting or causing to be presented any false or fraudulent claim, etc.; and, second, the preparing, making, or subscribing any affidavit or proof of loss with intent to present the same, or to allow it to be presented, etc. Evidence of the presentation of the claim is admissible in support of the second crime mentioned in the section, but the crime as charged in the information might be established without proof that the claim was actually presented.

5. Error is urged in giving the following instruction:

> "Certain facts are admitted in this cause, and hence it is proper that the court refer to them. There is no contention but that there was a building and barn at the place designated in the information, and that in this building there was certain personal property, and in the barn there was hay which belonged to A. D. Dufur; that this property was insured by the Newark Fire Insurance Company of Newark, N. J., and that if any loss by fire occurred to said property, such loss, if any, was payable to A. D. Dufur; that the defendant was the attorney in fact for said A. D. Dufur at the times mentioned in said information; that there was a fire, and the dwelling house and contents therein and the barn and the hay therein were destroyed by said fire. As to those facts there is no contention, and you must find accordingly."

[7] There was sufficient evidence to have justified the jury in finding the facts stated in the instruction. The record, however, does not show that they were admitted by the defendant. On the contrary, the plea of "not guilty" put in issue every material fact, and though not controverted by countervailing evidence, it was the right of the defendant to have the jury pass upon every material fact. Section 19, article 6, of the Constitution, declares that:

> "Judges shall not charge juries with respect to matters of fact, but may state the testimony and declare the law."

The court took from the jury or, what is the equivalent, directed them to find the enumerated facts leaving substantially only the alleged making of the affidavit with the intent alleged and the value of the property destroyed, to be found by the jury. The Attorney General cites People v. Perry, 65 Cal. 568, 4 Pac. 572, and People v. Christensen, 85 Cal. 568, 24 Pac. 888, where it was held that a mere statement of the evidence is not a violation of the Constitution. But the instruction is not a "mere statement of the evidence"; it is a statement that certain material facts were admitted; that there was no contention as to them, and that the "jury must find accordingly." It was said in People v. Gordon, 88 Cal. 422, 426, 26 Pac. 502, 504:

> "While section 19, article 6, of the Constitution allows judges to state the testimony to the jury, yet this principle has always been strictly enforced, and necessarily so, for that judges must not charge juries with respect to matters of fact is a constitutional prohibition which has been jealously guarded and rigidly upheld from the earliest judicial history of the state," citing People v. Williams, 17 Cal. 147.

See remarks of Mr. Justice Sloss in People v. MacDonald, 167 Cal. 545, 550, 140 Pac. 256; People v. Carder, 31 Cal. App. 355, 357, 160 Pac. 686. See, also, note in Treadwell's Constitution, p. 344, where the cases are collected.

There are some other assignments of error which we do not deem it necessary to consider. A number of collateral matters were gone into by the district attorney which had little, if any, bearing upon the issues. The statement made by the witness Baxter respecting an insurance policy distinct from the one in question we think was irrelevant. Some matters introduced as tending to show intent might well have been omitted as too remote to have such tendency. We think there was evidence upon all issues sufficient to support the verdict if the jury had been permitted to exercise their own judgment upon all the evidence. Inasmuch, however, as the court took from the jury certain material facts and directed a verdict as to them, it becomes imperative upon the reviewing court to hold this to have been prejudicial error.

The judgment and order are reversed.

STEPHENS, Governor, v. CHAMBERS, State Controller. (Civ. 1757.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 17, 1917.)

1. STATES 🔑119 — APPROPRIATIONS — AUTHORITY OF LEGISLATURE.

In view of unquestioned appropriations by the federal Congress, which has only delegated powers for the purpose of paying pensions and for defraying expenses for the national memorial celebration at Vicksburg, Act July 31, 1917 (St. 1917, p. 1608), appropriation by Legislature of $15,000, to be used in the discretion of the Governor for the purpose of defraying expenses of a public nature, incident to such memorial reunion, is valid, despite Const. art. 4, § 31, prohibiting the gift of public money to any individual or corporation, or for the purpose or benefit of any corporation, or other institution not under the exclusive management of the state, for the purpose of the appropriation, was a public one to strengthen fraternal and patriotic ties in the United States, and was not an appropriation for the benefit of any particular individuals.

2. STATUTES 🔑119(3) — APPROPRIATIONS—SUBJECTS OF ACT—VALIDITY.

Act July 31, 1917 (St. 1917, p. 1608), appropriating $15,000 to be expended by the Governor for the purpose of assisting to defray the expenses of a public nature incident to the national memorial and peace jubilee at Vicksburg, in October, 1917, is not subject to attack under Const. art. 4, § 34, declaring that no bill making an appropriation of money except the general appropriation bill shall contain more than one item of appropriation, and that for a single and certain purpose to be expressed therein, on the ground that the language of the act is so indefinite and uncertain that it could not be determined whether the appropriation provided for is or is not for a public purpose.

3. STATUTES 🔑119(3) — APPROPRIATIONS—SUBJECTS OF ACT—VALIDITY.

Such act is not subject to attack on the ground that the appropriation is not for a single purpose.

4. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW 🔑62—APPROPRIATION—VALIDITY.

Act July 31, 1917 (St. 1917, p. 1608), making an appropriation of $15,000 to be expended by the Governor in his discretion in defraying the expenses of a public nature incident to the Vicksburg National Memorial Reunion of October, 1917, is not invalid because vesting the Governor with discretion as to the expenditure of the appropriation.

Original application by William D. Stephens, Governor of the State of California, for a writ of mandate against John S. Chambers, State Controller of the State of California. Writ granted.

L. T. Hatfield, of Sacramento, for petitioner. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert W. Harrison, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

HART, J. This is an application for a writ of mandate requiring respondent, as state controller, to draw his warrant in favor of petitioner "for such portion of the sum of $15,000 as petitioner may require."

At the recent session of the Legislature there was regularly passed an act entitled "An act to provide for the celebration of the national memorial reunion and peace jubilee at Vicksburg, Mississippi, and making an appropriation therefor," which act was by the Governor approved and took effect July 31, 1917. Stats. 1917, p. 1608. Section 1 thereof reads, in part, as follows:

> "There is hereby appropriated * * * the sum of fifteen thousand dollars, to be expended by the Governor, in his discretion, for the purpose of assisting to defray the expenses of a public nature incident to the holding of the national memorial reunion and peace jubilee to commemorate the victories and virtues leading to the half century of peace and prosperity to the American nation, and further to strengthen the fraternal ties of amity in the United States," said reunion to be held at Vicksburg in October, 1917, on certain named days.

Section 2 provides that the Governor shall—

> "demand from the * * * controller, and the state controller is hereby authorized and instructed upon such demand, to draw his warrant in favor of the Governor for the sum of fifteen thousand dollars to be expended by him as above provided, and the treasurer is hereby authorized and directed to pay the same."

By way of answer and return to the petition for a writ of mandate, respondent alleges that said petition "does not state facts sufficient to entitle the petitioner to the relief prayed for," and it is contended that the attempted appropriation of money is contrary to the provisions of section 34, article 4, of the Constitution, which reads:

> "No bill making an appropriation of money, except the general appropriation bill, shall contain more than one item of appropriation, and that for one single and certain purpose, to be therein expressed."

Thus it will be observed that, so far as the pleadings in this proceeding are concerned, the legality of the statute or appropriation in question is attacked upon one ground only. Indeed, in his brief, the Attorney General appears to concede that it is within the constitutional competence of the Legislature of this state to appropriate money from the funds of the state for the purpose and object for which the appropriation is made by the act under attack here, for he says:

> "In the determination of the validity of this appropriation, it is not necessary to question the objects and purposes of the reunion to be held at Vicksburg. It may well be admitted that such reunion tends to do all of the things expressed in the act as the reasons for holding such reunion. Nor do we here contend that the holding of such reunion is not a matter of state and national importance and one which it might well be to the state's advantage to encourage, even to the extent of appropriations of money to defray the expenses incident thereto."

In thus expressing himself, the Attorney General doubtless took into consideration, as properly he should, the act of the Sixty-Fourth Congress of the United States (session of 1915–16)—Act Cong. Sept. 8, 1916, c. 464, 39 Stat. 812—whereby money was appropriated for defraying the expenses of the "National Memorial Celebration and Peace Jubilee, * * * at Vicksburg, * * * in the year 1917, by the survivors of the Armies of the Tennessee and of the Mississippi," who participated in the memorable battle of Vicksburg in the month of July, 1863, for the reason that the appropriation involved in the act whose validity is here challenged is in aid of the purposes and objects of said act of the national Congress. With this concession of the Attorney General that there legally reside in the state the power and the right to appropriate a reasonable amount of the public moneys to aid in the achievement of the purposes of the act of Congress referred to, further consideration herein thereof might well be waived or dismissed, but, in view of the strictness with which the Constitution, by certain provisions therein contained, guards the disposal of the public revenues, and of certain cases expounding those provisions, some observations with respect to that proposition need not be deemed out of place herein.

[1] From what has already been said, it is doubtless plain enough that we are in full accord with the concession of the Attorney General that the Legislature may, without offending any of the inhibitory mandates of the Constitution with regard to the appropriations of the public moneys, make such an appropriation as the one whose legality is challenged in this proceeding; and so we express ourselves because of the conviction that, while the Legislature will not be permitted to go beyond the bounds expressly established by the people through their Constitution in the matter of the disposal of the revenues raised for the support of the state government, it would be opposed to and, indeed, conceivably in many instances, subversive of the highest ends and the best interests of, a government whose sovereignty and general policies are outlined and controlled by a written Constitution, framed in language necessarily general, if it were found requisite, in constitutional construction, to hold that the terms of the organic law should on all occasions be accepted and applied in their literal sense, or that there are not certain matters incidental and necessary to every well-governed state and its subjects as to which the Constitution is silent, in so far as express language is concerned, and as to which legislation looking to the highest welfare of the governed is absolutely necessary. A written Constitution, like a statute, cannot so deal with particulars as to meet or provide for every case or contingency which may arise and of which legislative cognizance is allowable if necessary to the complete enjoyment of those privileges, immunities, and rights which are of the essence, and, indeed, the primary and foremost objects of a government in which, like ours, ultimate sovereignty is in the people themselves. By this we do not mean to say that the limitations or barriers contained in the Constitution against the exercise of legislative power may be set aside or disregarded, or that the intent of the organic law, as it is to be gathered from the instrument itself, shall not in all cases prevail. Nor do we intend thus to imply that the courts, in the construction of a written Constitution, may be governed by a change in public sentiment as to any subject to which express attention is given and as to which limitations are fixed by the Constitution. But what we do maintain is that, since a written Constitution is intended as and is the mere framework according to whose general outlines specific legislation must be framed and modeled, and is, therefore, as stated and as is essentially true, necessarily couched in general terms or language, it is not to be interpreted according to narrow or supertechnical principles, but liberally and on broad general lines, so that it may accomplish in full measure the objects of its establishment and so carry out the great principles of government.

The Constitution of the United States involves a grant and limitation of powers. The federal government, through its Congress, can exercise or exert no power which is not clearly within the grant of the federal Constitution; and this means that Congress may exercise only the powers expressly conferred upon the federal government and such incidental or auxiliary powers as may be essential to the exercise and execution of the powers expressly granted. There is no provision in the national Constitution expressly authorizing the expenditure of public moneys for the purposes and objects stated in the act of Congress above referred to. Nor is there any single provision of that Constitution within the spirit or reason of which does authority for such an appropriation of the public moneys fall. The same is true as to the several acts of Congress pensioning soldiers who fought to uphold the Union in our domestic Civil War. But the latter acts, as well as the one giving rise to the appropriation herein attacked, have never been challenged upon the ground that they were ultra vires, or beyond the authority of Congress to enact. Perhaps, by applying to them the touchstone of strict technical principles of construction, their force as legal enactments might be destroyed. But no such view or method of construction as applied to those acts would by any court be accepted or resorted to. To the contrary, in comparing them with the Constitution, if, indeed, the solution of the question whether they are or are not valid involves a matter of constitutional construction, the courts, if discovering even no indirect or inferential authority for their enactment in the language of that instrument, would nevertheless find ample sanction for them in the general spirit of our national government and in the genius of our political institutions, as outlined and promulgated by the Constitution itself and so sustain them as treating with subjects which clearly fall, not within the letter of the organic law, but within the spirit and reason of those general policies which inhere, and of necessity must inhere, in every government framed and formed upon the lines of enlightened general principles—policies consistent and in harmony with the nature and form of the government as outlined by the primary law of the land and the absence of which would greatly and seriously curtail or restrict that full enjoyment of the rights of persons and of property which can only come from a government deriving its force from the consent of the governed. It would, indeed, come as a shock if the courts felt compelled to declare and so hold that laws pensioning those who fought to preserve the integrity of the American Union and who, from their accumulated years or disease, are unable to care for themselves, were beyond the power of Congress to enact. Such a judicial fiat would be universally denounced as repugnant to every consideration of governmental duty, obligation, and gratitude. But the motive underlying such legislation is much broader and more far reaching in its effect upon the government of society than the mere consideration of gratitude. Undeniably, the stability of every civilized government and its political institutions wholly depends upon the patriotism and loyalty thereto of its subjects; hence it is the first duty of every government so to administer its affairs as to inspire in its citizens patriotism and loyalty to the fundamental political principles upon which it is founded, and, to that end, through appropriate policies, teach and exemplify the duty which every citizen owes to his country and its government. Therefore, as stated, legislation which provides for the pensioning of those who have fought the battles of their country for the preservation of its governments and who are in need of assistance involves not only the quality of gratitude, but a just and substantial recognition of services inspired by patriotism, without which battles cannot, as a rule, successfully be fought. If it may be said as to the present crisis with which our country is confronted that patriotism in our citizens has not been aroused, how infinitely worse would the conditions in that regard now be if, in the past, our government had wholly failed in a proper way to recognize and reward, in proper cases, those who had gone to the front and fought our battles in the past?

As we understand the congressional act in aid of the purposes and objects of which the appropriation challenged here was made by our own Legislature, the great object and desideratum thereof is to bring about a sentiment of amity between those sections of our country who opposed each other in one of the most bitterly fought domestic wars of which history gives any record; for it is a matter of common historical knowledge that the bitterness of sentiment brought about between the northern and southern sections by that war existed in full vigor down to the opening of hostilities between this country and Spain which ended with the late Spanish-American War. And there can hardly be any doubt that that same old feeling in some degree still lingers or exists. The governments of the Union and of the states could adopt no more effective policy for reuniting the two sections in one common political sentiment than that which is involved in and represented by the legislation in question. That the inevitable effect of such a gathering, annually held, as seems to be the policy of Congress, so long as there is a considerable number of the survivors of both sides of that war, will be ultimately to destroy every vestige of that old feeling of antagonism in political sentiment (we here use the word "political" in its more comprehensive sense), there cannot be the shadow of a doubt; and that the inevitable consequence of a condition so brought about will be to establish throughout the whole country a deeper, more abiding and a universal love for our common country and its government, is equally plain. Congress could have exercised no power or established no other policy more conducive to the general welfare of our government and the people, for no government can long exist with its people radically divided in sentiment upon the fundamental political doctrines upon which it is founded.

If, then, Congress, circumscribed as it is within the narrow bounds of granted and limited powers, may rightfully, in the absence of express authority therefor, but solely by the exertion of that power which must inhere in every government if the general welfare is on all occasions and in every emergency to be subserved as intended by the very nature and spirit of our form of government, appropriate moneys from the public revenues for the purpose of accomplishing the great ultimate object of the act in question, why may not a state, essentially a constituent part of the Union—which, indeed, goes to the making of the Union—make a like appropriation as in aid of the object thus to be achieved?
